There are several interesting things that may be observed from a study of these enlistments. They show that the strictly rural States have a larger percentage of enlistments than the metropolitan areas. This is caused probably by reason of the fact that those living in the cities receive much larger compensations than those working on farms, and also that those from rural communities like travel and excitement. The enlistments, of course, are less in the States where people are more war-minded than in others, and this is especially true where munitions are made.

Wisconsin is known as a place where the people are peace loving and are much opposed to peacetime conscription. Yet if you will observe from the table you will find that Wisconsin has a considerably higher percentage of enlistments than those States bordering on it.

The Navy, Air Corps, and Army all have their quotas filled. If we would raise the wages of those that enlist for service in the Army and the Navy so that they received a salary commensurate with what we pay those in C. C. C. camps, or wages that would compare favorably with what men receive who are employed in other industries, of course, we would receive enlistments far beyond our requirements or even our expectations.

At the present time no Member of Congress, so far as I know, and no one in the Nation, knows about the emergency that is claimed to exist and which requires compulsory military training in peacetimes.

In making this statement I do not want anyone to gather the impression that I do not believe in proper national defense and proper training of youth, but I believe there are places where it can be done, such as our high schools, colleges, and universities, to a much better advantage, especially for youth, than to take them into camp where they are trained only with the thought of going into war.

Deportation of Harry Bridges

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LELAND M. FORD
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 14, 1940

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Los Angeles Times of August 7:

[From the Los Angeles Times of August 7, 1940]

THREAT CHARGED IN BRIDGES CASE—"REDS" WOULD TRY TO TIE UP DEPORTATION SHIP, LEGIONNAIRE DECLARES

CHICAGO, August 6.—Communist Party leaders have threatened to stop the deportation of Harry Bridges, west coast director of the C. I. O., in event the bill to deport him is passed by Congress. This statement was made today by Homer L. Chaillaux, director of the National American Commission of the American Legion, before the Chicago Rotary Club.

"The latest threat from the Communist Party is that 'we have machinery to make it impossible for Bridges to be deported by boat,'" Chaillaux said.

UNION CONTROL

"They mean that they control the seamen's union on the west coast and will make it impossible to move any boat on which an attempt is made to ship Bridges."

Chaillaux then pointed out the need for legislation to prohibit the further influx of alien saboteurs. He told the group that the Legion succeeded in having a resolution passed by Congress asking for the deportation of all alien anarchists, revolutionists, saboteurs, habitual drug addicts, and criminals.

VETOED BILL

"That bill was vetoed by the President," he said. "The explanation was that the Secretary of Labor already has that power.

"Madam Perkins has the power—but she didn't use it in the case of Bridges. The power should be mandatory.

"We have learned there are 6,000 aliens working at the Panama Canal. Any 1 of these 6,000 could put the Canal out of commission and might be an agent for a foreign power. We know of several who are German bund workers. Yet the latest news report is that about 80 Nazis have been removed. What about the rest of them?"

Disposal of Destroyers to England

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BENNETT CHAMP CLARK

OF MISSOURI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 14 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial appearing in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of Monday, August 12, 1940, entitled, "The Retired Admirals Sound Off."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of August 12, 1940]

THE RETIRED ADMIRALS SOUND OFF

The retired admirals are rushing to endorse the recent speech by the retired General Pershing, urging that 50 American destroyers be sent to England.

Admiral Harry E. Yarnell, retired, calls for sending not only destroyers but other "necessary types of vessels" for British defense. He also urges repeal of the Neutrality Act, which was passed to keep America out of war.

Admiral William H. Standley, retired, goes even beyond the Yarnell proposals. There is a legal barrier to transfer of the destroyers, and this admiral would evade it by having Congress declare a national emergency, and thus give the President "full powers, including whatever disposition of our Army, Navy, and air force is called for by the public interest."

One-man rule, in other words; one-man decision on war or peace—military dictatorship. This is a shocking proposal, but not surprising from Admiral Standley, retired, since he was one of the original war hawks who in June urged that this country declare war on Germany at once.

The criticism expressed yesterday in Upton Close's article, as to retired admirals who "have forgotten their history and training," is in point here.

While the retired admirals are expressing bellicose ideas, what are the admirals on active duty saying about the destroyer deal? They are saying nothing publicly. The matter has become so involved in politics and intrigue that any discreet naval man still in service knows better than to pop off about it.

If the President has consulted naval officials, their statements have not been made public. One clew to their attitude is available, however, and Arthur Krock cites it in his column in the New York Times.

The clew is found in the report of an executive session of the Senate Naval Affairs Committee, the committee which several months ago published the sharply realistic report on national defense and foreign policy. The following exchanges took place:

"Chairman WALSH. When was the decision made by the Navy Department declining, or suggesting that the Navy Department would not be disposed to dispose of any of its destroyers?

"Captain FISHER. As far as I know, day before yesterday [June 12, 1940]. * * *

"Senator LUCAS. Did anyone in the coordinating department or Navy Department, discuss with you the question of the disposition of the destroyers?

"Assistant Secretary COMPTON. As soon as we heard the rumor, naturally Admiral Stark and myself discussed the situation and determined it would be inadvisable. If we were asked to do it, our answer would be 'No'; we would definitely recommend against it."

This shows two things: That the destroyer deal had been talked about for a long time, months before it came into the open with the Pershing broadcast, and that the naval high command had taken a stand against it.

The job of national defense is that of the officers in active service; it is not that of the retired admirals. We prefer to think that the men on the active list know what work is cut out for them, and know what is best for the country.

Enforcement of Hatch Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CARL A. HATCH

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 14 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ANNOUNCEMENT BY DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an announcement by the Department of Justice relative to the enforcement of the so-called Hatch Act.

There being no objection, the announcement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Department of Justice announced today that Attorney General Robert H. Jackson had issued a circular instructing all United States attorneys that the Hatch Act adds many new enactments to the criminal code of laws of the United States and that violation of these provisions are to be enforced by the Department of Justice.

The circular points out that penalties of $1,000 fine or 1 year's imprisonment, or both, are provided for the following types of illegal activity:

"Intimidation or coercion of voters in Federal elections.

"The use of official authority by Federal, and in some cases by State, officeholders to interfere in Federal elections.

"The promise by anyone of Federal employment, compensation, or other benefit from Federal funds, in return for political activity or support.

"Depriving anyone of employment compensation or other benefits derived from Federal relief or work-relief funds on account of race, creed, color, or political activity.

"Soliciting, assessing, or receiving subscriptions or contributions for political purposes from anyone on Federal relief or work relief.

"The furnishing or disclosing or receiving by anyone of lists of persons on Federal relief or work relief for political purposes.

"The use by anyone of Federal funds appropriated for work relief, relief, or public works so as to interfere with or coerce any individual in his right to vote.

"The annual receipt of contributions, or the annual expenditure, aggregating more than $3,000,000 by any political committee. (Willful violation of this section involves a penalty as high as $10,000 and imprisonment for 2 years.)"

The following criminal acts are punishable by a fine of not more than $5,000 or 5 years' imprisonment:

"The making of an annual contribution in excess of $5,000 to or for any campaign for the nomination or election of any candidate for an elective Federal office. The annual limitation likewise applies to a contribution made to any political committee or to any national political party.

"The purchasing of any advertising, or articles of any kind by anyone where part or all of the proceeds directly or indirectly inure to the benefit of or for any candidate for an elective Federal office, or to the benefit of any political party or committee.

"The making of, or promising to make, a contribution to any political party, committee, or candidate for public office by anyone who is negotiating for, or performing a Government contract."

The circular points out that the provisions of sections 9 and 12 of the Hatch Act which restrict the political activities of officers and employees of the executive branch of Federal, State, and local agencies are not enforceable by the Department of Justice, but are enforceable administratively by the Federal agency concerned or, if civil-service employees or State or local agencies are affected, by the United States Civil Service Commission.

The Attorney General's circular further states that the Department of Justice will not attempt to answer general inquiries with respect to the meaning and interpretation of the Hatch Act in particular situations. For a brief period following the enactment of the original Hatch Act it was the practice of the Department to answer such general inquiries but this practice was discontinued some time ago inasmuch as the Attorney General is authorized by law to render opinions only to the President and to the heads of the several executive departments.

The circular specifically notes that section 15 of the new Hatch Act incorporates into statutory law certain determinations of the United States Civil Service Commission as to what constitutes political activity. Civil Service Commission Circular Form 1236 entitled "Political Activity and Political Assessments of Federal Officeholders and Employees" which describes such illegal activity is available at the United States Government Printing Office, Washington, D. C., at 5 cents per copy.

McNary of Fir Cone—Willkie's Running Mate From the Forests of Oregon Is Great With Farmers and Filberts

OF
HON. HOMER D. ANGELL
OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 14, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE (PORTLAND) OREGONIAN AND AN ARTICLE FROM LIFE MAGAZINE

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I ask permission to include an editorial appearing in the Oregonian of August 10, 1940, calling attention to the biographical article of my fellow Oregonian, the Honorable CHARLES L. MCNARY, appearing in the issue of Life magazine of August 1940, written by Richard L. Neuberger. I also ask leave to include in the extension this article by Mr. Neuberger. They are as follows:

[From the Portland Oregonian of August 10, 1940]

MCNARY AT HOME

A nearly life-size portrait of Senator MCNARY, of Oregon, smiles from the cover of the current issue of the illustrated magazine, Life. On inner pages is an article both biographical and intimately revealing, written by a fellow Oregonian, Richard L. Neuberger.

In compliment to the requirements of such a sketch, Mr. Neuberger naturally goes into the official life of Oregon's senior Senator. It is one angle that the public already knows a great deal about, so the part of the text that reveals the Oregon Senator's home life will likely take precedence in the reader's interest.

And now that that side of Senator MCNARY is so ably assembled in text and illustration, the thought comes forward that his is a private life rather made to order for one who is running for Vice President of the United States.

If campaign directors are as wise as they pretend to be, candidates for President and Vice President need display an interest in the common, the homey, affairs of life. Hence they are pictured pitching hay, or wearing cowboy regalia, or fishing in old duds, and so on. Senator MCNARY does not have to pretend. He is a practical farmer, not a gentleman farmer. When he comes home from the capital he comes home to a farm to be a farmer. The house in which he lives is a modest white bungalow set among great fir trees. There is a big fireplace with a bean kettle, not simply ornamental, that may be swung over the blazing hearth. An ordinary rural mail delivery box is the sole marker of the entrance to the farm. The dog, and a prized dog, too, is a commonplace animal. There are trout in the farm creek and nesting wild ducks and geese.

Not one item in all this is staged. It has the genuineness of many years of preference and standing. If it be true that interests such as these are political assets, it may be said that not only does the Oregon Senator possess them, but that they are so fundamental with him that a story about him, simply told, cannot but reveal them.

MCNARY OF FIR CONE—WILLKIE'S RUNNING MATE FROM THE FOREST OF OREGON IS GREAT WITH FARMERS AND FILBERTS

(By Richard L. Neuberger)

Under no circumstances would CHARLES LINZA MCNARY ever live for 11 years in a New York City apartment house like his running mate on the Republican national ticket, Wendell L. Willkie. Crowds and big cities annoy him. MCNARY considers even the half-million people of Washington, D. C., too many in one place and is pained by the confusion and stir of the capital. As soon as Congress adjourns and he is sure his good friend Franklin D. Roosevelt does not need him for White House conferences, MCNARY, who is Republican minority leader in the United States Senate, boards a limited train for Fir Cone, the 300-acre Oregon nut-and-prune farm where he was born 66 years ago.

Crossing the continent, he likes to sit in the observation car and watch the farms flash past—Indiana's cornfields, the dairy pastures of Wisconsin, the broad wheat ranches of the plains, Idaho's swaying rows of potato plants, and at last the orchards of the Pacific slope. Often he reaches the end of his journey with a pocketful of notes scribbled on railroad stationery about farm conditions he has noted along the line.

Improving the farmer's life has been MCNARY'S dominant concern since he entered the Senate 23 years ago and immediately asked for a seat on the Committee on Agriculture. Preoccupation with his own specialties, walnut and filbert trees, gave a "Mr. Smith Goes to Washington" touch to his first interview. A reporter inquired what interested him most. "Nuts," replied MCNARY.

From the start MCNARY let bounties for the farmer take precedence over party regularity. He attended the meetings called by Brookhart, Norris, and other Corn Belt insurrectionists. Despite G. O. P. pleas in behalf of private enterprise, he proposed Government transmission lines to carry Government hydroelectricity to unlighted farms. Last year he confounded many of his Republican followers who were in the midst of a furious attack on New Deal extravagance when he steered through the Senate a $400,000,000 addition to the Department of Agriculture appropriations requested by the Democratic President.

A year or two ago the Old Guard of the Republican Party wanted MCNARY thrown out as Senate leader because of his heresies. At the recent Republican National Convention in Philadelphia, however, Wendell Willkie and his advisers consulted the results of the last two Presidential elections and decided that MCNARY was precisely the type who had to be kept in party councils at all costs. Perceiving that not since 1928 have the Republicans picked up a single electoral vote west of the Pennsylvania-Ohio border, they concluded that MCNARY for Vice President would strengthen G. O. P. chances in the 2,500 miles between there and the headlands of the Pacific.

Geographical qualifications aside, MCNARY is an important asset to the Republicans because for 14 years he has been a symbol of unstinted Federal help for agriculture. The McNary-Haugen bill, with its equalization fee for grain farmers, which he originally introduced in 1926, provided the lexicon for practically all subsequent discussion of the farm question. It showed farmers the door to the United States Treasury and started in MCNARY'S direction more mail from rural districts than is received by any other Senator. "The McNary-Haugen fight," wrote Gen. Hugh S. Johnson a few months ago, "made the country conscious of the farm problem and the farmers conscious of Senator MCNARY."

MCNARY is a specific antidote for all political handicaps the No. 1 member of the ticket carries into the campaign, particularly west of the Mississippi. Willkie has been the head of a far-flung utilities empire, the Commonwealth & Southern Corporation, and became a national figure waging its battles against the competition of the Tennessee Valley Authority. MCNARY has been the most consistent Republican Senate supporter of T. V. A. and was scolding the Power Trust in the days of Coolidge normalcy. Willkie has said it is "uneconomic and fallacious" for the Government to construct power dams. His running mate is the sponsor of the 576,000-horsepower colossus that cost Uncle Sam $75,000,000 to build at Bonneville on the Columbia River.

Willkie favored all aid to England and France short of war. MCNARY is one of the Western isolationists who opposed both repeal of the arms embargo and delivery of American military equipment to the Allies. Cordell Hull's reciprocal-trade treaties get Willkie's O. K. MCNARY claims the Hull treaties have weakened the agricultural market and he persuaded a preponderance of Western Senators, Democrats as well as Republicans, to vote against their extension.

Willkie has been critical of excessive Government spending and believes prudence in this respect would be a go-ahead signal to business. As early as 1918 MCNARY began getting reelected by telling the home folks how much Federal money he was wangling for Oregon.

As to whether a Presidential candidate and a Vice Presidential candidate should present quite such a complete contrast, opinions differ. "Mr. MCNARY is an unhappy choice for Vice President," declared the New York Times, "because in many of the things that matter most, Mr. MCNARY'S views are the complete negation of Mr. Willkie's views." The St. Louis Post-Dispatch maintained that the very circumstance to which the Times objected was evidence that "in choosing his running mate, Mr. Willkie, the amateur, has made a decision quite worthy of a professional."

Wendell Willkie's selection of MCNARY as a running mate unquestionably impelled the President to choose Henry Wallace. Until MCNARY was put on the Republican ticket Wallace had been so far behind the other Democratic possibilities they could not communicate with him even by smoke signals. Many party leaders had not considered him at all.

Then the New Deal hegemony decided that the paramount qualification of the President's running mate had to be ability to challenge MCNARY'S appeal to the farmers. Only the Secretary of Agriculture seemed capable of this feat, and Wallace was thrust upon an unwilling Democratic convention. A western delegate seconding his nomination shouted, "Henry's our answer to CHARLEY MCNARY!" The Wallace choice came after reports had been heard in Washington of small-town movie audiences in rural districts who sat silently through news-reel speeches by Roosevelt and Wilkie and then applauded lustily when McNARY appeared on the screen.

M'NARY'S ADVICE TO TALKATIVE WILLKIE

McNARY'S advice to Willkie, when they met for the first time after their nominations, was: "Don't forget, young fellow, in politics you'll never be in trouble by not saying too much." In almost a quarter of a century in the Senate, McNARY has yet to deliver an oration. High on his list of taboos are crescendos, grandiloquence, and windmill gestures. He listens to voluble colleagues with amused tolerance. His own remarks are uttered in placid, matter-of-fact tones. "If Charley Mac ever really gets excited," says Senator WORTH CLARK, of Idaho, "I'll run for the door, because I'll know the Capitol dome is coming down."

Other Senators go to McNARY'S office for counsel. At sessions of the Republican caucus he quiets down Senators itching to fire oratorical fusilades. He listened to VANDENBERG rehearse a speech one day, then said: "That's fine, Van, only don't deliver it again." McNARY'S serenity enables him to judge politics from a peculiarly detached perspective. This calmness has given McNARY a constant strategic advantage over ALBEN W. BARKLEY, the bumbling Kentuckian who leads the Senate majority.

With a perky, half-sardonic smile McNARY admits political maneuvering is "as enjoyable as golf and considerably less expensive." He gets a malicious pleasure out of instigating embarrassing legislative proposals, occasionally labeled "demagoguers," and then watching BARKLEY and the top-heavy Democratic majority struggle to find a safe retreat. A favorite form of this wile is to up an old-age pension minimum or insert a union wage-scale clause in a housing bill. The 23 Republicans in the Senate can enthusiastically back the "demagoguers" but the majority party, faced with responsibility, must either vote them down or find more money.

In spite of his partisan finagling, party ties fail to shackle McNARY on issues affecting agriculture. The Republicans, as sworn enemies of New Deal socialism, are in an awkward position when their leader demands that people's utility districts, organized by farmers in the Pacific Northwest, be given prior claim over power companies to the juice from Bonneville Dam. Every so often Republicans outside the Senate wonder publicly why the party does not acquire a leader there who is a Republican first and a farmer second. That the party has not done so is certainly a tribute to McNARY.

FIR CONE, HIS HOME AND INSPIRATION

Fountainhead of McNARY'S fervid allegiance to agriculture is Fir Cone, the farm the Senator's pioneering grandfather from Tennessee homesteaded in 1845 at the end of the Oregon Trail. Fir Cone is in a timbered pocket 5 miles from the State capital, Salem (population 30,744), and 19 miles from the settlement of Champoeg, where frontiersmen organized the first provisional government in the sprawling Columbia Basin. A hundred acres of it are in walnuts, 50 in filberts and 50 in cherries and prunes. Douglas firs 175 feet high that were growing before the discovery of America cover the other hundred acres. Cones plunk on the roof of the $6,000 white-shingled bungalow that the Senator and his wife built in 1926 and fitted with only one spare room so they could not be harassed by a house full of guests. Tiny fir trees are carved in the green shutters. Back of the bungalow is a playhouse that David Lynn, Architect of the United States Capitol, designed for the McNARY'S 5-year-old adopted daughter, Charlotte.

Around the bungalow in a fir-rimmed curve twists Claggett Creek, named for the Senator's ox-driving maternal grandfather, Charles Claggett. Rainbow trout lie in its riffles, and from a lonely stump on shore McNARY'S best friend, the late Senator Jim Couzens, multimillionaire progressive Republican from Michigan, caught his first fish. A dozen times at Fir Cone—knocking golf balls across the putting green, sauntering in the arboretum of evergreen trees which may some day be deeded to the State of Oregon, rowing a little white skiff down toward the Willamette—Couzens tried to convince McNARY he should run for President and promised to finance the campaign to the limit. Twice he offered to make out a check for $100,000 right then and there. "No use; can't be done, Jim," was the inevitable reply.

As he lopes around his farm with a long hiker's stride, McNARY opens his jackknife and jerks up weeds. McNARY is fussy about his looks as well as Fir Cone's. Never on the farm is he without a tie, generally a stubby black or red bow. He constantly flicks imaginary dust from his shoes. His neighbors, to whom he is "Charley Mac," consider him a country squire rather than a bona fide dirt farmer, although Zero Polaire, master of the Salem Grange, says he is wiser in the ways of farming than anyone else in the valley. Other orchardists come to Fir Cone for seeds and advice. Before they go the Senator ladles them out a dish of the beans which he boils with molasses in the kettle that hangs in the fireplace of the 18-by-24-foot living room.

McNARY was the first farmer in Oregon to plant filberts on any considerable scale and wrote articles about the innovation for local farm papers. He developed the Imperial prune, the largest on the market, and sent pits all over the world. The same pickers have come to his place for 8 years. Most of them are nearby ranch hands. A few are migratory laborers who hit U S 99 every summer. They average approximately $4.50 a day and do better when the trees are heavy. McNARY takes juvenile pride in Fir Cone and keeps a scrapbook of poems he things descriptive of its landscape.

McNARY spends his mornings outdoors. In the afternoon, unless he has visitors, the Senator reads. Stacked on the living-room table behind a picture of Indian-fighting Gen. Nelson Appleton Miles are the books the Senator has been reading lately—Edward Bellamy's venerable Looking Backward (for the fifth or sixth time), Jefferson and Hamilton, by United States Ambassador to Chile Claude G. Bowers, Frederick Lewis Allen's Since Yesterday, a first edition of the works of the western frontier poet Samuel Simpson, the Sunbonnet Babies by Eulalie Osgood Grover, read aloud to Charlotte at evening, and volume III of Our Times by Mark Sullivan.

Cornelia Morton McNary, enthusiastic and youngish, thinks her husband's reading selection too serious and buys him detective fiction and light novels, which he tosses aside. She met the Senator at a small dinner party in Washington, where she was living with her father, a United States Army major. They were married 2 days before the end of 1923 in Chicago. A descendant of Editor Horace Greeley, Mrs. McNary now believes her ancestor's advice to go west was good.

HE WORKS HIS WAY THROUGH SCHOOL AND COLLEGE

McNARY'S first wife, the daughter of a prosperous Salem merchant, was killed in an automobile accident in 1918. The year he was married was also the year he went into politics and became assistant to his elder brother John who had been elected district attorney of the county. Both McNary boys had scrambled hard for legal educations with not much help from their inheritance. Charles, born on the farm June 12, 1874, put himself through high school working in a tree nursery in Salem for $1.15 a day. While grubbing in the loamy soil he could watch members of the legislature going into the State capitol across the street. This first contact with politics impressed on him the fact that a politician's lot was easier than a workman's.

One of McNARY'S friends, a young fellow his age, named Herbert Hoover, who had been living in Salem with relatives, had gone to Stanford University and found work in a laundry. McNARY decided he could do what Hoover had done. He went to California on a lumber boat and earned his way at Stanford waiting on tables. His long arms could hold three platters of stew at once. Law classes and his limited finances gave him little chance for social activities. McNARY came home from Stanford in 1898, passed the bar, played first base on the Salem baseball nine, and pushed a cart in the volunteer fire department. He and his brother ran the county prosecutor's office for a while and later built up a substantial legal practice handling property transactions. He attended the Baptist Church and taught real property at Willamette University, a local Methodist college.

Middle-of-the-road propensities soon began to stick out all over McNARY. He did Republican precinct work but led a revolt in the Salem commercial club against the choking off of waterfalls by private power companies. Although he supported the initiative and referendum and other progressive movements then stirring in Oregon, he never scooted off with the Progressives when they put up independent candidates. This policy he has always followed, deeming it wiser to work for reform from within the party than to stalk away and abandon the party machinery to the reactionaries. In 1913 a Democratic Governor appointed McNARY to a vacancy on the State supreme court and a year later he ran at the polls to retain the post. After 9 agonizing weeks of recounts in all 36 of Oregon's counties, the result was CHARLES L. MCNARY, 34,608 votes, and Henry L. Benson, 34,609.

War agitation hastened the death in 1917 of ailing United States Senator Harry Lane, of Oregon, one of the six "willful men" who voted in opposition to America's participation. McNARY, then chairman of the Republican State Committee, satisfied the main requirements of a successor. He got the appointment and the next year was elected to the full term, campaigning on a platform of preferential homestead rights for soldiers and sailors, women's suffrage, help for the small farmer more irrigation projects for Oregon, and vigorous prosecution of the war "to crush autocracy."

ALMOST BUT NOT QUITE AN INSURGENT

Most of McNARY'S career in the Senate has been spent in the neutral territory separating the G. O. P. conservatives and insurgents. Often he was the only liaison between the two encampments. He has hovered most of the time on the periphery of the Republican left, backing Government operation of the Muscle Shoals power plant which would one day be the first unit of the T. V. A. and cause Wendell Willkie a lot of trouble. Yet he never thought of bolting the party when the elder La Follette ran on a Progressive ticket in 1924.

Economy, in practice if not in theory, went out the window early in McNARY'S Senate career. One year his campaign literature shamelessly advised constituents exactly "what this influence and this prestige of Senator McNARY means to Oregon's future welfare:"

"It means government funds for Oregon's agricultural, livestock, and fruit industries.

"It means Government funds to build Oregon's public roads, forest roads, and trails.

"It means Government funds to harness Oregon's streams and convert them into power to grind its grain, spin its wool, and turn its wheels of industry.

"It means Government funds to preserve and develop Oregon's fishing, game, and scenic resources.

"It means Government funds to transform Oregon's arid, swamp, and logged-off lands into orchards and fields of grain.

"It means Government funds to improve Oregon's rivers and to make its harbors into ports of the first magnitude."

McNARY applies to Washington the same unruffled affability that has succeeded in his home State. He is a conciliator, ready 24 hours a day to forgive and shake hands. He had a cordial visit at the White House the afternoon after Calvin Coolidge vetoed the McNary-Haugen bill. As soon as the clerk has announced the result of a Senate roll call, McNARY, to all intents and purposes, forgets who voted which way and why. His friendship exacts no ideological prerequisites. He strolls about the Senate, bending over the white head of CARTER GLASS one minute and giving GERALD NYE an encouraging pat on the shoulder the next. He is wary of any political caldron that threatens to boil over into personal animosities. He ducked a vote on the Supreme Court appointment of Senator Hugo L. Black. Although definitely opposed to a third term for any President, he squelched as ill-mannered an attempt to haul the Senate into the rumpus with a resolution aimed against a third term for Franklin D. Roosevelt.

This deference to personal amenities has bridged many political chasms. When McNARY was nominated for Vice President a warm letter of congratulation came by messenger from "your old friend, Franklin D. Roosevelt." The President has always been more cordial to McNARY than to a lot of the members of his own party. As he signed the Bonneville authorization Mr. Roosevelt said, "I've got to give Charley his dam." McNARY was asked to come to Washington for White House conferences after the war broke out last fall and the President and Hull—although both knew he was opposed to most of their foreign policy—called him in for frequent consultation. It was McNARY to whom Hull turned for an appraisal of Senate sentiment on repeal of the arms embargo. The President's debonair pleasantries McNARY returns with dry geniality.

HIS STRATEGY DEFEATS THE COURT BILL

That this friendship has endured is doubly remarkable in view of the fact that McNARY devised the strategy that brought about the rejection of the most controversial bill Mr. Roosevelt ever sent to Congress. When the scheme to put 6 new members on the United States Supreme Court was presented early in 1937, McNARY heard his friends in the Democratic cloakroom begin to grumble and complain. He hastily imposed silence on his own followers. "Let the fellows over yonder do the talking," he said, gesturing toward the vast expanse of seated Democrats. Around the ash-littered conference table in the caucus room of the minority, he prophesied that for the outmustered Republicans to inveigh against Court packing would only solidify the majority. "But," he added, "the Democrats are going to snipe at each other as sure as grass is green, just so long as we don't give 'em any reason to unite in the face of the enemy."

Some G. O. P. speeches broke through this cordon, including one by Hoover that made McNARY swear softly, but they were not in enough force to distract the Democrats from one of the most terrific intraparty rows in Congressional history. Senator BURTON K. WHEELER, a new dealer until that time, led the sortie that rammed the Court bill into a committee pigeonhole. The Republicans in the House of Representatives under JOE MARTIN, whom McNARY considers the smartest leader the G. O. P. ever had there, lay low also and a Democratic Congressman shouted angrily at his colleagues: "You Democrats! Can't you see the Republicans are using you?" By the time the episode was over the G. O. P. had been sufficiently resuscitated to gain 7 Senators and 81 Representatives at the 1938 elections.

As Vice President of the United States, if the Republican Party is victorious this fall, McNARY can keep on enjoying the feature of Washington he likes best—the clubby atmosphere of the Senate. He can move behind the scenes, bolstering waverers, winning new converts, whispering mock threats in the ears of the opposition. He can still drive to the Capitol in his Buick with his Negro chauffeur, George Smith, whom he calls "Joe Louis" because he is an amateur boxer, and on bright mornings he and George can get out and walk briskly around 2 or 3 blocks for exercise. At lunch in the Senate restaurant he can continue to thumb through farm reports, breaking off now and then to exchange theological opinions with his waiter, John Holloway, a Negro who studied to be a minister. And on Sundays he can take Charlotte for her regular visit to the zoo, where they have agreed upon pet names for most of the animals.

Whether as Vice President of the United States CHARLES McNARY can keep on endorsing Government power projects, isolation, high tariffs, and huge outlays for farm relief under a President who believes in none of these things remains to be seen. The country has just been watching a President and Vice President at odds over basic national policies. The difference between Wendell Willkie and his running mate is pointed up by the power issue. Willkie has said that it is his patriotic duty "to do what I can for the preservation of public utilities privately owned." McNARY has advocated the principle that the people come first when the ownership, development, and control of the water power of the Nation are considered. He was one of the few Republican Senators who voted for the bond issue that T. V. A. used to buy out the Tennessee properties of Willkie's company. No divergence half so sharp as this appeared between Franklin D. Roosevelt and John N. Garner when they were meshed into the Democratic tickets of 1932 and 1936.

Before perpetual warfare is foreseen shaking the next Republican administration, other factors must be considered. McNARY is not nearly so new dealish in all matters as he is with respect to problems directly or indirectly involving the farmer. Oregon and fir cone dominate his horizon. He stubbornly resists economy drives aimed at poor farmers in the hinterland, but has helped trim funds for relief and other functions primarily important to metropolitan areas. McNARY's love of the West amounts almost to a sort of regional nationalism and he has been mistrustful of the recent concentration of authority in Washington. He is a decentralist who fears that complex regulation along a 3,000-mile line of communication could reduce the Pacific Northwest to a colonial-empire status. His agrarianism, anchored in the populist background of Oregon, is individualistic and has never synchronized with what he terms "collectivist values." He wants the farmer to receive benefit payments but he believes the checks should be handed out by a county or precinct agency rather than a Federal bureau. The W. P. A. scandals in Pennsylvania and Kentucky disturbed him and he has demanded that relief management be turned over to the States. He felt that court packing was a real threat to civil liberties. In most of these things McNARY squares with Willkie. He particularly approves Willkie's statement that we do not want monopolistic government any more than we want monopolistic industry.

Concessions were granted on both sides before the Republican ticket was formed. At first McNARY would not accept. Then it was pointed out that Willkie, whom he had never seen personally, wanted him as his Vice Presidential nominee. He was told that Willkie recognized their variance on certain questions, but believed compromise could certainly be reached. McNARY, who considers compromise the oxygen of politics, agreed to run. His wife, buying veal cutlets in a Salem meat market, would not believe it when the butcher told her the nomination of the Senator for Vice President had been announced on the radio. McNARY had wired her the previous night that he would not accept.

Precisely how Willkie and McNARY will compromise their differences no one knows yet, but in view of McNARY's genius for conciliation it is reasonable to guess that an area of agreement will be reached. Now that they have met at last, McNARY likes Willkie and says with considerable animation that his running mate has a lot of drive and color. Otherwise the senior Senator from Oregon is as placid and imperturbable as ever. He has demonstrated no excitement over the fact that his popularity in the West may be a determining factor in a crucial national election. So far as politics are concerned, he has been everywhere and seen everything. He has no illusions about why men get high public office or why they leave it. Of the 95 Senators who in 1917 watched him come down the aisle to be sworn in, only 9 are still present.

"You know," McNARY says, leaning back beneath a long picture of Fir Cone's orchards on the wall of his office, "most men are thrown into public service through accident rather than design. And when they are put in the harness there they usually stay until their constituents decide to give them their freedom."

Viewpoint of the Spokesman

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN G. ALEXANDER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 14, 1940

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, in my district we have a large number of colored citizens and they have two well-edited weekly papers. One of these papers is the Minneapolis Spokesman.

Last week the Spokesman carried an editorial entitled "Military Training Needed," in which the writer spoke favorably regarding the idea of conscription.

The article is as follows:

MILITARY TRAINING NEEDED

We can't join our liberal friends who are against selective military service. The best defense for this country is armament and men trained to man and service our defenses.

Those who oppose the draft use the argument that this country is not in danger of war. We agree with them that no prepared country is in danger of war as long as the prospective enemy knows it is ready for the fray.

However, draft opponents know very well that this country is not prepared to fight a determined enemy and it is doubtful whether we could prepare ourselves in less than 2 years.

If the men and youth have to go to war to defend this country, they should be trained to do the job.

As for the Negro youth, it will help take up some of the slack of the conditions resulting from unemployment and may possibly give them some of the discipline so noticeably lacking among most of today's youth, black and white.

I have many friends among the colored people of Minneapolis, especially in the civic and fraternal groups such as the Elks, the Johnny Baker Post of the American Legion, the N. A. A. C. P., Phyllis Wheatley Settlement House, and others, and have always supported all movements sponsored for the betterment of the colored race, including the antilynching bill and the measure to outlaw the poll tax.

Both are important, but the latter is especially needful at this time when we need to protect and promote real democratic principles. People in the Northern States little realize how menacing this poll-tax system is and how it denies to a vast number of otherwise qualified people the right to exercise their American privilege of casting a ballot.

In some States the amount of poll tax is $2 per year and counties are permitted to levy another $1. A tax of $2 or $3 per year for each voter in a family in the depressed sections of the Nation is a heavy strain on their finances. But that is not the whole story. The tax is cumulative, and back taxes must be paid before they can vote, so it can be seen what a real obstacle to voting the poll tax can be.

But the question today is, What about this editorial? Mr. Newman, publisher of the Spokesman, is a very intelligent person, and no doubt has the support and approval of many of the people to whom his paper goes. I would welcome the comment of as many colored citizens as would care to write me.

Conscription

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BENNETT CHAMP CLARK

OF MISSOURI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 14 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

BROADCAST BY FULTON LEWIS, JR.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, in accordance with the permission granted me today, I offer for printing in the Appendix of the RECORD the address by Fulton Lewis, Jr., over the Mutual Broadcasting System on Tuesday, August 13, 1940.

The address is as follows:

This is Fulton Lewis, Jr., speaking from the studios of WOR in New York City, where I've been trying to check some angles of a very important story, which I'll give to you in a day or so—as soon as I've had a chance to countercheck the checks I made today. Life is like that, unfortunately.

So far as the Washington news is concerned, there still is just one story—the compulsory military-training bill—the so-called draft bill, which is under debate in the Senate.

One of the big stars of the Senate took the floor this afternoon—Senator BURTON K. WHEELER, of Montana. He is one of the most aggressive leaders in the opposition to the draft proposal, and his speech this afternoon really was the first full-length feature, so to speak, of the present battle. Usually Senator WHEELER speaks extemporaneously; in fact, he is considered one of the easiest speakers in the Senate, ordinarily, but to show you how very seriously, how gravely this controversy is being taken in the Senate, he spoke today from a prepared script. It was 55 pages long, and it took 3 hours and 25 minutes to deliver—which was just about the entire afternoon, so far as the Senate was concerned.

Senator WHEELER minced no words. He said that the need for any compulsory military training is not borne out by the facts or by the record. He told the Senate that the Army has an arbitrary idea, that it prefers the conscription method of getting men rather than the system of voluntary enlistments, and he said that the claims that the enlistment method has broken down and has failed to produce the men that the Army needs for training, is a pure sham.

Senator WHEELER said that Congress could double the pay of the Regular Army and get a million men, and the cost would be only a small fraction of the cost of the draft system. He said Army officials have estimated that the draft program will cost a billion dollars a year, which is almost twice as much as the entire annual pay of a million men at twice the wages that are now being paid to Army privates.

Senator WHEELER said the real forces behind this draft bill are the "Wall Street crowd" and the "superpatriots," and he repeated, time after time, the charge that the bill is a major and dangerous step toward American dictatorship. He charged that the Administration leaders are trying to build up the United States the same sort of military domination that has been developed in the dictator nations of Europe.

That same charge was bantered back and forth, time after time, this afternoon, as it was yesterday afternoon.

But under the surface, there wasn't a great deal of heart in the Senate debate today. Attention was fastened too tightly across the water at the terrific "blitzkrieg" that Germany finally seems to have launched against the little islands that are known as Great Britain. Senators seemed to be more interested in the latest bulletins from that dramatic story, than they were in the momentary details of how many men we should have in the Army and how we should get them. And after Senator WHEELER had finished, no one else seemed anxious to take the floor so the gentlemen of the Senate devoted themselves to a few side matters of routine, and adjourned to their radio sets for the rest of the afternoon.

Now about these charges of "dictatorship," that are being thrown around with such apparent carelessness, it occurred to me some days ago that the job of a good reporter would be to pin some of these charges down, trace them back, and find out just what these people mean, when they charge that the New Deal leaders are trying to lead the country into dictatorship. So for some days I've been quietly working on that angle for you. And a large part of the "dictatorship" talk, I find, is based on an incident that was supposed to have happened behind the scenes of the Democratic National Convention in Chicago. Most of these stories trace back to that alleged incident.

It centers around Senator CLAUDE PEPPER, of Florida, who, you know, is a bosom member of the very, very inside group of the New Deal. He is a close confidante of Mr. Tommy Corcoran and Mr. Ben Cohen and Attorney General Bob Jackson and Secretary of Commerce Hopkins, and those are the gentlemen who command the plans and strategies and the purpose and the objectives of the New Deal program.

The story about Chicago is that Senator WALSH, of Massachusetts, and Senator WHEELER, of Montana, objected to certain items which Senator PEPPER wanted in the party platform, and Senator PEPPER said they came from the President, and they said bluntly that what Senator PEPPER proposed to do was to make President Roosevelt a dictator.

(I'm telling you this because factually it's the only way I know of for you to know the real philosophies that are involved in this Senate battle, the background and the meaning of these various points of view. I'm trying to take you behind the scenes a little so that you can have a little more than just words of mud thrown from one side to the other and vice versa.)

The story is that Senator PEPPER replied to that:

"No; I only want to make the President a temporary dictator."

Now, after tracing down that much through a dozen different sources there were many things that could have been done next, but the logical and ethical one seemed to be to go to Senator PEPPER in person and ask him whether the story was true or not, which I did for you yesterday afternoon.

He said he doesn't remember any such incident, although he said he might possibly have made some reference along the line that it is necessary to recognize the difference between a democracy coasting along in peacetime and a democracy that has its back to the wall in a dire and threatening emergency.

I asked Senator PEPPER just what his views are, regardless of whether he said it or not, whether he does believe that the President should be made a temporary dictator.

His reply to that was not an unconditional "yes." In fact, he didn't say "yes" or "no." He said he believes the United States is facing the greatest crisis, the greatest emergency in its entire history, and he believes that if we are serious in wanting to preserve what we have we should give Mr. Roosevelt full and complete wartime powers, whatever the President thinks is necessary to deal with the situation and to pull us through.

Senator PEPPER said that if democracy is to survive in this country, against dictatorship in Europe, it is necessary for us to have a setup with a head that has sufficient power to cope with dictatorship on equal terms.

I asked whether that means that this country would have to give the President the same degree of totalitarian authority that Mr. Hitler has, and once again Senator PEPPER answered provisionally. He said he feels it should be power that is given to the President by Congress for the duration of the present emergency only.

The natural question then was, "Who is to decide when the emergency is over?" And his reply to that was, "Congress shall decide."

He said Congress should come back into session at intervals, and it should have the power to end the emergency or to revoke any part of the President's powers at any time.

I asked whether that would mean that elections in November would be suspended—not held. He said, "No; not under any circumstances. The elections," he said, "should go on." And if Mr. Wendell Willkie wins, Senator PEPPER thinks that these same powers should be continued for Mr. Willkie. He said that he is talking about the President of the United States, not about Mr. Roosevelt, the man. What he wants is one man who has the power to take over the reins of government and direct our defense with complete authority—whether it's the President, or a director of national security, or whatever you may call it.

He said he merely mentioned President Roosevelt because he believes there is no person in the country as well fitted to do the job as Mr. Roosevelt is.

I asked then how far he thinks this temporary power for the President should go, and he said it should go as far as necessary for the President to defend the United States.

He said Congress should outline certain general, broad objectives. It should tell the President, he said, "We want an army that's capable of defending the United States," and from there on, it should be up to the President to decide how large that army should be, how the men should be selected. His job would be to just get it.

Senator PEPPER said the President should have, in his opinion, authority to take over all private industry and all private enterprise and all private endeavor—or any part of it—any of it that has any connection with national defense. I asked whether, as a matter of practical fact, that wouldn't include almost everything in the country—almost all business and industry—and Senator PEPPER conceded quite frankly, "Yes; it would."

Senator PEPPER said he sees no reason why, if Mr. William S. Knudsen and Mr. Ed Stettinius are willing to come to Washington, to direct the National Defense Commission and give their services at a dollar a year, why some other industrial leader should be drawing $2,000,000 a year in salary or profits.

And he said, with particular emphasis, that he sees no reason why Mr. Henry Ford should be allowed to produce what Mr. Henry Ford wants to produce.

I asked him about conscription of labor, whether the President should have the power to draft whatever men he wants, not only for the military service of the Army, but also for work, and Senator PEPPER said he believes the President should have that power. He said there is no reason why soldiers should draw $21 a month, while the worker in some factory is drawing $20 a day.

I asked whether that means that the President would have the power to tell all of the workers, all of the employees in factories and plants all over the country, that they shall go to work in this place, at such and such a wage, or over here at some other wage, regardless of what they were getting as private employees, and he said, "Yes"; he believes the President should have the power to do that.

Now, that seemed to clear up all possible questions of policy and point of view, at least, all I could think of. But in view of the broader angles of the whole picture, the fact that Senator PEPPER, after all, is a recognized member of the very inner circle of the New Deal, it seemed to be important to find out for you whether these were the views of that very inner circle, officially, or Senator PEPPER's own individual views, so I asked the Senator whether these are ideas in which he stands alone. I reminded him of the fact that he is, what he is, in the New Deal family, and asked whether there are other New Deal Senators and other leaders in the administrative branch of the Government, who share those views with him. And Senator PEPPER said, with a moment of hesitation, that a great many of those gentlemen subscribe to these same theories. In fact, he made a flat prediction, he said, "The whole thing is going to come."

Now, getting back to the news—

The President got back to Washington today from his vacation to Hyde Park, N. Y., and his subsequent tour of naval defenses through New England, but he arrived too late to hold his usual Tuesday afternoon news conference, so apparently we will have to wait until Friday, to get any comments he may have on the subject of the draft bill developments, or about the Democratic campaign books, which have been printed and now turn out to be illegal.

The White House said, however, that the President—like everyone else in Washington and throughout the country too, for that matter—is keeping a constant watch on the reports from England.

Motion-Picture Producers Take Heed: Cut Out Vicious Propaganda

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEWIS D. THILL

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 14, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE MILWAUKEE SENTINEL

Mr. THILL. Mr. Speaker, too often have motion pictures been used as vehicles to spread vicious propaganda. Too often have they been used to foster some foreign political doctrine. Too often have they been used to disseminate the theory of intervention in foreign wars. Too often have they been used to enkindle the fires of hate and enmity.

Let the motion-picture producers take heed now before it is too late that the American public deeply resent the preachment of prejudice and the distribution of insidious propaganda. The following editorial from the Milwaukee Sentinel of August 10, 1940, discusses the problem now facing the motion-picture industry:

[From the Milwaukee Sentinel of August 10, 1940]

BAD POLICY—USING THE SCREEN FOR PROPAGANDA

That motion pictures be deliberately employed to further domestic and international political proposals has recently been suggested and recommended by some American producers of films.

This, of course, is a euphemism. In plain language, the proposal means using the screen for propaganda.

It means a miscalculation of the purposes and the strength of the motion picture. It means a radical departure from the sound principles that caused films to be a great art and a great industry.

After all, the first purpose of films is entertainment.

The second purpose, accuracy of information.

The third purpose, education.

There is no place for propaganda in the films. Propaganda not only offends the public but weakens the public respect for and confidence in the screen.

Propaganda is neither entertainment, information, nor education.

It is special pleading for ulterior motives, and that in the end is vitiation of entertainment, distortion of information, and falsity of education.

The screen has teemed with Communist propaganda, war propaganda, and alien propaganda of all kinds. And this has made the films both dull and disagreeable. People would rather stay at home than be bored by propaganda.

Must motion-picture producers go broke before they develop a little American common sense?

If producers cannot conquer the itch for proselyting, if the screen must be made to preach the prejudice of producers, let certain theaters be set apart for propaganda and let the other theaters give the legitimate entertainment the public desires.

What sense is there in wearying theater patrons and irritating the public against all pictures?

Why not stick to the policy which made moving pictures popular when they were popular and give entertainment, information, education—uncolored and undistorted by propaganda?

Defense! The Hurdles Ahead

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CARL HINSHAW

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 14, 1940

ARTICLE BY ROBERT E. GROSS, PRESIDENT, LOCKHEED AIRCRAFT CORPORATION

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following highly important discussion of the obstacles to attaining defense matériel and which offers a program vital to that objective. The article follows:

[From the United States News of August 16, 1940]

DEFENSE: THE HURDLES AHEAD—AIRPLANE MANUFACTURER ANALYZES OBSTACLES AND OFFERS A PROGRAM—NECESSARY STEPS OUTLINED FOR EFFICIENT EXPANSION OF INDUSTRIAL FACILITIES

(By Robert E. Gross, President, Lockheed Aircraft Corporation)

Here are the steps and links in my chain for industrial preparedness—chronologically:

First. A determination of the objective—a definite program—what stuff, how much of it, and when?

Second. An overhauling of procurement methods, including simplification, if not standardization, of specifications.

Third. A survey of existing facilities and determination of how many emergency facilities are needed.

Fourth. A clear, simple plan as to how emergency facilities will be financed—and paid for.

Fifth. Granting of orders for the total number of units in the objective.

Sixth. Enlightenment of employers, employees, and stockholders as to what is needed of them.

Seventh. Industrial and vocational training of all kinds of civilian personnel.

Eighth. Building of floor space and installation of equipment.

WHERE CONTROVERSY ENTERS

Now surely it will be clear to anyone that a lot of these eight steps are obvious and elemental. The three steps that are more subtle, more controversial, and maybe not so visible to the naked eye are these: Simplification of the procurement, paying the expansion bill, and, most of all, training.

Anybody knows that, before we can prepare for any job, we have to know the objective. I believe it would be just about as easy to get out 50,000 planes a year as it would be 40,000 or 60,000, and I imagine it wouldn't make a great deal of difference in the amount of facilities involved whether we build 20,000 tanks or 30,000 tanks.

It may be interesting to mention that, if the experience of the airplane program is typical, the defense industries are just beginning to get some inkling of what the real program is. And assuming that the touch-off to the whole thing occurred with the declaration of war in Europe last September, and the subsequent declaration that a state of emergency existed, it would appear that quite a generous period has elapsed before the objective so necessary for industrial preparedness has been named. Now it is entirely possible that there may exist somewhere on somebody's desk definite quantities of various types of arms and munitions, but I think I can safely say that, up to the last few days, at least, industry generally hasn't known what they were.

Again, I don't see any reason to spend a lot of time here on the subject of industrial surveys. It will be apparent to anyone that they have to be made and that, if we are going to know how much brick and mortar and additional equipment are needed, we have to know what we have to start with. I don't see any particular problem in making an industrial survey. Any one of a half-dozen branches of the Government can do it.

I might say that the floor space area of the aircraft industry in the country today is probably about 15,000,000 square feet, and the plant area necessary to do the job ahead of us, if the objective we are hearing about is the real one, would probably be at least 50,000,000 to 60,000,000 square feet. This does not necessarily mean that every plant in the United States has to be trebled. This would be unfeasible and inadvisable, and, further than that, a number of the plants already are doubling or trebling their floor space. But it is a good indication that substantial increases in facilities are called for.

The first point of need is the overhauling of the method of procurement and the simplification, if not standardization, of specifications. The creation of the National Defense Council by President Roosevelt was a very good thing and in my opinion may do more than any other one thing to save this program from failure, always provided it retains the authority to act and the caliber of the men now on it or others like them. This committee is engaged in industrial preparedness, by conducting surveys, attempting to cut out red tape, settling manufacturing priorities, and generally getting the machine going. But they are up against one terrific obstacle which I fervently hope they may be able to overcome; namely, complicated Government methods of buying and Army and Navy tolerances and specifications.

There may be other businesses where the method of buying is more complicated than the present method of buying an airplane, but, if there is, I don't know what business it is. And the worst of it is that it isn't the Army and Navy men's fault. The United States Army and the United States Navy have some of the clearest-headed and some of the most capable minds, both technical and commercial, that can be found anywhere.

But the American people have been so afraid that some shipbuilding company or some airplane company or some tankbuilding company would make a nickel here and there, or that an Army officer could be sold a bill of goods, or that a piston ring be a ten-thousandths of an inch out of the way somewhere and thus violate a contract, that they have encouraged their Representatives in the Congress to put through legislation governing the procurement of these necessary articles that is really something. I have made the statement time and time again that, if the specifications on Army and Navy contracts could be simplified and the tolerances and inspection limits reasonably relaxed, the cost of airplanes, for one thing, could be reduced at least 10 to 15 percent.

Some of the things we have to do are throwbacks from an antiquated set of procurement methods that don't have any more to do with the articles performing well in wartime than the man in the moon. I am not suggesting for one minute that we should not be turning out first-rate machines. What I am saying is that the difference between making war material that will get there and do its stuff and making war material that will conform 100 percent to these old-fashioned tolerances may be the difference between winning and losing.

What I want is a subcommittee of this National Defense Council to sit down with the Army and the Navy and simplify these specifications, relax these tolerances, and recommend to the Congress procurement legislation that will let us go cross-lots to that objective.

Of all the single things that we can do to get ready for our program of industrial preparedness, the thing that can do most for us is training. From every side comes the avalanche of questions today, "Can we get skilled men to operate the national-defense industries?" In my opinion the answer is, unquestionably, "Yes."

It is all very well to talk about big appropriations and big orders for machinery and bricks and mortar, but, after the national-defense industries have lapped up the apparent supply of top-notch skilled labor, and, in my opinion, they already have, we then have to go out and manufacture the men to manufacture the material. The point I want to make is that we can manufacture the men. We already have the tools to manufacture these men. You have to make just as much of a business of training as you make of building the cannon, the tank, the airplane, or the automobile.

Training can make a first-class aviation metal worker out of good green material in 4 months. Training can make a first-class riveter and metal assembler out of good material in 4 weeks. Training can make a template maker out of a good metal worker in 4 months. Training can make a tool maker out of a good machinist in 6 months. Yes; and I'll go further—training can make something out of everybody.

Permit me to now pass to the last of my three main points for industrial preparedness—the cost of the emergency facilities. Business is entitled to and must have a reasonable formula as to how these hurry-up plant extensions are to be financed and paid for. Now, I well realize that when I, as a manufacturer, start discussing the problem of who is going to pay for these extra plants some of my remarks are bound to be misconstrued. On the other hand, the question of how we are going to get these extra facilities and when is a pretty important cog in the wheel of industrial preparedness, and this is no time for anybody to rock the boat by questioning anybody's motives.

Furthermore, there has been a great deal of publicity in the press which I feel has been confusing to people's thinking. This feeling of unclearness as to where the Government, labor, and industry stand in the national-defense program started with the passage a few weeks ago of what has popularly become known as the Vinson Navy speed-up bill.

The feature of the bill that has come in for big publicity is the profit limitation. Profits are limited to 8 percent in competitive-bidding procedure and to 7 percent provided the work is done on a fixed-fee or modified cost-plus scheme. A good deal of the publicity has seemed to make it appear that industry is fighting the profit-limitation feature of the bill, and that in spite of what the companies say about how patriotic they are all they are really interested in is getting this profit-limitation feature knocked out. This just simply is not true.

Here are the facts. In the first place, we of the aircraft companies have nearly always worked under some form of profit limitation and have become quite accustomed to so doing. The shipbuilding companies also have had some experience with this procedure. While it has never been quite clear to us why our businesses should be subject to these restrictions when other businesses are not, still we have been willing to go along and do the best we could.

Now, when it comes down to a question of whether you get a fixed fee of 7 percent or 8 percent for competitive bidding, naturally everybody will choose to work on the fee basis because the theory, at least of the cost-plus basis, is that you get at least your cost, whereas under competitive bidding you may not. So it finally simmers down to a problem of what is cost and what is fee—but, most important, what is cost. The authors of this legislation may have had the best intentions in the world and may have felt that in talking about cost they were being entirely definite. As a matter of fact, cost is one of the most indefinite words in the book.

Now, if you are going to have to make emergency preparations to get emergency production for an emergency order, and nobody can in good faith show you that you are going to have need for these emergency facilities after the order is completed, aren't the emergency facilities a part of your cost? Is not the special machinery you are going to have to buy and have no use for after the order is over, and is not the special building you are going to have to build and have no use for after the order is over, just as much a part of the cost as the materials and the overhead that you have no use for either after the order is over?

If you are going to be allowed a fee of 7 percent on top of your cost, it seems only fair that you should get the 7-percent fee based on your real costs, not 60 percent of your cost or 70 percent of your cost or 90 percent of your cost. You should get your fee on your true cost, which must contain all the items that are involved in designing, building, and selling the article. This is the only place where the aircraft companies have any issue to discuss with the Government.

CHANGES IN COST REGULATIONS

And this is because the present regulations of the United States Treasury, whose rulings finally determine what one can and what one cannot include as cost, do not at present allow industry to include as cost items the cost of these extra facilities. If the present regulations of the United States Treasury, as applied to the present Vinson Navy speed-up bill, were left just as they are, industry could not undertake the production program which the Government wants without having to carry the excess plants after the orders that caused them have run out. This is unsound for the people, unsound for the Government, unsound for labor, and unsound for business. Industry and the Treasury are cooperating to make these changes, for industrial preparedness cannot come without them.

But, in the broadest sense, the thing that industry needs most is a clear statement on the part of Government as to what is wanted—the throttle or the brake. We must have one or the other, but not both at the same time. With no comment on whether the control that has been placed over business these past years has been called for or not, the facts remain that for the past 10 years business has had the brakes put on it. Now all of a sudden, and without any gradual acceleration or training period, the sky is the limit and this same industry that has been living a life of restraint is expected to rise to the occasion, go wide open, and go wide open right now.

You don't run any machine that has to make speed and cover ground with the throttle and the brake on at the same time. Somebody has to answer that question for industry. We'd better close the throttle, put on the brakes, and stop the machine right here, or take off the brakes, open the throttle, and go places.

Industrial preparedness in this and any country sincerely dedicated to that principle must be paid for by everyone, and with work and sacrifices, not by exceptionalism and aloofness and gains.

There will not be enough industrial preparedness to go 'round and cover the ground if any one branch of our national life holds out for special favors. Sacrifice, not gain; sharing, not shelving; realism, not romance—the throttle, not the brake.

HON. HARRY N. ROUTZOHN
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 14, 1940

LETTER FROM WILLIAM GREEN

Mr. ROUTZOHN. Mr. Speaker, 1 year ago this month the committee appointed by you to investigate the National Labor Relations Board organized and selected a staff of assistants to whom was committed the details of the investigation, the selection and production of the evidence, the examination of the witnesses, and so forth.

As chief counsel to the committee, Edmund M. Toland was placed in complete charge of the staff personnel and investigation work, and, with due regard for his able corps of assistants, to him belongs the credit for an investigation that has been universally recognized as eminently satisfactory and praiseworthy.

Mr. Toland came to us with an enviable reputation as a lawyer. In his work with the committee he not only confirmed all that but he established himself with us as a man worthy of the highest respect whose love of country and devotion to duty transcend consideration of personal comfort, health, welfare, or happiness. It would be a godsend to this Nation of ours to have many others like him in the service of the public.

His great legal ability, his self-sacrifice, his indefatigable endeavors, his forthrightness, have not been entirely unnoticed, and it is with pleasure I insert herein as part of my remarks the following letter from William Green, President of the American Federation of Labor.

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR,
Washington, D. C., August 2, 1940.

Mr. EDMUND M. TOLAND,
Investment Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. TOLAND: The officers of the American Federation of Labor followed your work as chief counsel of the Smith congressional committee with very deep interest.

Now that the work of the Smith committee is nearing completion, I feel justified in writing you commending you most highly upon the skillful, judicious, and successful way in which you presented facts and data relating to the administration of the National Labor Relations Act to the committee for information and consideration. You measured up to the standards set by your friends and to the highest requirements of all your duties as chief counsel for the committee.

The facts and information which were made public by the committee enable all classes of people to know and understand how the National Labor Relations Board had failed in the administration of important social justice legislation. I commend you highly upon the work you performed as chief counsel of the committee. You rendered a great public service.

I express to you the deep appreciation of the officers and members of the American Federation of Labor for the broad, constructive, and expert way in which you discharged your great responsibilities and performed your difficult duties.

Very sincerely yours,

W. GREEN,
President, American Federation of Labor.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HARRY S. TRUMAN
OF MISSOURI
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, August 15 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

LETTER FROM ASSOCIATION OF AMERICAN RAILROADS

Mr. TRUMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter from Judge R. V. Fletcher, vice president and general counsel of the Association of American Railroads, in reply to a charge made by the Mississippi River Carriers Association that the Panama Canal Act would be repealed by the conference report on Senate bill 2009. The letter is a learned statement of fact on what is actually contained in the conference report. The letter is addressed to the conferees on the part of the Senate—the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. DONAHEY], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. REED], and myself.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ASSOCIATION OF AMERICAN RAILROADS,
LAW DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., August 14, 1940.

The Honorable BURTON K. WHEELER,
Chairman, Committee on Interstate Commerce, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.
The Honorable HARRY S. TRUMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.
The Honorable VIC DONAHEY,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.
The Honorable CLYDE M. REED,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: I am addressing this letter to you in your capacity as managers on the part of the Senate signing the conference report on S. 2009, which conference report was adopted by the House of Representatives on August 12, 1940. I am moved to write this letter by reason of a release which has come to my attention, bearing date of August 12, 1940, issued by the Mississippi River Carriers Association, in which release appears this extraordinary statement:

"Water-carrier transportation, and the economies and benefits it provides the public were struck a death blow today with the passage by the House of the Wheeler-Lea transportation bill, containing a hidden provision repealing the paragraph in the Panama Canal Act which prohibits railroads from owning and operating competing water carriers, etc."

This curious misapprehension of the effect of S. 2009 seems to have been shared by certain Members of Congress who participated in the debate in the House of Representatives when the conference report was before that body on August 12. It was stated during the course of that debate by certain Members of Congress opposing the legislation that the bill as presented by the conferees—

"Repeals paragraphs in the Panama Canal Act designed to protect the public against a monopoly of transportation by the railroads. * * * In the second conference report the prohibition against acquiring water carriers on the inland waterways and the Great Lakes has been repealed. * * * The repeal of the Panama Canal Act will give to the railroads the same power and authority that they had to acquire water carriers prior to the adoption of the Panama Canal Act."

The inference to be drawn from statements of this character would be that the conference report weakens, if it does not destroy, the effect of the Panama Canal Act, which limits and restricts authority of the railroads to engage in water transportation. I call your attention to the fact, however, that careful examination of the text of the conference report and a comparison of that text with the present law must produce the conviction that the conference report does not change the law in any particular. Such an examination justifies the statement made by the Honorable CLARENCE F. LEA in the House during the course of the House debate, that the conferees have done no more than to clarify the meaning of the law as it is written and as it has been for many years interpreted by the Interstate Commerce Commission, an interpretation which has been generally accepted by all concerned.

The Panama Canal Act, so-called, is contained in paragraphs (19), (20), and (21) of section 5 of the Interstate Commerce Act. In the conference report the subject is dealt with in paragraphs (14), (15).

and (16) of section 7, which section 7 is, in fact, an amendment to section 5 of the present act. In the conference report the paragraphs to be examined are found on pages 13 and 14 of the printed report.

Comparing paragraph (14) of the conference report with paragraph (19) of the present law, it will be found that the two paragraphs are almost identical in meaning. The only real difference is that in the conference report the railroads are more restricted than under the present law in that the conference report language not only prohibits rail carriers from owning, leasing, operating, controlling, or having interest in common carriers by water but the restrictions extend also to "any person controlling, controlled by, or under common control with" a rail carrier. This change was obviously made to conform the legislation to recent investigations and recent legislation bringing under the authority of the Commission persons who control or are controlled by common carriers.

In examining paragraph (14) it will be found that the prohibition extends to the ownership, operation, lease, or control of "any common carrier by water operated through the Panama Canal or elsewhere with which such carrier aforesaid does or may compete for traffic." The prohibition is broad enough so that it applies to all traffic moving by water, whether it be the Panama Canal, the Great Lakes, the inland waterways, or the coastwise service. No language could be broader than the simple phrase "or elsewhere." This is the same expression that occurs in the present law. It cannot be said, therefore, that the provisions of the Panama Canal Act as brought forward in the conference report are more liberal to the railroads than the provisions in the act which is amended.

With respect to operations not moving through the Panama Canal, it has always been the law that the Commission has jurisdiction to determine questions of fact as to competition and by paragraph (20) of the present law, it is provided that application may be made to the Commission to determine whether any existing service is in violation of the section and an order may be asked for to permit the continuance of any vessel or vessels already in operation "or for the purpose of asking an order to install new service not in conflict with the provisions of this paragraph." (Emphasis supplied.) It will be seen that under paragraph (20) the Commission has the authority to pass upon applications for exemption, not only with respect to existing service but to new service as well.

An examination of paragraph (15) of the conference report shows that the language of the present paragraph (20) is reproduced in substance and by no possible exercise of ingenuity can the language of the conference report, paragraph (15), be considered as having any different meaning from the language of paragraph (20) of the present law. The language has been shortened, simplified, and clarified by reference to paragraph (14) in one case and by reference to paragraph (16) in the other case, but the meaning is obviously the same.

The difficulty, if it can be said to exist, grows out of the adoption by the conferees of paragraph (16), which corresponds in reality though not in form to paragraph (21) of the present law. Early in the administration of the Panama Canal Act, the Commission was called upon to deal with the question of whether it had authority to authorize new service to the same extent that it might authorize the continuance of existing service. By examining paragraph (21) of the present law, it will be seen that the Commission is authorized clearly, in the case of existing service, to permit its continuance, if such continuance is found to be of advantage to the convenience and commerce of the people and if it be found that the extension of existing service will neither exclude, prevent, nor reduce competition.

The question debated before the Commission was whether, if a railroad undertakes to establish a new service by water, the Commission had authority to allow such service, if it found that public convenience and interest would be thus promoted and if it found further that competition would not thereby be excluded, prevented, or reduced. It was argued by those who opposed the contention of the railroads that in the case of new service, the Commission was limited to an inquiry as to whether the service would be competitive with existing service and was precluded from taking into consideration the public interest or the public convenience. This question was put to rest by a decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission in Southern Pacific Co. Ownership of Atlantic Steamship Lines (77 I. C. C. 124), decided in January 1923. It was there said, in discussing the question as to the authority of the Commission to pass upon new service:

"These companies contend that the applicant seeks authority to install a new service, and that the paragraph of the act which provides that we may extend the time during which service by water may be continued if such service is operated in the interest of the public and is of advantage to the convenience and commerce of the people, does not grant authority to install a new service. It is therefore urged that if we find that the proposed service is a new service and that in that service the applicant does or may compete with the all-rail routes in which applicant participates, the application must be denied, whether in the interest of the public or not.

"In construing a statute it is not proper to confine attention to particular words, paragraphs, or sections. The fundamental rule is to ascertain and give effect to the intention of the legislature as gathered from the language of the whole statute. The Panama Canal amendment to section 5 of the Interstate Commerce Act is part of a public statute, and passed in the public interest. It had been found that the ownership and operation of boat lines by rail lines had retarded and stifled competition on routes by water in the interest of the rail lines, and it was to prevent this evil and permit the development of water-borne commerce in the interest of the public that the amendment was passed. The section provides that applications may be 'filed for the purpose of determining whether any existing service is in violation of this section, and pray for an order permitting the continuance of any vessel or vessels already in operation, or for the purpose of asking an order to install new service not in conflict with the provisions of this paragraph.' The word 'paragraph' clearly does not refer to that in which it is used, because this paragraph contains no prohibitions. The word 'paragraph' in an act of Congress will be construed to mean 'section' whenever to do so accords with the legislative intent. Marine, Collector v. Packham (52 Fed., 579); Alfrey v. Colbert (168 Fed., 231). No order is necessary unless competition does or may exist, and considering the whole section, using the word paragraph to mean section, the intention of the act must be to permit the installation of new operations which are found to be in the public interest; otherwise the language used has no application. The same consideration of advantage to the convenience and commerce of the people which applies to the continuance of an existing service would have equal application to the installation of a new service, and it does not appear that it was the intention of the Congress to permit the continuance of an existing line, but to prohibit the further development of service when traffic offering warrants and it is in the interest of the public. We have authorized the installation of new service in Ashtabula-Port Maitland Car Ferry Service, 40 I. C. C., 143, and Central Vermont Boat Lines, 4 I. C. C., 589."

This is not an isolated case. It has been referred to with approval and made the basis of decision in many subsequent cases. Thus, in Southern Pacific Company Steamboats on Sacramento River (102 I. C. C. 658), decided in October 1925, the Commission authorized the extension of operation by the petitioner of its boat line in freight service to and from public docks, wharves, and piers in the Alameda, Oakland, and Berkeley district, on the east side of San Francisco Bay. This extension was authorized because it was found to be in the public interest and of advantage to the convenience and commerce of the people and for the further reason that it would neither exclude, prevent, nor reduce competition on the route by water on the Sacramento River.

In Steamer Lines on Long Island Sound (183 I. C. C. 323), decided in April 1932, the Commission had before it an application of the New Haven Railroad to continue operation of the Providence Line, a steamship line. The Director General of Railroads had suspended the service and the railroad company undertook to restore the service after the roads had been returned to their owners. The Commission, permitting this to be done, used this language:

"Further, if the service in question were regarded as a new one, we have construed the act as giving us authority to permit the development by rail carriers of services by water when traffic conditions warrant and it is found to be in the public interest. Southern Pacific Co. Ownership of Atlantic S. S. Lines (77 I. C. C. 124)."

In New Orleans and Havana Car Ferry Service (188 I. C. C. 371), decided in October 1932, there was involved an application for permission to operate a car-ferry service between New Orleans, La., and Habana. This was a new service. The Commission granted the application and in doing so said:

"Under authority conferred by section 5 of the act, this Commission in the past has authorized the Southern Pacific Co. to provide new and additional steamship service for the transportation of traffic between certain Gulf and North Atlantic ports (S. P. Co. Ownership of Atlantic Steamship Lines (77 I. C. C. 124, 137)); has authorized the Michigan Central Railroad Co. to institute through a subsidiary company a new car-ferry service for the transportation of foreign commerce between a port in Ohio on the south bank of Lake Erie and a port in Ontario, Canada, on the north bank of this lake (Ashtabula-Port Maitland Car Ferry Service (40 I. C. C. 143)); and has authorized the Central Vermont Railway Co. to install a new service by vessel between New York, N. Y., and Providence, R. I. (Central Vermont Boat Lines (40 I. C. C. 589))."

In Southern Pacific Company's Ownership of Atlantic Steamship Lines (206 I. C. C. 427), decided in February 1935, the Commission had under consideration the petition of the Southern Pacific Co. asking permission to operate the Atlantic Steamship Lines in regular service between Hampton Roads and Houston, Tex. This would be, to a certain extent, a new water service. The Commission said, in passing upon the application:

"Interveners opposing the granting of the application contend that we are without authority to grant an application under section 5 where a new service is involved. This question was considered and disposed of in 77 I. C. C. 124, in the following language:

" 'The same consideration of advantage to the convenience and commerce of the people which applies to the continuance of an existing service would have equal application to the installation of a new service, and it does not appear that it was the intention of Congress to permit the continuance of an existing line, but to prohibit the further development of service when traffic offering warrants and it is in the interest of the public. We have authorized the installation of new service in Ashtabula-Port Maitland Car Ferry Service (40 I. C. C. 143) and Central Vermont Boat Lines (40 I. C. C. 589).' "

It will thus be seen that it is thoroughly established that the Commission's authority with respect to new service is identical with its authority with respect to existing service.

Bearing this principle in mind, we come to consider paragraph 16 of the conference report. All this paragraph does is to give statutory sanction to the construction placed upon the present law by the Interstate Commerce Commission in a long line of decisions, some of which are cited above, which construction has never been questioned in the courts and has become so well established that no one now doubts its validity. Paragraph 16 merely sets up the machinery whereby the Interstate Commerce Commission may authorize the continuance of service or the establishment of new service, other than through the Panama Canal, in cases where the interest of the public requires such extension of service or new service, and where the effect will not be to exclude, prevent, or reduce competition on the route by water.

It will be noted that in paragraph 20 of the present law, rail carriers are authorized to make application for the extension of service. This right is transferred in the revision to paragraph (16) and it is further therein provided that the same proceedings and the same principles shall control applications for the institution of new service.

This is the whole story, and certainly the statement made by those who were advocating the legislation in the House, to the effect that the only purpose was to clarify the present law, is entirely justified.

I am taking the liberty of sending a copy of this letter to the chairman of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, by whom the matter was discussed in the House debate.

Very truly yours,

R. V. FLETCHER.

National Defense

OF

HON. ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 15 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ADDRESS BY ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG, OF MICHIGAN

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address which I delivered in Lansing, Mich., last night dealing with three fundamental phases of national defense.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It is highly appropriate that my first address in this campaign of 1940 should be under the auspices of the stalwart Republican Servicemen's League of Michigan, because a buck private, who fought has way to a commission on the field of World War battle, is about to become President of the United States. Wendell Willkie will be the first member of the A. E. F. to take possession of the White House. He will still be following the flag and stepping to the music of the Republic. He will still be a soldier fighting for the free institutions of America. His victory will be a victory for the American way of life and government. I salute the servicemen; and regardless of party, because Republicans, Democrats, and independents alike are joining in this crusade, I congratulate them that one of their own is on his way to the highest place of power and responsibility in the whole world.

In the midst of great national emergency, politics must be subordinated to the national welfare. Some of our critical problems must rise wholly above politics. But in a national election year, when the Constitution requires the American people to decide their own destiny, there are other questions which can be settled nowhere else except in the political forum; and the greater the emergency, the greater the need for courageous candor. As General Pershing recently said: "We must have the strength of character to face the truth." In connection with these problems, it is the worst kind of self-serving political prostitution to argue that the emergency robs us of the right of free speech and free discussion. It is superpolitics to attempt to ban politics. Certainly it would be utterly sinister politics to blind the American people to their problems at home just because they confront problems abroad. I propose to speak in complete disregard of politics as respects national defense. But I also propose to speak, respecting other problems, with entire frankness regarding my deep conviction that the New Deal and its dynastic chief must be defeated at next November's polls for the sake of safety, sanity, and solvency in Washington. This is "the last round-up."

I know it is difficult to draw the dividing line to which I have referred. It is unfortunate that the need to draw it exists. The need and the difficulty would have been greatly minimized if a totalitarian convention at Chicago had not confronted the country with the menace of a totalitarian third-term Presidency, which would violate every republican tradition of our Jeffersonian democracy. They precipitated this issue, not I. It would be absurd to defend against the encroachments of dictatorship from abroad and to ignore its sinister germs at home. It would be suicidal folly to lift our eyes exclusively to Europe and Asia and to neglect the desperate plight of America at home. Our citizenship must discriminate, as I intend to do, between defense support of our Commander in Chief, whoever he may be, and political support of an administration which deserves repudiation. The dividing line must be drawn.

Because I am speaking primarily tonight to servicemen, who have earned a particular right to an interest in the national defense, I deal first with this subject which, I repeat, is wholly separate and distinct from politics. Interwoven with it is the whole question of foreign policy. The best proof I can give you of my own political disinterestedness is the fact that, with possibly one inconsequential exception, I have supported every national-defense appropriation which has been sought by the Army or the Navy during the last 7 years. Let me set down my own convictions upon this score in a few simple, unequivocal sentences.

I believe in a completely adequate national defense on land and sea, including a two-ocean navy, so that we shall be invincible against external attack, and I want whatever equipment and whatever personnel is necessary to this end. I regret that the $8,500,000,000 which we have spent upon this objective during the last 10 years—always with the assurance from our Army and Navy chiefs that we were getting adequate defense—has miserably failed to produce these promised aims. I regret that we shall not have total equipment for an army of even 750,000 men until 1942. I regret that we shall not complete our grand battle fleet until 1947. But these are typical facts which we dare not ignore in charting our course and determining just how provocative it shall be. Meanwhile, however, I glory in the refreshing fact that defense procurement at last is largely in the hands of a vigorous and competent civilian who hails from the State of Michigan; and if he can have the freedom he deserves I know that we shall move full speed ahead under the dynamic genius of William S. Knudsen, whom we are proud to claim as our fellow citizen.

I believe that our national interest includes defense of the Monroe Doctrine—with particular reference to Canada and the Caribbean and Panama zones, but elsewhere in common and reciprocal partnership with those major South American nations which have reached autonomous maturity. Meanwhile I specifically decline to ignore that significant portion of the Monroe Doctrine, as enunciated on December 2, 1823, which says, "In the wars of European powers in matters relating to themselves we have never taken any part, nor does it comport with our policy to do so. * * * Our policy in regard to Europe remains the same, which is not to interfere in the internal concerns of any of its powers." In a word, I decline to mix either national defense or the Monroe Doctrine with the power politics of the Old World.

But the European problem confronts us with a condition, not a theory. Having abandoned strict neutrality last fall, but with a universally acclaimed purpose to stop short of war, I believe we must consistently pursue the resultant course. It is wholly clear that the overwhelming conscience of the Nation—and this certainly includes my own—condemns the ruthless conquest of the dictators, prays for the restoration of independence to their throttled victims, and wants every legitimate facility—consistent with our own needs and obligations—placed at the disposal of those with whom we sympathize. It is wholly clear that the subjugation of the British Empire would seriously intensify our own sense of jeopardy, and hence our defense problem. Therefore it is wholly logical that our facilities should be particularly available to England at the moment insofar as our international engagements, our own avowed purpose to keep out of war abroad, and our own defense necessities will permit. I would act accordingly. And we are doing so to a little understood extent. For example, we shall make nearly as many planes for Britain in the next 12 months as we make for ourselves. But I would never violate our own international engagements—no matter what others may do—because we could thus find ourselves thrust into the status of a cobelligerent despite our own wishes to the contrary; and I would never deplete our own essential national defense for the sake of indecisive contribution to the defense of someone else.

Let me give you an example of the perplexities involved in this latter contemplation, just as a reminder that we must all take prudent care to think things through. General Pershing recently suggested our transfer of certain naval destroyers to Great Britain on the persuasive theory that what now helps Britain helps us. But under our own signature to the Hague Convention we would thus immediately accept the status of belligerent and invite the consequences. Meanwhile, in the most recent testimony of our own Navy Department last June, Acting Secretary of the Navy Compton, speaking for himself and Admiral Stark, said that if they were asked to dispose of any of our destroyers, "our answer would be 'No'; we would definitely recommend against it" in the name of our own defense necessities.

We have accepted a dominant trusteeship for the preservation of democracy in this New World; and—prudently assessing our own defense deficiencies in behalf of this supreme cause—we owe every obligation, transcending all else, to the impregnability of our frontiers which are the God-given Atlantic and Pacific Oceans. I quote the greatest defense expert in America, Maj. George Fielding Eliot:

"It is this final and terrible responsibility which we must ever keep before our minds, and before which our spirits must do homage. In this we cannot, we must not fail. That we should maintain here in this continent the undefiled altars of liberty and justice and human decency may well, when all is said and done, be the greatest service we can render to humanity—to generations of human beings yet unborn. That we should do this must be the ultimate hope not only of all our own people but of all who cherish freedom anywhere in the world."

I do not believe that our participation in these foreign wars is inevitable—provided our foreign policies pursue a rational, realistic course. I hate every principle of conquest and every precept of dictatorship which blacken so much of the world's sky. But, so far as I am concerned, I propose that America shall survive no matter who wins in Europe or in Asia. If it ultimately takes a fight—which is to say, if we are attacked—we shall go in with every triumphant resource which this great people can command. I would prepare invinsibly against this exigency. But I would not precipitate the battle I would have national defense mean defense and nothing else.

As regards peacetime conscription—which would tear up 150 years of American history and tradition—I would reluctantly embrace it whenever voluntary enlistments show the slightest sign of failing to produce the full defense personnel essential to man our expanding defense equipment. But I stand with National Commander Raymond J. Kelly, of the American Legion—another honored son of Michigan—when he says that it "should not be put into effect until all other avenues have been exhausted." All other avenues have not yet been remotely exhausted. The Army and the Navy have thus far filled every quota they have set for themselves in respect to voluntary enlistments. There is no proof that continued reliance upon this traditional, peacetime American method will fail. Neighboring Canada does not resort to conscription until October 1—one full year after actual entry into this war—and even then it will be only for 30 days of intensive training and for home defense alone. I warn you to assess the direction as well as the present length of this step. Peacetime conscription of men will be followed—sooner rather than later—by the peacetime conscription of other things. The latter is no more sacred than the former. When once we set our feet upon the highways of total regimentation, there is no end short of the wholly regimented state. I will consent to that step if and when it is necessary. I shall not do so as a first, instead of a last resort.

Conscientious men keenly differ upon many of these subjects. I plead for one thing above all else. For God's sake, let us keep our heads. For the sake of America we dare not think with our emotions. Facts and realities must govern. If you were to read some of my mail—which, by the way, runs as much as 5,000 letters a day—you would think that every proconscriptionist and every believer in helping the British Empire is a "fifth columnist" for King George. If you were to read some other sections of my mail, you would think that every anticonscriptionist and every so-called isolationist is a "fifth columnist" for Hitler. These things simply are not so. There are patriots on every side of these arguments. Let us, as reasonable men and women, avoid recriminations and depend on logic. Let us, so far as we can, avoid hysteria—and this includes the hysteria of fear. We are not at war. There is no inevitability that we must go to war, particularly if we avoid policies and explosive rhetoric in high places which needlessly invite it. Let us pursue preparedness with sure, swift effort, lest we face the contingency of challenge in spite of our purpose to keep out of other peoples' wars. Let us clear the track of all truly subversive elements within our own land. Those who are not for us are against us, and the quicker we make this effective separation the safer we shall be. But let us not violate civil liberty in the zeal of our purported defense of it. Let us not sacrifice America in the name of its protection. Let us not drift into war on tides which only wishful thinking can fail to recognize for what they are. Let us move forward as one irresistible unit in preparing to defend ourselves and our freedoms and our ideals; and let that preparation be shorn of all the bureaucracy and all the barnacles which still cause it too frequently to "bog" down. Let us dedicate these facilities to the defense of America and its essential outposts, and nothing else. We do not want war; we must not seek it, and we must not flirt with it.

All of these considerations are nonpolitical. But even these cease to be nonpolitical when, in a national-election year, we face the insinuating pretense that any one Executive is indispensable to their high management. This theory of one man's indispensability may be satisfactory to Hitler or to Mussolini or to Stalin; but it is not the philosophy of our democracy. And if it shall be urged—as it is by our political opponents—that President Roosevelt is indispensable to national defense in this emergency, we have the right to reply that since national defense today is 90 percent a matter of streamlined, industrial efficiency, the national defense will be in at least equally safe hands when President Willkie dedicates his great and proven industrial genius to this heavy task. We have the right to reply that the Roosevelt administration itself confirms our faith in a great business leader for these critical assignments when it commendably summons other business leaders from the "dog house" which they have occupied for seven long, lean, outlaw years to salvage its defense responsibilities.

This leads me to some of the other issues which not only impend for American answer but which cannot wait longer for the right answer if the American system shall survive. They are issues which must be answered in the forum of politics because there is no other way in which democracy can function. Make no mistake about this: We need plenty of national defense against other jeopardies than those which gather across the seas. I shall speak of two of them tonight—defense against self-perpetuating Presidents, defense against national bankruptcy. Both considerations are vital. We shall ignore them at our peril. America needs plenty of saving right here at home; and no amount of emphasis upon international emergency should be allowed to blind our people or warp their judgments in respect to the national emergency which hangs upon next November's referendum.

The President himself has precipitated the first of these national emergencies. Having gathered unto himself—thanks to a rubber-stamp Congress—more unrestricted personal authority than was ever lodged in the White House under all of his peacetime predecessors combined, he proceeded to Chicago last month and nominated himself for a third term, in contemptuous defiance of precious American tradition, in a final display of unquenchable appetite for power, and in a potential American paraphrase of the dictatorship which is the proven curse of free institutions all round the globe. He said he did not want the job. But he cunningly created a situation which made the job inevitable. One of his friendliest columnists who heretofore has sung his deserts—and he has great deserts—in season and out, Raymond Clapper, was moved to observe:

"The urge to power and glory is an overwhelming thing when it takes hold of a public man. Only such an urge could have betrayed Mr. Roosevelt into the monumental and historic deception which he now places on the record. That is a page I would rather have never read."

Well, it may have betrayed the President. It may have betrayed the Chicago convention. But it will never betray the American people next November unless they themselves betray the very well-springs of their own free institutions. I care not how nobly meditated may be his aspirations, I care not how unselfish he believes his motives—and I am sure that Mr. Roosevelt deeply loves his country—the cold, hard fact remains that any man who seeks to perpetuate himself in a Presidential tenure prolonged beyond 8 years has established a practice and a precedent which threaten the very soul of our free, American system. If it would have been a betrayal of that system in preblitzkrieg days, it would be an infinitely greater betrayal at the present moment when the vivid dangers of one-man power are the world's despair and when our own Executive authority already heavily trespasses upon the Constitution's indispensable checks and balances which guard our liberties.

We dare not forget that this President is the one who sought to bend Congress to his unquestioned will. We dare not forget that this President has sought to chain the courts to his Executive chariot wheel. We dare not forget that this President has sought to purge—did you ever read that word in European dispatches?—has sought to purge any of his own partisans who may have dared to question his Executive omnipotence. We dare not forget that this President has sought his own ends "regardless of their constitutionality"—his phrase. Such a President, with such a conception of imperial Executive authority, should be the last rather than the first to be trusted with a further, unprecedented monopoly of Executive authority. Why? Let Thomas Jefferson, the honored father of the Democratic Party, reply. Declining the invitation of the North Carolina General Assembly to stand for a third term, he said in 1808:

"That I should lay down my charge at a proper period is as much a duty as to have borne it faithfully. If some termination to the services of the Chief Magistrate be not fixed by the Constitution, or supplied by practice, his office, nominally for years, will in fact become for life. History shows how easily that degenerates into an inheritance. Believing that a representative government responsible at short periods of election is that which produces the greatest sum of human happiness to mankind, I feel it a duty to do no act which shall essentially impair that principle; and I should unwillingly be the person who, disregarding the sound precedent set by an illustrious predecessor, should furnish the first example of prolongation beyond the second term of office."

No wonder so many Democrats—I mean Jeffersonian Democrats—are swarming from the third termites. There has not been such a significant bolt in modern times. There are some things that transcend partisan allegiance—and one of them is the American axiom that a perpetuated Presidency is poison to our free institutions. If a third term, why not a fourth or fifth? Not even George Washington thought himself good enough—or indispensable enough—to stay in the White House beyond 8 years. Yes; and when he slammed shut the door upon a third term, he slammed it shut for keeps, because Americans will not desert their birthright.

No wonder that Democratic Senator BURKE—who once got a Roosevelt prize for the best definition of the New Deal—now says:

"I disclaim the leadership of those of my party who but a few years ago put themselves on record"—(and that was against a third term for inoffensive Calvin Coolidge who lacked the remotest elements of a Jupiter complex)—"put themselves on record that any departure from the two-term tradition would be unwise, unpatriotic, and fraught with peril to our free institutions, and who today take the very action they then denounced. A fitting rebuke to their apostasy will be administered by an aroused people."

The instrument of that rebuke will be Wendell Willkie. His flaming personality, his record of high achievement in getting hard things done, his conception of free enterprise in this still-free Republic, these things captured the imagination of the Republican Convention at Philadelphia—as I have good reason to know. They have captured the imagination and the confidence of the American people; and next November they will capture their votes. We have a new President of the United States "on order."

But if you say that this third-term consideration is an academic thing—although I believe it to be basic in the American order—then let me come to the other issue to which I have referred in terms of necessity for "national defense"—defense against national bankruptcy. Here indeed is grim reality. It touches every purse-string and every hearthstone in the land. It is like the law of two and two—whether you like it or not, there it is. I am not talking merely about 7 weary years of improvident deficit-spending in which more easy money has rolled out of the Federal Treasury than in all the years from Washington to Wilson, including the World War. (And, by the way, he promised to "keep us out of war," too.) I am not talking merely about the waste and the extravagance and the political exploitation of public money during this bonanza era. I am not talking merely of the fact that you pay the heaviest peacetime taxes in our national history and yet, in spite of it, that you carry the heaviest public debt. I am not talking merely of yesterday. I am talking about today and tomorrow. The hour of reckoning has arrived. Now we must pay the fiddler. The Christmas tree is dead. There "ain't no Santa Claus." The New Deal made this bed and now we must lie in it. Where do we go from here? Listen!

We shall reach the national debt limit of $45,000,000,000 this winter. We shall exhaust the additional national-defense debt limit of $4,000,000,000 more next summer. But meanwhile the operating deficit for the present fiscal year will be not less than $8,000,000,000. The regular deficit will be around $3,000,000,000. The defense deficit will be another $5,000,000,000. And we will have just started on the defense program which already includes $15,000,000,000 of authorizations without a penny for mobilizing the National Guard or a penny for the proposed conscript army.

Now, look at the revenue side. We wrote an extra tax bill a few weeks ago. It exhausted the imagination of the Treasury in hunting for things to assess. We piled on pretty nearly everything that anybody could think of. It will produce just $700,000,000 in this fiscal year—about one-fourth of the regular deficit, without a penny for national defense. And yet they have the crust to call it a national-defense tax. Now, we are engaged in writing another tax bill—an excess-profits tax bill. It will produce $190,000,000 this fiscal year.

When we are through with this latest tax bill, we will have raised less than 900,000,000 extra dollars. This year's deficit will be $8,000,000,000. We shall pay less than one-eighth of the deficit. Next year's deficit will be still bigger because we shall then be in full swing with the defense program. Where does all this end? How long does any sane man think it can go on? It ends either in national bankruptcy or in national repudiation of debt or in the suicidal issuance of manufactured money unless—

Unless we ruthlessly tax the people of the United States to the point of confiscation or unless we so substantially increase the annual national income that these tax rates will produce a greatly increased revenue. And there, in this latter alternative, is the only hope of solvent American survival.

We can help some with long-overdue economies in ordinary functions. We can help some in stopping extravagant capital investment of public money in socialistic enterprises. We can help some in depopulating the political pay rolls which have nearly doubled in 7 years of spoilsmanship. But in the long run, our only salvation will be to restore the American people to an annual income which can carry this load—not merely the load of national defense, mind you, but also the heavy accumulated load of 7 improvident years of deliberate, Roosevelt deficits and debts.

We now have an annual income around seventy billions. We need a national income around one hundred billions. The New Deal tries to make a $100,000,000,000 country out of a $70,000,000,000 country by spending the difference. It hasn't worked. It won't work. It is tragic Pollyanna nonsense. There is just one way to make a $100,000,000,000 country out of a $70,000,000,000 country, and that one way is to once more release all of the private enterprise, and all of the individual initiative, and all of the private investment which are the blood stream of the American system. At the base of this release is the restoration of confidence—confidence that legitimate business shall have a full, free chance—confidence that the Government will quit harassing business needlessly; quit burdening it with restriction, restraint, and regimentation; quit competing with it out of the Public Treasury; quit gunning for it as though it were a professional criminal; and, most important of all, quit those devastating uncertainties which flow from "government by Executive decree," the fatal habit of delegating plenary power to the President to do what he pleases, when he pleases, as he pleases, with so many of the fundamental elements of our economy. Furthermore, you cannot build a solvent prosperity around an insolvent Treasury; and certainly you cannot build it around the annually broken promises of a President who long since broke the Maginot line of our own national defense, which is a sound public credit.

The Brookings Institution of Washington is the greatest independent research agency in this country. It says that the future development of private enterprise is "adequate to absorb the Nation's capital and labor resources." It says that the Government's taxation, spending, and regulatory policies have "impeded the flow of capital into constructive developments." It says that the reestablishment of stable conditions depends largely upon "the removal of impediments and the restoration of confidence in the future of private enterprise."

There's your answer, my fellow countrymen. No one wants to go back to the piracies of old. No one wants to sacrifice sound social progress; and it is not necessary. Just restore confidence in the future of private enterprise. Do the things necessary to restore it. Then watch the dammed-up impulses of a starved decade go to work. There's your answer to unemployment. There are your real jobs at real wages. And there's your means to pay your public bills.

Can this administration restore confidence? It cannot. Its hostilities and its hatreds have sunk too deeply into the consciences of its victims. Its policies have too clearly fixed the vindictive zeals of its submarining attitudes. Its bright young "brain trusters"—who never met a pay roll in their lives—have scarred too many memories. It got too mad at capable, competent John Hanes (who has just bolted the Chicago ticket) because when he was Under Secretary of the Treasury he dared distribute blue cards, as a guide to policy, which read: "Will it contribute to recovery?" No. Saul could turn to Paul in 24 hours on the road to Damascus. But Mr. Roosevelt cannot ever turn himself into a confidence-builder on the road to a third term.

The Republican Party this year is the confidence party. It is the salvation party. It is the party of hope for America and the American system. Its nominee for President personifies these boons. That is why he was nominated, and that is why he will be elected.

My friends, I have but touched the rim of a few of our critical national problems. The sum total of their scope makes November 1940 the most desperately important month in generations of our history. In the midst of the nonpolitical necessity that we shall rally to the national defense in a military sense without thought or consideration of political consequences, we must also face the political necessity that we shall rally to the national defense in another sense—the defense of traditional American democracy and the defense of our economic life—which depends entirely upon political consequences. The nonpolitical problem of military defense presents a grave emergency; let us try to meet it with an eye single to the safety and the honor and the peace of the United States. The political problem of institutional and economic defense presents an equally grave emergency; let us meet it with an unyielding determination to preserve our inheritance—the American way of life.

I congratulate the Republican Servicemen's League of Michigan upon hastening early to the 1940 battle line. This is more than a campaign. It is a crusade. It is more than a Republican cause. It is just as much the cause of Democrats who love the memory of Thomas Jefferson. We present a common front to a common enemy. We dare not fail. And Michigan must do her full part.

OF

HON. EDWIN C. JOHNSON

OF COLORADO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 15 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ARTICLE BY HUGH RUSSELL FRASER

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a well-deserved tribute to the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] by Hugh Russell Fraser, the well-known columnist and editor.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INSIDE WASHINGTON

(By Hugh Russell Fraser)

Yesterday, today, and tomorrow—when the history of the last decade is recorded, the deeds of one man in the Congress of the United States will, in my opinion, live. And his deeds will be of one piece with his words.

That man is Senator BURTON K. WHEELER, Montana Democrat.

There are a few men in every decade who rise above the level of the politician. Some of them have reached the White House; some of them have not. But they all, by an incident of fate, have one characteristic in common. They are ready and willing to defy the gods of expediency to be true to their vision. They may be false to parties and factions, but never to the things they live by. They are defeated, but they never die. Indeed, they symbolize the vision that is in America.

Within the memory of living men there are names that cannot and will not be forgotten—Bronson Cutting, Edgar E. Borah, Robert La Follette.

It is not easy to extend the list, but we know there are one or two that the historian will add among those living in the Senate and House.

Among these will most certainly be GEORGE W. NORRIS and BURT WHEELER. But more especially WHEELER, for day in and day out he is on the firing line.

For example—

It is 20 minutes after 1 o'clock on the afternoon following a day when Col. Charles A. Lindbergh had been formally charged over a radio network by Senator SCOTT LUCAS, of Illinois, as being the leader of the "'fifth columnists' in the United States." Senator WHEELER is on his feet, facing the name-calling Senator LUCAS and pleading for a little more sanity in America and less hysteria.

Nobody else bothers to raise the issue. WHEELER does. Nobody else thinks it worth the candle to assail a fellow Senator over a mere speech. And as WHEELER speaks, he strikes his right fist into his left hand, vehemently. He is not angry at LUCAS personally. He is not striking at the man but the intolerance he has expressed. Nor, for that matter, does he even defend Lindbergh. But he does ask that in this crisis we—you and I, and, oh yes, Mr. LUCAS—not stoop to name-calling and impugning the patriotism of anybody and everybody who does not agree with you.

WHEELER is on the floor, and the Senate listens. LUCAS tries to answer. He is a young-appearing man with stooped shoulders. He tries to argue, to steer the discussion into more debatable channels. Politely, WHEELER yields; then he continues. He is not out to argue this or that point that Lindbergh said or did not say. He is merely affirming a principle. He does not ask or expect Brother LUCAS to understand, but he is pleading with the Senate and the country.

And it is a strange thing—the record of the man.

Once one of Mr. Roosevelt's most powerful supporters, he listened one morning to the President of the United States' ingenious proposal for packing the Supreme Court.

And when the last sentence was finished, and as the last echoes were dying down, BURT WHEELER knew in his heart that if it meant forever breaking with his friend in the White House, and if it meant fighting every Democratic Member in the Senate, he would fight this proposal.

He went out and fought it—not the next week, or the next month, but that day.

And thus he went out from the Capitol more in sorrow than in anger. For he knew the price he would have to pay. He knew also every pseudo liberal in the country would be denouncing him from the housetops, but compared to his passionate faith in democracy it amounted to as little to him as tomorrow's weather forecast.

What did amount to a great deal in his judgment, what fired his determination, was his deep and abiding conviction that the end does not justify the means—and that, in the long run, no matter how much he agreed with the President that the Supreme Court was definitely "packed" against liberal and progressive measures, the answer was not a device which—if successful—could be invoked by some future reactionary and dangerous occupant of the White House.

And so, with that fine courage and utter unconcern for his personal welfare, BURT WHEELER went into the thick of the fray and won.

Yet there are other and less known indications of the stature of the man. It was in late fall a few years ago that a committee meeting was held.

It was a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Agriculture. They were investigating the American Cotton Cooperative Association of New Orleans. The administration was interested in protecting the cooperative. Senator WHEELER himself is a great advocate of cooperatives and always has been.

But here were grave charges of collusion and fraud and exploitation by a few insiders. The evidence was brought out by the committee's own counsel, Col. Lawrence Westbrook. Loyal Democratic Senators on the committee heckled witnesses, ignored the evidence in many instances. Finally, WHEELER spoke up:

"Look here: This kind of practices should not be tolerated in a cooperative any more than in a private business. Just because it's a cooperative is no reason to gloss over the situation and imagine it doesn't exist. I am for stopping this kind of thing whether it happens to be in a cooperative or anything else."

For purely political considerations the Senator from Montana did not need to be so blunt. Yet to expect him to be anything else is ridiculous.

And so today, in the greatest fight of all—when the President of the United States and others in his Cabinet, chiefly Mr. Stimson and Mr. KNOX, are doing their best to frighten everybody to death, Mr. WHEELER is doing what the Nation's Chief Executive should be doing—namely, he is pleading for sanity, calm and careful thinking, and an orderly, intelligent—not hysterical—examination of our whole defense problem.

He may not get it, but he is fighting for it. Every day, in and out of the Senate, he is fighting—and who knows?—perhaps, as in the Supreme Court fight, he may win.

Presenting, ladies and gentlemen, the senior Senator from Montana.

HON. ARTHUR CAPPER

OF KANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 15 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

LETTER FROM WILLIAM S. BENNET TO THE NEW YORK TIMES

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an interesting letter written by Mr. William S. Bennet for the New York Times, in which he briefly sets forth a few good reasons why the splendid record of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY], Republican nominee for Vice President, will meet with the approval of the people of the United States.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATOR M'NARY'S CANDIDACY—HIS RECORD IN UPPER HOUSE IS CITED AS EVIDENCE OF STRENGTH

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

The conclusion which your editorial of June 29 indicates that you have arrived at in relation to Senator MCNARY as a candidate for Vice President omits as a basis some rather essential facts and contains one criticism which is entirely unjustified.

As to the votes which Senator MCNARY has cast, and which you criticize, all of them were on measures as to which reasonable men have differed, and, in connection with some, now differ and will continue to differ in the future. There is no charge that Senator MCNARY's votes did not accord with his sincere convictions. As to each of these measures, division in the Senate was not on party lines.

You object to Senator MCNARY because he is a protectionist. The Republican Party is a protectionist party. There has been a protective-tariff plank in every platform from 1860 to 1940, including both, the statement in the 1940 platform being: "We believe in tariff protection for agriculture, labor, and industry as essential to our American standard of living." The Republican Party can scarcely be criticized for nominating a candidate who has been consistently in accord with his party's platform. The tariff position of the Republican Party is an issue this year, as it always has been, but a Republican can scarcely be criticized for the specific act of being faithful to the party's position on any subject.

In your summation you omit facts of common knowledge which have to do with Senator MCNARY's high standing in the party and among the people.

First, courage: In 1936 Senator MCNARY came up for reelection. The advocates of the Townsend plan were very strong in Oregon. Substantially one-third of the voters were members of Townsend clubs. Practically every other candidate for a major office in Oregon made some sort of a compromise with the Townsendites. Senator MCNARY refused to make any. Nevertheless, although President Roosevelt carried the State by over 140,000, Senator MCNARY was reelected. Evidently some 75,000 voters who voted for Mr. Roosevelt switched over and voted for Senator MCNARY on the Republican ticket.

Second, his record as a student of the farm policy: Senator MCNARY was one of the first to recognize that there was a farm problem. He advocated a remedy at a time when possibly the majority of those in public life were denying that there was even a problem. We shall never know whether the McNary-Haugen bill was an answer in whole or in part. It passed Congress, but President Coolidge vetoed it; neither the Republican nor the Democratic Party endorsed the idea in its 1928 platform, and both President Hoover and President Roosevelt had other proposed solutions, but the country now realizes that Senator MCNARY was right when he said there was a farm problem, and even those who disagree with his proposed remedy respect him for his intelligent and helpful interest in the problem.

Third, among legislators he stands at the head of those interested in forest conservation: Commencing with the Clarke-McNary law, every law relating to forest conservation now on the statute books enacted since his service began 23 years ago bears his name as the Senate introducer. Forest conservation is a matter of interest to the entire country, and its progress owes more to Senator MCNARY than to any other one man now in public office.

It would be easy to give other details in connection with Senator MCNARY's useful service. He has been the Republican leader or assistant leader in the Senate for more than 15 years. His success as leader during an especially trying period is universally recognized. He has the respect and confidence not only of his party associates but of his Democratic opponents as well. Such respect and confidence are never given in the Senate to an unfit man. In choosing Senator MCNARY as its candidate for Vice President, the party made no mistake. On the contrary, it is to be congratulated.

WILLIAM S. BENNET.

Senator Lodge and Conscription

OF

HON. CHARLES L. McNARY

OF OREGON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 15 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE BEE, OF LAWRENCE, MASS.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial under the title "Senator LODGE and Conscription," published in the Bee, of Lawrence, Mass., under date of August 9, 1940.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Bee, Lawrence, Mass., of August 9, 1940]

SENATOR LODGE AND CONSCRIPTION

Our own Senator from Massachusetts, HENRY CABOT LODGE, JR., seems to have felt the pulse of the Nation in the present controversy over conscription.

Months ago, as a result of a survey made by him personally, Senator LODGE advocated an increase in the standing Army of the United States. Nit-wits, blow-hards, and plain ignoramuses in the present Congress pooh-poohed his suggestions, which were printed in full in the Bee.

Yet, after tons of paper have been wasted printing millions of words in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD since Senator LODGE'S suggestions were made, Congress has arrived at the same conclusion as Senator LODGE, namely, that the young men from 21 to 31 shall be called to the colors at this time.

The foresight of Senator LODGE, and his tremendous courage in calling a spade a spade at a time when his colleagues were more engrossed in their own reelection or in pork-barrel activities, again compel us to remark that Senator LODGE will be Presidential timber before long.

He has combined in him the sagacity of his grandfather and the frankness of the present generation. He calls them as he sees them. Senator LODGE is, without question, the greatest national leader of either party now in Congress. He is seldom heard and when he does speak his words are full of wisdom and facts.

That we must have conscription of some sort seems to be self-evident if we are to avoid the fate of the other European countries that have felt the heel of the dictator. We must have trained men and quickly.

Who would think of placing a man at the wheel of a tank or airplane without training? And what of the numbers of men required to care for the large quantities of tanks and planes our factories will turn out in the next year and more? The Army, Navy, and Marine Corps must be allowed time to train its new personnel before it can be required to give proper accounting.

Defense is no longer grabbing a gun or pitchfork and running into the roadway to dispute the marching enemy as it was in the days of the Revolution and of Lexington and Concord. Today the enemy will come by air and we must be prepared to meet them in the air with trained men. They will come by sea power in both oceans. They will come by land and we must have mechanical force to match theirs, since we have no fortifications.

Time marches on. Every week, every day, every hour lost is gone beyond redemption. Those pseudo statesmen heard nightly over the radio, in Congress, in protest meetings, may be the first to bewail our lack of preparedness should the enemy strike.

We will have no second chance.

COLUMN BY HON. DEWEY SHORT, OF MISSOURI

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I had the honor and pleasure of serving on the House Committee on Military Affairs with the scintillating Member of the House from Missouri, Mr. DEWEY SHORT. Mr. SHORT is a master of the English language and of debate. He is a veritable machine gun in the employment of our language. He substituted this morning for the well-known columnist, Mr. Harlan Miller, in writing his column, Over the Coffee, for the Washington Post, and I ask unanimous consent that the column written by Mr. SHORT be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post of August 15, 1940]

OVER THE COFFEE

(By Harlan Miller)

(A silver-tongued hillbilly educated at Harvard, Oxford, and Heidelberg, Congressman SHORT has a sense of humor which survives erudition; and he survives as Missouri's only G. O. P. Member in Congress out of 13 and shines as today's guest columnist.—Harlan Miller.)

HUMOR FROM THE OZARKS

(By the Honorable DEWEY SHORT, Representative from Missouri)

A prominent magazine recently called me "a voluptuous lover of words." I plead guilty. I do love words. I love even the word "voluptuous." I am not alone. Most politicians, preachers, and poets—even some newspapermen—love words.

That brilliant wit, Congressman EATON, serving his eighth term from New Jersey, discussing the New Deal on the floor of the House, recently said, "It is not Democratic. It is not Republican. It is an irrational concatenation of economic and political cacophonies."

And listen to Hon. STEPHEN BOLLES, of the First District of Wisconsin, speak of our President: "We cannot all be carried away by the soporific sophistications of the man at the other end of the Avenue or the tintinnabulations of easy-flowing sonorous sentences."

Not bad for a first-termer; but young Congressman BOLLES is an old newspaperman.

A Congressman's education, however, is acquired, not from the bad speeches of his colleagues but from his voluminous and varied correspondence with the world. The average Member of Congress today must answer more communications in a week than had to be answered during a whole session in the days of Webster, Clay, and Calhoun.

Perhaps this is the reason we have so few Websters, Clays, and Calhouns today. Those men had time to read, study, reflect, and think; government then was relatively simple. Today Members of Congress become errand boys, running frantically from one complex agency or department to another, finding little time for meditation or research.

An anonymous correspondent this morning advises me: "I believe in the Holy Scripture, Almighty God, and a greater posterity; I do not believe in present-day birth control." He adds: "I smoke regular and drink some, and occasionally get drunk, and I don't care who knows it."

An 11-year-old girl instructs me to send her a Mickey Mouse watch; she is a Republican and her seatmate is a Democrat, who is writing to the President for a similar watch; they are running a race to see who gets the watch first.

I'm afraid I'll have to concede victory to the little Democrat.

Here's a letter from a country doctor urging that the Government provide pensions for all elderly country doctors. My secretary pencils a note: "How about pensions for broken-down secretaries—or Congressmen?" Nice, but contagious.

Recently we had a letter from a veteran complaining that the false teeth provided by the Veterans' Administration did not fit—and under separate cover he sent the teeth, to prove it.

We Missourians have to be shown.

One of my constituents is the proud father of twin boys, one of whom he has named for me; natives of the Ozarks being sturdy souls, the child will probably outgrow that handicap.

Congressman ANDY ROMJUE, one of my Democratic colleagues from Missouri, has named the contrariest mule on his farm "Dewey Short." It seems that Uncle Andy knows not only Missouri mules, but me, too. My mother's maiden name, incidentally, was Long.

An Army airplane swooped down upon the Ozarks one day and so frightened stock in the pasture of one of my constituents that a horse was killed. After we got sworn statements covering everything except the horse's given name and an autopsy to prove it died of fright, the War Department settled. Not such a bad Government, after all.

The Hoover Relief Proposal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 15 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ARTICLE BY WALTER LIPPMANN

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article by Walter Lippmann entitled "The Hoover Relief Proposal," which he has included in his column headed Today and Tomorrow.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TODAY AND TOMORROW—THE HOOVER RELIEF PROPOSAL

(By Walter Lippmann)

Mr. Hoover has proposed that the United States intervene in Europe in order to assure supplies of food to some 27,000,000 inhabitants of four nations—Norway, Holland, Belgium, and Poland—and possibly also to some of the 40,000,000 inhabitants of France. On the basis of information available to him Mr. Hoover describes the situation as follows: He says that if Germany allows the four little nations to keep their stocks of food and this year's harvest, their situation "will not begin to be acute until some time in the fall" but that their situation "will become fatal in the winter and spring next year—as domestic supplies are exhausted."

It follows that their situation will become acute immediately only if the occupying German armies draw upon the existing stocks of food and do not allow the invaded nations to use what this summer's harvest produces. Mr. Hoover does not say whether in fact the Germans have been taking from the existing stocks and from the present harvest. But he implies that they have. For in the plan which he proposes he stipulates that Germany shall "furnish an equivalent of any food already taken." This would suggest that he believes the German requisitions may make the position in some of these countries very desperate even sooner than the autumn.

Mr. Hoover's plan calls for the setting up in these four, possibly five, invaded nations of "an adequate control of distribution" by a "neutral nongovernmental organization." This, of course, means an American organization. Mr. Hoover then defines what he means by an adequate control. He does not mean merely, as some may suppose, that Americans in these four or five nations shall see to it that food from the United States reaches only the inhabitants of the invaded countries. Mr. Hoover means much more than that. He means that the American controllers are to see to it that the occupying German armies "take none of the domestic produce." For, obviously, if the American controllers do not do this, then the equivalent, or more, of what is sent in from America may go out to Germany. If, therefore, Mr. Hoover's American controllers do not supervise the administration of the whole food supply of these four or five countries, the net result of the vast humanitarian effort would be to finance and facilitate the import of food into Germany by the use of Norwegian, Belgian, Dutch, Polish, and American funds.

But Mr. Hoover's plan does not end with the proposal to establish a control, administered by Americans, of the relief shipments and of the domestic stocks and the harvests of these four or five nations. His plan also requires the American controllers to get back from Germany "an equivalent of any food already taken." Nor is that all. His plan also requires the American controllers to see to it that these four or five invaded nations are able to import food "from Russia and the Balkan states"—in other words, that Germany and Italy do not monopolize all the exportable surpluses of central and eastern Europe.

This program, as Mr. Hoover describes it, is no simple undertaking. An organization of private citizens is to distribute relief in four or five nations. It is to administer the whole food supply—the stocks, the harvests, and the imports—of four or five nations. It is to supervise the requisitions of the occupying army in four or five nations. It is to prevent the export of food supplies from four or five nations. It is to recover from Germany the equivalent of food taken out or consumed by her armies during several months of occupation. It is to make sure that four or five prostrate nations are able to buy their proper share, as against their conqueror, of the exports of Russia, Hungary, Rumania.

Only if all these things are done by the American controllers, "only so long" as these "guaranties are fulfilled," does Mr. Hoover suggest that the British let food ships pass through the blockade. It does then seem a bit premature, to say the least, for anyone to begin talking as if a fine humanitarian plan of relief was being opposed by the British and the American Governments. Mr. Hoover's plan calls for a very large American administration set up to supervise and control and inspect the actions of Germany over a large part of the European Continent.

Is there any good reason to think that Hitler would permit Mr. Hoover to exercise any such control as Mr. Hoover proposes? If, as has already been indicated in Berlin, what Hitler would allow is what he has allowed the Red Cross to do in Poland, then obviously what the Nazis mean and what Mr. Hoover means are two totally different things. For while the Red Cross has supervised the distribution of relief in Poland, it has never controlled the food supplies of Poland or done any of the other elaborately difficult things which are called for in the Hoover plan. Nor could such a control be exercised by the few Americans who have been permitted to work in Poland. It would require a very great organization with vast powers to begin to do what the Hoover plan calls for.

In fact, Mr. Hoover is proposing to have the British open the naval blockade to four or five nations on the basis of a guaranty that Americans will establish in its place an administrative blockade—a blockade not only on the frontier between Germany and the invaded nations but also inside all these nations—as between the occupying armies, the Nazi officials, the Gestapo on the one hand, the local inhabitants on the other. What point is there, then, in developing a passionate argument now about whether the American Government ought to ask Britain to let food ships pass, or whether Britain ought to let them pass? For Mr. Hoover has not said, and evidently does not believe, that the United States should compel Great Britain to open the blockade and let food pass unconditionally to the invaded and occupied nations. On the contrary, he has proposed that Britain be asked to open the blockade only "so long as the guaranties are fulfilled."

The guaranties, for which Mr. Hoover stipulates, would have to come from a gigantic system of control, supervision, and administration by Americans in a vast territory occupied by German armies. A cool appraisal of the nature and the requirements of Mr. Hoover's proposed system is, therefore, not only morally the fairest but in practice the only sobering and enlightening introduction to the study of this great problem.

Grain Prices in 1932

REMARKS
HON. FRED CUMMINGS
OF COLORADO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 15, 1940

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Speaker, I recently heard a farmer make the statement that the farmers of the United States are in worse condition now than they were in 1932. For this reason I am asking unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a statement published by the Farmers Union Herald, which shows, on the reverse side of a postal card, the prices paid for grain in 1932.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the statement and article may be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

GRAIN PRICES IN 1932 BEFORE WE HAD THE AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ACT

This is a reproduction of the grain bulletin card mailed to grain elevators in the Northwest on December 24, 1932. Note that the highest quotation for 60-pound No. 1 dark northern wheat was 29 cents per bushel, and it took 15 percent protein to bring any premium at all, and then only 3 cents per bushel. The highest price for amber durum was 25 cents per bushel. The best flax was quoted at 88 cents, the best oats at 5 cents, No. 2 corn 8 cents per bushel, and the best barley 12 cents, while feed barley, which accounts for most of the barley sold, was quoted at 6 cents per bushel.

If you were lucky enough to have very high-grade rye, the price was 15 cents per bushel in Minneapolis.

Those were the days of holiday associations, mortgage foreclosures, and rural mobs. Compare those times with 1940, after 7½ years of constantly improving Federal farm programs. We now have pegged loans for wheat, rye, and corn, and parity payments in addition. Wheat crop risks are greatly minimized by crop insurance, applicable now only to wheat, but with a definite promise in the New Deal program that insurance will be extended to other crops as rapidly as possible.

The Farmers Union, in cooperation with other farm organizations, has made a constant fight for better agricultural conditions. To the Farmers Union alone, however, is due most of the credit for the benefits that have come to wheat farmers.

When you get discouraged, and think that economic conditions are bad, remember 1932. We have not reached our goal, but we have made progress.

Our Foreign Policy

OF

HON. JOSEPH B. SHANNON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 15, 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. JOSEPH B. SHANNON, OF MISSOURI

Mr. SHANNON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address delivered by me over radio station WDAF, Kansas City, Mo., August 4, 1940:

Friends of the radio audience, I am, as you know, a candidate for reelection as your Representative in Congress from the Fifth Congressional District. What my record has been in that service I do not intend tonight to speak of. I will leave that task to others—to the good friends who have supported me and to the honest critics who may have disagreed with me in some of the ideals that I have followed. My record is now public property. I have no apologies to make for any opinions that I have from time to time expressed upon the floor of the House. I believe I have tried at all times to bear in mind that my duty as your Congressman was faithfully and to the best of my ability to uphold and protect the wishes of my constituency.

NO CONCEALMENT OF MY VIEWS

I have made no concealment of my views upon public matters, and my efforts have been governed by my conception of duty as an American citizen, as a humble follower of the doctrines of Thomas Jefferson, the founder of the Democratic Party, and by what my conscience has dictated to me as the official representative of my district. Whether my course has received your approval is now for you to decide. The record is before you, and all I can say now, or wish to say, on the eve of this coming election, is that I shall be thankful for your approval and not in any way resentful if your opinions do not happen to coincide with mine. I am glad that, so far, we live in a free country where we can still voice our opinions without looking up to the sky for menacing bombs, or over our shoulders for trailing Gestapos.

THE MONROE DOCTRINE—OUR SECOND DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE

A few weeks ago I spoke in the House upon the subject of the Monroe Doctrine, then, as now, deeply engaging the interest and the interpretation of statesmen. I wish to take this occasion to elaborate somewhat upon the subject matter of that speech, as I think that there is no political document affecting the course of American statesmanship with regard to our foreign relations that has been the subject of so much controversy, both at home and abroad.

Today we find interpreters of that doctrine who sincerely believe that it means a United States dictatorship of the affairs of the Western Hemisphere, and I believe that such opinions have done us great harm in disturbing from time to time our cordial relations with our sister republics below the line. For me the Monroe Doctrine, to quote the words of Jefferson, was "our second declaration of independence from the affairs of Europe—our last and final decree of divorce from the policies, quarrels, wars, and brutalities of the outmoded systems of European nations and dynasties."

As has been aptly said by a distinguished American statesman: "The Monroe Doctrine is not a law for anybody. It is a declaration of a public policy by and for the United States. We should not ask other nations to endorse it, and should not allow other nations to interpret it."

WAR NOT AN ARBITRAMENT OF NATIONAL DIFFERENCES

Let me at the outset make myself clear upon one subject that seems to be uppermost in the minds of our people today—that of war. I need not tell you here tonight my opinions on war as a means of settling disputes between nations. After 10,000 years of civilization and struggle for peaceful ideals of government—the sort of Government that our Constitution sought to cement in its plea for domestic tranquillity and the ideals of peace and justice—it seems to me a strange commentary upon the intelligence of human beings that we are still engaged in killing one another to attain our ends. I do not believe in war as an arbitrament of national differences; it seems to be simply an instrument of destruction and barbarism that never once in the entire history of the world ever permanently settled any question.

And the wars of today are not the wars of yesterday. If there ever was justification for the word "glory" to be attached to feats of war—in the days, say, of heroic charges and heroic defenses between men and men—that word can no longer be applied to the mechanized slaughter that is going on in Europe today. The armies are helmeted robots. The artillery is composed of juggernaut tanks that roll over and crush human bodies, and of winged airships, triple-plated, that rain down bombs upon men and women and children, hospitals and churches, art galleries, and places of earthly beauty. Whatever glory of war ever existed has departed forever. The men who plan and conduct these new devastations are of a new and inhuman type. Courting no dangers themselves—safely hidden in armor-plated de luxe cars remote from the scenes of destruction—they scatter death, disease, destruction, and pestilence across the fair fields of harmless and peace-loving countries. It is purely a European system. It has no place here. We have no place there.

The hope still clings to my heart that our America still believes in humanity, in religion, in comradeship, in freedom, and in the pursuit of happiness. And I believe that the Monroe Doctrine, rightly interpreted, in the spirit not only of the President who announced it formally, but in sayings and writings of the fathers of the Republic who paved the way for its utterance and maintenance, will, in the end, be the bulwark that will support our free institutions and keep the ravening hordes of Europe from our shores.

A SUPPORTER OF ADEQUATE DEFENSE OF AMERICA

But let me say here, lest my candor be misinterpreted, that I am not a pacifist when it comes to the defense of America from invasion by any foreign enemy, marauder, or dictator. I consider it the duty of every American to keep that sort of warfare from our shores, and to be prepared and willing to defend our country if and when it is so threatened or attacked. Further, I consider it his solemn duty to constantly guard against and frustrate every attempt to transplant the despotic ideals of either Europe or Asia on the American continent. That is my interpretation of Americanism, and upon that doctrine I have always taken my stand and tried with the best ability I possess to maintain it during my service in Congress.

As a member of the House Committee on Naval Affairs, I have consistently and faithfully supported every measure of defense; and as a Member of the House, my vote has always been for the furtherance of adequate means of defense in these days, no matter what the cost. But, at the same time, I have always insisted, and still insist, that not one American soldier—boy or man—should ever be sent abroad to take part in in European or Asiatic war. Nor should the Monroe Doctrine ever be invoked to justify our entering upon invasive wars in this hemisphere.

THE MONROE DOCTRINE A WARNING TO INVADERS

The Monroe Doctrine is a doctrine of defense—a warning to invaders—a protective shield for the preservation of our ideals of government on this side of the Atlantic.

Let us see if that is not the ideal and the destiny of our Republic, as voiced in that often misunderstood doctrine about which there have been so many disputations and disagreements. Let us see if I am warranted in believing that that doctrine is not merely a passing state document intended to meet a special situation, but a doctrine really founded in the very formative ideals of our Nation. Let us first recall the words with which Monroe enunciated the doctrine. In the face of threats of the so-called Holy Alliance that succeeded the Napoleonic era to establish foreign governments in South America, Monroe wrote in his seventh annual Presidential message of 1823 the following calm and decisive words:

"The occasion has been deemed proper for asserting, as a principle in which the rights and interests of the United States are involved, that the American Continent, by the free and independent condition which they have assumed and maintain, are henceforth not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European powers. In the wars of the European powers, in matters relating to themselves, we have never taken any part, nor does it comport with our policy to do so. It is only when our rights are invaded, or seriously menaced, that we resent injuries or make preparations for our defense. We owe it, therefore, to candor and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those powers to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety."

THE DOCTRINE ENUNCIATED BY MONROE NOT NEW

Here is no hint of a new destiny for the young Republic; no threat of invasive rights; no promise of allied interference in foreign wars. The doctrine enunciated by Monroe was new only in its verbal form, its adoption of a documentary formula of what long had been the policy of the founders of the Republic and of the Presidents who had preceded Monroe. It voiced a policy of defense for the United States from any system of foreign government that might seek to set up its national ideals on this hemisphere, thus becoming a menace to the continuance of our free and independent form of government. It was in no sense the formulation of a new destiny. It was the same doctrine that Jefferson voiced in the Declaration of Independence; the same that Washington advocated in his Farewell Address; the same that Jefferson, during his Presidency and in his later public utterances, firmly stood for as the basic ideal of the American Republic; and in long later years the same that Abraham Lincoln voiced in his famous Gettysburg Address.

Every President from Washington down to the present day has supported that fundamental doctrine, not merely because it was uttered by Monroe to apply to a particular situation but because it struck at the very foundations upon which our free and independent Nation was built. Today we hear echoes of a new statesmanship termed "internationalism." But America was founded and maintained upon its own interpretations of freedom, and that was represented by the word "nationalism," the conception of national defense in the spirit in which the Nation found life and which it has maintained ever since.

THE IDEALS OF THE FOUNDERS OF OUR NATION

At the risk of going back over some old ground, let me bring to you tonight again the voices of the men we have been taught to revere as those who, in the words of Lincoln, "brought forth upon this continent a new Nation, conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal." They are words that reveal to us in flaming symbols the ideals that the fathers passed down to us from the signing of the great Declaration, and which found a second birth of independence in the words of Monroe, "what oft was thought but not so well expressed," perhaps, but still deeply symbolic of the spirit that gave our Nation birth and sustained it through perilous years.

The building of this Nation was not a haphazard affair. The words I shall recall are but few. They came from men who fought for our freedom, and who sat down, when we had obtained it, and planned for us a great Nation, new in the world's history, and set upon firm foundations. Said Jefferson, in his Declaration:

"We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed with certain inalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, and that to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed."

That was rock No. 1 for the foundation. The constitutional preamble expressing unity and domestic tranquillity was rock No. 2. Coming down the years Jefferson again expressed the idea that the Monroe Doctrine clarified, namely, that the Declaration of Independence divorced us forever from the follies and crimes of Europe.

WASHINGTON'S WARNINGS NOT OUTMODED

Washington told us in his Farewell Address, when he was retiring from the Presidency at a time when the Nation was facing a perilous future, with wars raging in Europe, that we should guard against entangling alliances. Again he voiced the sentiment that was expressed in Monroe's doctrinal formula. He said:

"The name of American which belongs to you in your national capacity must always exalt the just pride of patriotism more than any appellation derived from local discriminations. The independence and liberty you possess are the work of joint counsels and joint efforts, of common dangers, sufferings, and successes. The great rule of conduct for us in regard to foreign nations is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible."

And then, in words that have become classics of patriotism and homely advice, based upon the doctrine which passed down the Presidential line from Washington to Monroe, he warned his people:

"Europe has a set of primary interests which to us have none or a very remote relation. Hence she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence, therefore, it would be unwise for us to implicate ourselves by artificial ties in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics, or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships or enmities."

I know that this famous quotation has been met with the curt waiver, "Things have changed since Washington's time," but have they? Ponder his words and let your honest opinion answer whether the same, if not far worse, foreign conditions do not exist today in Europe than existed in Washington's time, and if his warning words are not as true today as when he uttered them. I say those words of Washington are not outmoded. They were beacons that lighted us down the decades that followed his wise guidance. They were reiterated by Jefferson and Madison and Monroe and they inspired Lincoln in the hope that such a nation, "conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal * * * can long endure."

PEACETIME CONSCRIPTION HAS NO PLACE IN THE AMERICAN SYSTEM

Conscription to me is an odious word. It has the sound of a whiplash upon the shoulders of a free people. It casts an ominous shadow of doubt upon American patriotism and duty. From the seeds of conscription sprang the militaristic systems now dominating Europe. Peacetime conscription has no place in the American system. I see no necessity for it; I cannot subscribe to it.

The National Guard Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. THORKELSON
OF MONTANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 15, 1940

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, the bill now under consideration, if passed in its present form, will give the President power to train the United States Army in Canada, Mexico, and Central and South America. What would our reaction be if the same countries sent their armies to train in the United States? It is unthinkable, is it not? Yet this act gives the President such power. Not only does it give the President this power, but it is something that no other nation has ever tried to do before, and which will mean war for us should we attempt to follow this plan.

The English, French, and German Armies were trained in their own countries, the proper place. Our Army should therefore be trained in the United States. We have passed one piece of legislation after another, all of them short of war; but this measure will actually give the President power to invade foreign countries, which can mean nothing else but war with the country invaded, or which he may select as a training field for our Army. What is the purpose of the bill? To give the President an excuse to come before Congress again and ask for war powers. Many of the rulers of the Central and South American republics obtain control of the government by a "coup militaire," and this bill will give the President the same opportunity, namely, to take charge of this Government by the power of the United States military forces.

If this bill is passed as it is now, there is a possibility that election will not be held in November. There is also a possibility that Congress may be suspended over the war-emergency period. It is with this in mind I have suggested that we adhere to the Constitution of the United States, as it provides the proper procedure for calling our military forces into service. To honor the oath we have taken we should sustain this document, for it is only by adhering to it that this Republic can survive.

Manufacture of Army Shoes by Convict Labor

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. VITO MARCANTONIO
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 15, 1940

LETTER FROM THE UNITED SHOE WORKERS OF AMERICA

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

UNITED SHOE WORKERS OF AMERICA, OF THE C. I. O.,
Washington, D. C., August 13, 1940.

HON. VITO MARCANTONIO,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE MARCANTONIO: In behalf of the thousands of your shoe-worker constituents, and especially in the interest of those who are now unemployed, we call your attention to the fact that the Quartermaster's Corps of the Army is about to award an order for 300,000 pairs of shoes to the Leavenworth Prison for manufacture by convict labor.

The men's shoe industry, we are sure you are aware, has suffered the worst spring and summer seasons to date in many years, and weekly wages earned by many workers in this industry have hit new lows. Workers in this industry cannot afford any loss in wages as the average pay is only $880 a year, a sum too low to maintain a decent American standard of living.

Congress has expressed its will in regard to this matter in Public, No. 271, Seventy-first Congress, which reads in part as follows:

"That the Attorney General provide employment for inmates in the United States penal institutions in such diversified forms as will reduce to a minimum competition with private industry or free labor."

The Federal Prison Housing, Inc., the agency which handles this matter, has been increasing the activities of its shoe factories until it now constitutes a serious threat to the maintenance of standards in the competitive commercial shoe industry. This is shown more clearly by the fact that in 1932 the total annual production of the shoe factory in Leavenworth Prison was 240,00 pairs, and now, having completed an order of 120,000 pairs for the C. C. C. so far this year, they are about to take this order for an additional 300,000 pairs, bringing their total production this year to a minimum of 500,000 pairs.

It seems paradoxical that it should be necessary for the thousands of trained skilled shoe workers to commit a crime before they are permitted to work at their trade.

We urge you to protest, both to the Director of the C. C. C. and to Maj. Letcher O. Grice, in charge of shoe purchases in the Quartermaster's Corps of the United States Army.

Your interest in this matter will be deeply appreciated, and we would appreciate your keeping us informed of any action you may take in regard to this matter.

Respectfully yours,

FRANK MCGRATH,
President.
JAMES J. MITCHELL,
General Secretary-Treasurer,
LEO GOODMAN,
Research Director, United Shoe Workers of America, C. I. O.

P. S.—We call your attention to the pending appropriations in the third deficiency bill, now before the deficiency subcommittee of the House Committee on Appropriations, to provide funds to put into effect Public Resolution No. 85, Seventy-sixth Congress, a copy of which is attached, which would provide the facts regarding the question referred to in this letter.

Nomination, Election, and Tenure of Office of the President and Vice President

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN M. COFFEE
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 5, 1940

PETITION OF RAILWAYMAN'S WELFARE LEAGUE OF THE STATE OF WASHINGTON

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herein a petition to the Congress in which is expressed on behalf of active employees of railroads in my State their viewpoint with respect to the nomination, election, and tenure of office of the President and Vice President of the United States.

It would appear that in these modern times the electoral college was outmoded and that under the system which now obtains there is grave likelihood that though a candidate for President receives a majority of popular votes, he would be denied the majority of the electoral votes. Furthermore, it is democratic and in accord with modern thought that the nominees for President and Vice President should be chosen through national primaries.

The letter is as follows:

To the Members of the Senate and House of Representatives, Care of Hon. Homer T. Bone, Member of the Senate, and Hon. John M. Coffee, Member of the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIRS: We, the Railwaymen's Welfare League of the State of Washington, availing ourselves of the constitutional right to petition the Congress for redress against the present mode of procedure in the matter of the nomination, election, and tenure of office of President and Vice President of the United States, respectfully petition the Congress now in session to take the necessary steps to amend the Federal Constitution and to enact such legislation as may be required:

1. To abolish the electoral college and all political machinery pertaining thereto and to substitute therefor a plan for the filing of candidacy, nomination, and election of the President and Vice President of the United States somewhat similar to that now in vogue in the State of Washington, where the blanket primary ballot is now used, in connection with filing of candidacy, nomination, and election of a United States Senator, thus providing a direct vote by the people in the nomination and election of a President and Vice President of the United States, and it would also eliminate entirely the holding of national political party conventions so far as the nomination of a President and Vice President is concerned; and

2. To provide that the tenure of office of both the President and Vice President shall be limited to a single term of (——?) years. (The action of both the Democratic and Republican conventions suggests this amendment.)

NOTE.—Washington in his Farewell Address, September 17, 1796, warned the people against the "baneful effects of spirit of party" upon national tranquility. "Sooner or later," warned Washington, "the chief of some prevailing faction more able or more fortunate than his competitors may turn this disposition to purposes of his own elevation, on the ruins of public liberty." Is Washington's prophecy coming true? It would seem so, when the men and women of the State of Washington, at the last general election, supported candidates for public office without regard to fitness for position, but because they carried a "vote 'er straight" banner.

Washington's warning, and what seemed to us the political trend in this country impelled us to file the foregoing petition to Congress as a step toward giving the people a direct vote and responsibility in the choosing of their executive leadership. A study of Washington's Farewell Address at this time when foreign and domestic policies and national defense are uppermost in our minds is well worth while.

Respectfully submitted.

H. ALVIN MOORE,
Executive Secretary, Railwaymen's Welfare League of Washington.

The Third-Term Issue

HON. L. L. MARSHALL
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 15, 1940

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Cleveland Press of August 6, 1940, in which Rabbi Abba Silver raps a third term and backs Willkie for the Presidency.

[From the Cleveland Press of August 6, 1940]

SILVER RAPS THIRD TERM, BACKS WILLKIE—LIBERAL LEADER HITS "EXALTING MAN ABOVE DEMOCRATIC FAITH"

(By Richard L. Maher)

Rabbi A. H. Silver, one of Cleveland's leading churchmen and liberals, today parted company with President Roosevelt on the third-term issue.

The rabbi, for 20 years spiritual director of the Temple and a stanch, though at times critical, admirer of the President and his achievements, reiterated his earlier expressed opposition to the third term and "indispensable one-man rule" and indicated a preference for Wendell L. Willkie, the Republican nominee and opponent of President Roosevelt in the coming elections.

Rabbi Silver is vacationing in Maine, but interrupted his vacation long enough to answer an inquiry put him by the Press.

AGAINST THIRD TERM

Last March 30 the Temple's spiritual director, in an address to an overflow congregation, declared against the third term and the renomination of President Roosevelt.

He was asked by the Press, since the party conventions had now met and had chosen their nominees and since President Roosevelt had been renominated and had accepted, whether his opinion had changed.

"In reply to your letter," Rabbi Silver wrote today from Maine, "permit me to say that my conviction as to the third term remains unchanged.

"And so does my great admiration for the policies and achievements of President Roosevelt.

"What I expressed in my March address represents a settled conviction. The no-third-term tradition has been vindicated by a century and a half of American experience, and it is particularly important in these days, when the indispensable one-man rule is exalted in so many parts of the world at the expense of the democratic faith in laws and institutions rather than in persons, that it should not be repudiated.

"Only one consideration would have warranted a change of attitude—if the opposition candidate, in this case Mr. Willkie, would have been an isolationist representing a foreign policy at sharp variance with the sound and courageous one which President Roosevelt has been prosecuting.

"In such a case, the vital interests of civilization now being threatened would have outweighed any other consideration.

WILLKIE HAS TAKEN CLEAR STAND

"Fortunately, Mr. Willkie has expressed himself clearly and unequivocally in favor of tendering maximum aid, short of war, to Great Britain."

In his address of last March opposing the third term, Rabbi Silver said in part:

"Renomination of President Roosevelt will obscure the issue of the forthcoming election, relieving the Republican Party of the responsibility in showing what it proposes to do about the real problems of the country. * * *

"No matter what party is elected we must remember that substantial progress was registered under President Roosevelt and that that progress must be continued if chaos is to be averted."

Record and Accomplishments of the Democratic Party

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EWING THOMASON

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 15, 1940

ADDRESS BY ERNEST GUINN, COUNTY ATTORNEY OF EL PASO COUNTY, TEX.

Mr. THOMASON. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech delivered by Hon. Ernest Guinn, county attorney of El Paso County, Tex., at the recent Democratic county convention:

I deeply appreciate the honor that the Democratic executive committee of El Paso County conferred upon me by asking me to address this convention. I deem it an honor to be a member of the Democratic Party. I deem it a still greater honor to be called upon to make this address as a representative member of the Democratic Party in this community. I feel that in selecting me to make this speech that you believe that my views are representative of the views of the large majority of the members of our party in this community with regard to its leaders, accomplishments, and purposes.

It is fitting and proper on this occasion for us to pay tribute to our county organization. The backbone of the Democratic Party lies in the local organizations. Our great national chairman, Mr. James A. Farley, has truly said that the success or failure of the national organization depends upon the success or failure of the local organizations throughout the country. The position which the Democratic Party holds today rests principally upon those organizations. For the past 6 years El Paso has been indeed fortunate in its choice of local leaders. Leaders who have unselfishly served the party—devoting time and effort to carrying out the purposes of the party—without reward or hope of reward, other than the satisfaction arising from a job well done. Our local organization is represented by the Democratic executive committee of the county. At the head of this committee is the chairman. His duties are arduous. His problems are many. The good work that has been accomplished by the organization during the past 6 years is largely due to the efforts of this man. It is fit and proper for the members of the Democratic Party of this community to express today to that man their deep appreciation for his work. We may truly say that it is because of the work and efforts of men of the same caliber as Bob Cunningham that the Democratic Party has become the party that it is today. Mr. Cunningham, the Democrats owe you a debt of gratitude, and let me express to you their deep appreciation for your work during the past 6 years as leader of their party in El Paso County. We are also fortunate in the man we have chosen to succeed Mr. Cunningham. Mr. Howard Don has worked as assistant to Mr. Cunningham and as a member of the executive committee for the past 6 years, and if anyone can continue the splendid record set by Mr. Cunningham, it is Mr. Don.

Members of the Democratic Party in this community have acted wisely in their selection of the national Representative from this district. We are all proud of our Congressman, R. E. THOMASON, who has been renominated without opposition. He is an honor to the Democratic Party and an honor to the Democrats of this district who have chosen him to represent them and who have kept him in that office in appreciation of his good service. He now enjoys the honor of being ranking member of the great Committee on Military Affairs. He has consistently supported legislation of our President. In doing this he has followed the wishes of this district. He has always been found on the side of liberal legislation, and in this he has followed the wishes of this district. Today he has taken a strong stand in support of the national-defense program of the President, as well as supporting firm and immediate steps to handle "fifth column" activities in this country. He has likewise taken a stand in support of the aid that is given to England in its present fight, and in all of this he is acting in accord with the wishes of his constituents.

In November of this year the American people will choose their President for the succeeding 4 years. It is our duty before that time to present to the people facts on the real issues involved in the campaign. For the past 8 years there has been a Democratic President serving these United States. I state no exaggeration when I say that he is one of the greatest Presidents that these United States have ever had. There is not a one of you here who does not remember the condition which this country was in at the time he took office, nearly 8 years ago. A feeling of panic prevailed over the country as a result of conditions arising out of the negligent management of public affairs by Republican leaders for the preceding 12 years. Men who predicted two cars in every garage and promised two chickens in every pot were cowed with fear when confronted with a situation that they knew not how to handle. Leaders of industry, of banking, and of all businesses were pleading that something be done to save them. Farms were being foreclosed upon and families were threatened with starvation. Boys—driven from hope through poverty of their families—were wandering across the country seeking food.

These conditions were all brought about through the policies of Republican leaders wedded to special interests who believed that only one interest needed protection, and that the moneyed interest, who recognized only one right—and that the property right. These conditions arose by virtue of the ignorance of Republican leaders of the conditions with which the people were faced, and their failure to appreciate the needs and the wants of the people.

I need not go into detail as to what our great leader did to remedy these conditions. No sooner had he been inducted into office than he began to present and have enacted remedial legislation and to carry out his promise of a liberal administration. The Democratic Party is of the people. It always has been representative of the average American citizen. As soon as the action of the Democratic President and the Democratic Congress had relieved the situation, and removed the danger of immediate panic to the country, those interests which so gladly accepted assistance from the Government for themselves, began to oppose legislation designed to assist the average citizen and to prevent a recurrence of the situation existing in 1932. In true Republican style and belief, so long as assistance came to them, there was no complaint, but now they were safe again, and they could see no reason for assistance to anyone else. A bitter fight was waged by that group in the campaign of 1936. However, the people could not be deceived. They fully realized what our President and our Democratic Congress had done for them and for the country, and they expressed their appreciation in that election. Forty-six of our 48 States voted to return him to office.

During the course of the two terms of our President, outstanding social legislation has been enacted—legislation that has always been opposed by the Republican Party and its leaders. Let us review some of this legislation. Bank after bank had been closed, with enormous losses to small depositors. Life savings had been wiped out. A law was enacted which provides for a guarantee of deposits up to $5,000. Bank failures are practically unknown today. Enormous sums were lost by investors in fake stocks and through manipulations of unprincipled stockbrokers and corporation officials. The Security and Exchange Act was enacted to cure this evil. Strong opposition to the bill was made by the special interests which have always dictated and controlled the policies and actions of the Republican Party.

The Civilian Conservation Corps was created to care for homeless youths wandering about the country. The Public Works Administration and the Works Progress Administration were created to employ men and to afford relief to unemployed and needy. Social-security legislation was enacted to grant security to the wage earner. The Tennessee Valley Authority was created to grapple with the monster power group, which group incidentally is headed by the Republican nominee for President. The Home Owners' Loan Corporation was created to save the homes of our people. A legal right to collective bargaining was given to the workers. Reciprocal-trade treaties were enacted with other nations. Although the Republican leaders at heart opposed each and every one of these acts, fearful of the consequences of open opposition to them, not a one has been assailed in the Republican platform. Nor have the Republican leaders cared to advocate the repeal of any one of these major legislative acts of our Democratic President and Congress. The Republican Party refrains from commenting on the advances made in social legislation by the Democratic Party through its representatives in the hope of diverting the minds of the people from such issues. The people of this country know only too well what can and will be done by the Republican leaders if the opportunity is given to them to emasculate this legislation.

There was a crisis in 1932. That crisis was successfully met and dealt with by the Democratic Party, through the leadership of Franklin D. Roosevelt. The Republican Party had not only failed but, through its stupidity, had brought about the aggravated condition existing then. Today we are faced with a far greater crisis than we were faced with in 1932. We are faced not only with an economic crisis that will arise from the turmoil in which the world is found at this time but we are faced with complete destruction of everything that we hold dear—life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. Freedom—freedom of the press, religion, and of assembly. As a result of this crisis, there are two principal problems that the Nation is faced with today, and those problems will serve as a basis for the coming campaign; they are (1) national defense, and (2) the foreign policy.

When elected in 1932 our President told the people of this country what he proposed to do. This he has done. Today he need not tell the people what he proposes to do with regard to national defense or what his foreign policy will be. His record on both of these matters is before the public. From what he has done in the past we know what he will do in the future. Likewise, we know what the Republicans have done in the past, and from their record we may assume what they propose to do in the future.

We know that a goodly portion of our Navy was sunk by a gullible Republican administration in the 1920's. Have we any assurance that this same gullible group will not listen to the fairy tales of Herr Hitler? We know that for many months our President warned the Nation and the Congress of what to expect in Europe. We also know that the same Republicans who ask to be placed in control of our country today ignored that warning and pooh-poohed the idea that there would be war, and accused the President of being a warmonger. Republican leaders have never been able to see past their own selfish interests. Results which the President warned were likely to occur have occurred, and still today that same group of Republicans, blinded to everything except selfish party interests, fail to appreciate the situation. We know that no action was taken by the Republican administration toward any national defense for the 12 years preceding the election of President Roosevelt. We know that today that group is opposing acts of defense which the President is sponsoring. The foreign policy of our President is clear in every respect. He has unhesitatingly assailed every wrongful action taken by Hitler and Mussolini. He has condemned their inhuman destruction of people and of nations. He has pledged and has given all aid possible to England short of declaring war. He still stands for these things. We know that some of the leaders of the Republican Party stand for appeasement of those vultures.

We know that one of the most vital parts of our national defense rests upon the success of our good-neighbor policy—the policy that has sought to bind our neighbors to the south and ourself in common purposes for common defenses against the common enemy. We know from past experience that the Republican Party and its leaders never understood or sought to understand the people of the Latin American countries or their ways. We know that there was no such thing as a good-neighbor policy existing between those countries and our country before Franklin D. Roosevelt became President of the United States. The election of a Republican nominee would greatly jeopardize all advancement that has been made in this direction through the efforts of our President and our Secretary of State.

There is no issue that has been put forth by the Republican Party which entitles it to a return to power at this time. As in every campaign where no sound issue can be made, false issues are created. The Republican Party knowing that the policies of the Democratic Party carried out by Franklin D. Roosevelt meet with the overwhelming approval of the American people, have dodged all issues relating to those policies. The Republican Party fails to attack the foreign policy or any major legislative act that has been sponsored by the Democratic Party during the past 8 years. In one last desperate effort they brought forth the issue of tradition in an attempt to prevent the nomination of our great leader. And having failed to prevent his renomination by our party, now seek to defeat his election by stating that no President has ever served a third term. In assailing social legislation of the President, this same group called upon the Constitution, and attacked the President for being no respecter of the Constitution. Now, finding nothing in the Constitution to prevent our party from nominating, and the people from reelecting the President for a third term, this group calls upon tradition. This group does not tell you, however, that China is today found where it is because of its refusal to depart from the traditions of its ancestors. This group does not tell you that in fighting each improvement in social legislation, tradition was raised to defeat the legislation. It is with pride that I state that our President has violated tradition since the time that he accepted the nomination of the Democratic Party in 1932, and flew to the convention to make his acceptance speech. He has repeatedly broken tradition after tradition, all in the interest of the American people.

Selfishly, Republican leaders have sought to create in the minds of the people the belief that there was no sound reason why our President should continue in office at this time. It seems clear to me, and I think to a great majority of the American people, that the present condition demanded that our party renominate the President, and that he accept that nomination. He is so closely connected with the two problems which face our country today that separating him therefrom endangers our Nation. Today the life or death of civilization hangs in the balance. Anyone who has kept abreast of the events that are happening today knows that our President has, in no uncertain terms, made clear his position and the position of this country with regard to the Nazis and the Fascists and the Communists. He has assailed the action of those countries on every occasion where they have violated the rights of people and of nations. Those men hate our beloved President just as the Devil hates holy water.

Can any sensible person deny that our first line of defense against these aggressors today is England. Had our President announced, as selfish interests desired him to do, that he would not seek a third term, in deference to a baseless tradition, the effect upon the English people and the Latin American people would have been staggering. Hitler and Mussolini hope for no greater assistance from the United States than repudiation of the President, who has, and is, opposing them. To say that the very existence of our country and of civilization should be gambled against a tradition is almost unbelievable, but that is what the Republican leaders are asking the people to do today. Although this country has not openly declared war, it is in greater danger today than it was ever in during the last World War. The failure to nominate would have been, and the failure to reelect our President will in itself be sufficient to place the Latin American countries under the domination of German and Italian dictators, and destroy all hope that might remain in England to successfully withstand the assault of those nations. And when that happens, the light of civilization will be nearly out. Our President is, in my mind, the greatest man in the world today. If civilization can be saved, he is the one man that can save it. Give light, and the people will find their own way. It is our duty, and my duty, to see that true facts are brought before the people.

Data and Charts Showing Credit Standing of Latin American Countries

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FREDERICK C. SMITH

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 15, 1940

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and insert into the RECORD a compilation of data and charts showing the present credit standing of the Latin American countries.

The Congress now has before it S. 4204, a bill to provide for increasing the lending authority of the Export-Import Bank of Washington, and for other purposes.

The increased amount requested in the bill is $500,000,000. It provides that this money shall be used—

> To assist in the development of the resources, the stabilization of the economies, and the orderly marketing of products of the countries of the Western Hemisphere, Export-Import Bank of Washington is authorized * * * to make loans to any governments and their central banks and, when guaranteed by such governments or their central banks, to the political subdivisions, agencies, and nationals of any such governments * * *.

We are not here concerned with any political or military objectives that may be involved in this proposal to lend enormous sums of money to the Latin American countries. We are here concerned only with the question of the credit standing to each of the Latin American countries. The purpose of the following data is to show the soundness of these proposed loans from the standpoint of the credit rating of the Latin American countries.

However, it should be observed that any political or military objectives that may be sought through these loans will be vitally affected by the ability of our southern neighbors to pay them back. In other words, the extent to which any enduring political or military objectives may be achieved through these loans will depend ultimately on the soundness of the economic processes that may be involved.

It is my opinion that no enduring political or military good could possibly come from this transaction unless it were based strictly on the principles of fair and equitable trade and honest dealing between our Nation and the Latin American countries.

It is only to the extent that the United States would be paid back dollar for dollar and everybody concerned would receive the natural economic benefits that flow from the mutual interchange of goods that any valuable and lasting political or military purposes could possibly be realized.

Predicated on any other basis these $500,000,000 would not become loans in the true sense of this term. They would fall in the category of good-will purchases or outright bribes—ventures hardly to be undertaken by any self-respecting and honorable people, ventures which could result only in grief.

My own study of the credit situation of the Latin American countries convinces me that it is not sound in any of them except a few. This appears to me to be evident from a study of the figures which show the amounts of loans and investments, interest charges, defaults, and so forth. But far more is involved in arriving at a true picture of the soundness of the Latin American credit than a mere study of these figures. The political nature of these countries is a prime factor in evaluating their credit rating. Dictatorships, revolutions, and communism are all rampant in the greater portion of the Latin American states. How these things affect the credit of those nations is shown by Mexico, almost completely communistic, which has expropriated hundreds of millions of dollars worth of American property and investments, Bolivia which has expropriated about $17,000,000 of Standard Oil investments, and Cuba which has just written into her constitution moratorium provisions affecting a large portion of her debts, and other provisions changing contracts, repudiating debts outright, and scaling down interest charges on past contracts.

Nor is this all that is necessary to complete the picture. It would be necessary also to have a comprehensive understanding of the history of the loans made by United States nationals to our neighbors south of the Rio Grande, particularly as was brought out in the hearings before the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, Sixty-eighth Congress, investigating foreign loans, as well as shown by numerous other studies relating to this question.

However, as stated, we believe the following data are in themselves sufficient to determine the quality of the credit of the Latin American countries.

Since this proposal of setting up a program of the Government lending huge sums of money to the Latin American countries has for its principal object the monopolizing of the trade of those countries as against Germany particularly, and since there appears to have been created a fear in certain quarters that this is necessary to preserve our share of that trade because of undue German economic penetration, it is well to study the actual figures to see if they bear out this apprehension.

Following are two tables put out by the Department of Commerce showing the percentage distribution, among leading industrial nations, of the aggregate value of imports and exports of the 20 Latin American republics, 1910–38.

Take first the relative percentages of the exports to the United States, United Kingdom, Germany, and France in 1913 before the World War, in 1919 after the war, and in 1938:

Year	To United States	To United Kingdom	To Germany	To France
1913	30.78	21.24	12.38	7.99
1938	31.50	15.90	10.30	4.00

From these figures it will be seen that the United States purchased from Latin America more goods in 1938 than in 1913 and that Germany had not attained in 1938 her pre-war level of purchases from those countries. England's and France's purchases from Latin America fell off considerably since 1913.

Now as to comparable figures on imports to the Latin American countries:

Year	From United States	From United Kingdom	From Germany	From France
1913	25.03	24.42	16.55	8.32
1919	48.79	15.30	.19	3.28
1938	35.8	12.2	17.1	3.5

From these figures it will be seen that exports from the United States to Latin America rose from the pre-war level of 25.03 to 35.8 percent in 1938, or a gain of 10.77 percent. Germany's exports rose from a pre-war level of 16.55 to 17.1 percent in 1938, or a rise of only 0.55 percent.

These tables clearly show that relatively, England and France have lost a considerable part of their pre-war exports to the Latin American countries, while the United States has gained considerably, and Germany had about regained her pre-war level in 1938.

NOTE.—This table is presented here subject to several reservations: Since the original data on which it is based were expressed in 20 different currency units, it was necessary to convert the statistics into dollars in order to arrive at a common denominator. Since 1931 (and in some cases for earlier years) the rates quoted in some countries have been partly nominal. Furthermore, it is known that the value of imports from Germany, as published by several countries, are overvalued by amounts ranging from 20 to 25 percent, since the corresponding transactions were effected at different rates from those used for customs statistical purposes. It may also be noted that the figures showing the distribution of export trade by countries are incomplete in several instances. Attention may also be called to the fact that this is an over-all calculation and that the share of the United States, for example, varies considerably as regards the individual Latin American countries. The United States furnishes more than half of the total imports of neighboring countries, such as Cuba and Mexico, but the proportion diminishes as the distance southward increases.

No attempt has been made to calculate the shares of Italy and Japan except for the pre-war years 1910 through 1913 and the years beginning 1931. In the pre-war years some of the countries did not show trade with Italy or Japan separately, hence the percentages for those years are based on such figures as were available.

The following population and area figures were taken from the Statesman's Year Book, 1940.

Debt figures were taken from Foreign Bondholders' Protective Council, Inc., 1938 Annual Report, and all figures shown are as of the date of this report.

Figures showing direct investments were taken from American Direct Investments in Foreign Countries, 1936, United States Department of Commerce. These figures, therefore, are as of 1936.

Interest is being paid in full on all issues of the national government issues and the Province of Cardoba; the Provinces of Buenos Aires, Mendoza, and Santa Fe paid interest in accordance with readjustment plans, as did the city of Santa Fe. The city of Cordoba continues in default on its two issues of bonds.

External debt of Argentina in 1937, $370,099,000. Argentina's internal debt increased from $968,598,000 in 1933 to $1,421,773,000 in 1937. (a) Four issues of the United States of Brazil and one funding loan of the United States of Brazil totaling $168,771,745.

(b) Seventeen issues of nine individual states totaling $132,789,000.

(c) Nine issues of three municipalities totaling $54,997,000 or a total of $356,557,745.

Interest and sinking fund on practically all of these issues went into default between June 1931 and December 1932.

See table 5 for full depreciation figures of Brazilian issues from which it will be seen that their market value is only 17.6 percent of their par value.

In addition to her dollar indebtedness, Brazil has the following external indebtedness:

Pound sterling	161,162,578
Gold francs	229,185,500
Francs	624,660,877

or a grand total of	182,281,000

During the year 1938, the amortization bureau purchased dollar bonds to the nominal amount of $33,786,500, and in addition there were redeemed outside of the bureau $2,000.

Interest and sinking fund on all these issues went into default between August 1931 and March 1932.

In addition to the foregoing dollar indebtedness Chile has an indebtedness of £27,884,131 (almost all Republic of Chile) and Swiss francs 110,022,000.

During the year 1938 the amortization bureau purchased £1,254,863 and Swiss francs 6,577,700 face value bonds. In addition, there were redeemed outside the bureau Swiss francs 282,000.

The sterling and franc loans also went into default in 1931–32.

Under the Chilean plan the Chilean Government continues to buy up at default prices bonds that are maintained at those prices through its own action in offering the bondholders but a fraction of the contractural coupon value.

This is virtual repudiation by the Chilean Government of its external debts.

Chile bought up on the market bonds during 1935 of a face amount of $14,674,500 and £14,020 for a total sum of somewhat less than $2,064,125.80, during 1936 of a face amount of $15,839,000, £71,660 and Swiss francs 839,300 for a total sum of somewhat less than $2,459,786.95, during 1937 of a face amount of $13,198,500, £381,820, and Swiss francs 1,727,000 for a total sum of somewhat less than 3,053,000, and during 1938 of a face amount of $33,786,500, £1,254,863, and Swiss francs 6,577,700 for a total sum of somewhat less than $7,067,786.94.

Interest and sinking fund on all these issues, excepting scrip due 1946, went into default between October 1931 and October 1933.

In addition to the foregoing dollar indebtedness, Colombia has an external indebtedness of £2,666,290. The sterling issues went into default when the dollar bonds were defaulted.

The following should be of considerable interest:

Colombia was fortunate in not suffering to the extent that other countries did during the depression of the last 10 years. Also in that time the economic position of Colombia has been constantly improving, and even the slight set-back caused at the end of 1937 and beginning of 1938 by the reversed Brazilian coffee policy was very short lived. All the dollar bonds of Colombia continue in complete default.

See table 5 for full depreciation figures of Colombian issues.

Colombia's external consolidated scrip and floating debt decreased from $85,037,000 in 1934 to $54,363,000 in 1938.

Her internal consolidated and floating debt decreased during the same time from $53,136,000 to $42,372,000.

(a) 2 issues of Republic of Costa Rica totaling	$6,613,000

Grand total of	8,131,720

Also the following additional indebtedness: Pound sterling 1,513,177 and francs 5,811,000.

In 1932 and 1933 the bondholders were offered funding bonds for coupons falling due for the 3-year period immediately following the default. Subsequently Costa Rica, on July 10, 1935, made a further offer to pay for 3 years 50 percent of the interest and 50 percent of the sinking fund on these $2 issues and full service on the funding bonds. Interest and sinking fund on all these bonds, however, went into default in September and November 1936.

The Government of Costa Rica on March 20, 1939, offered for a period of 3 years to pay 30 percent of the face value of the current coupons on their outstanding bonds against surrender of the coupons and to purchase the past-due coupons at the rate of 1 percent per annum of the face amount of the bonds.

The President of Costa Rica in an address to the Costa Rican Congress on May 1, 1939, said:

The purchase of bonds of the foreign debt during the year gave a profit of $5,542,292. Actual profit in the purchase, $4,928,093.02, to which is added the value of the coupons, $614,199.98.

See table 5 for full depreciation figures of Costa Rica's issues.

Costa Rica's external debt increased from $18,387,000 in 1933 to $19,702,000 in 1937.

Only one of the issues, the sugar stabilization sinking fund, 5½ percent secured gold bonds dated December 1930, due December 1940, amounting to $42,000,000, which issues were not publicly offered, are not in default. Amount outstanding of this issue, $3,530,300.

See table 5 for full depreciation figures of Cuba's issues.

Cuba's external, internal, and floating debt decreased from $207,100,000 in 1934 to $205,600,000 in 1938.

Total direct dollar investment, $666,254,000.

The action recently taken by the Cuban Government in writing drastic debt moratorium provisions into her Constitution shows the trend of the Latin American states.

The following is copy of some of the important sections of the recently promulgated Constitution of Cuba:

TRANSLATION OF THE TRANSITORY PROVISION IN THE CUBAN CONSTITUTION REGARDING CIVIL OBLIGATIONS WHICH WAS PROMULGATED ON JUNE 2, 1940

With reference to civil obligations which were the subject of Decree Laws 412, 423, and 594 of 1934, modified by the law of September 3, 1937, whatever be their actual legal or contractual status and whether or not they are subject to moratoria, and also with reference to such obligations subsequent to August 14, 1934, and prior to September 4, 1937, but only when these refer to the payment of amounts the proceeds of or derived from the sale of cane colonias, sugar mills, or stocks representing the ownership of one or the other of these, or this is deduced from the total of the contracts, covenants, or agreements between creditor and debtor, no matter what the nature and class of the security therefor might be, the fulfillment of said obligations shall be governed henceforth by the following rules, which no law may modify:

First. Obligations which do not exceed $1,000 must be amortized on June 30, 1960. Obligations between $1,000 and $50,000 must be amortized June 30, 1965; and on the same date in 1970 if they exceed $50,000. If the obligation is represented by bonds, certificates, obligations, or notes, there shall be considered as principal for the purposes of this transitory provision the total amount of the nominal value represented by such bonds, certificates, obligations, or notes in circulation on August 14, 1934, or September 3, 1937, according to the obligation in question, and they shall be subject to annual amortization payments according to the original contract, or pro rata if they should have the same maturity. Amortization shall be payable annually, beginning June 30, 1942; but if the period agreed to by the parties has not elapsed by that time, said first payment shall be collectible on the June 30 which follows the expiration of the period referred to. In all cases, the principal owed shall be divided among the corresponding annual amortization payments in a progressive form, in order that, together with interest, approximately equal annual payments shall result from the combination of both, and in such manner that the creditor shall be entirely paid upon the expiration of the term determined for the payment of the debt, as already established.

Principal corresponding to ground rents (censos) is excepted from the provisions of this rule.

Second. All interest past due on the effective date of this provision, as well as sums owed for commissions, costs, fines, or other penalties, even though they have been capitalized shall be strictly noncollectible; but, beginning with such effective date, the obligations referred to shall be subject to interest, according to the amount of capital, as determined by decree-laws 412 and 594 of 1934 and in accordance with the rate which results in each case from the application of the following scale: When the principal owed does not exceed $15,000, the obligation shall be subject to interest at 3 percent annually; if it exceeds $15,000 but not $50,000, the obligation shall be subject to interest at 2½ percent annually; when it exceeds $50,000 without exceeding $200,000, at 2 percent; if it exceeds $200,000 and does not exceed $400,000, at 1¾ percent; if it exceeds $400,000 but not $600,000, at 1½ percent; when it exceeds $600,000 without exceeding $800,000, at 1¼ percent; and, finally, when the capital exceeds $800,000, it shall be subject to interest at 1 percent annually. The provisions of this paragraph shall be applied to the obligations referred to in the initial paragraph of this provision, whether or not they are subject to interest either agreed upon or legal, and whatever may be the rate covenanted.

In all cumulative loans, principal shall be considered to be that which the debtor actually received when incurring the obligation, and it shall be considered to have been reduced in the amount of payments made, once deduction has been made of the interest accumulated each year.

This principal, thus reduced, shall be amortized within the periods established by rule 1 or at once, at the will of the debtor.

All interest accumulated on mortgage loans shall be separated in order that interest may be applied only to the unpaid portion of the principal.

Third. The obligations referred to in the first paragraph of this provision, insofar as they affect natural or juridic persons, persons, owners of sugar mills as debtors, or guarantors, shall also be subject to the provisions of the first and second rules, so long as such obligations correspond to debts specifically contracted with a direct or indirect guaranty of sugar mills or cane colonias or so long as they arise from supplies, crop loans, rents, or services owed by said mills; but the amount of annual payments which may be required of them, applicable first to interest and then to amortization of principal, shall be limited according to the following bases: * * *

Fourth. With reference to obligations proceeding or derived from the purchase of building lots on the instalment plan prior to August 15, 1934, whatever the principal may be, the amortization shall be carried out in 30 years, as an exception to the provisions in this regard contained in the first and second rules, which otherwise shall be applicable to them, and in no case shall interest be paid.

This rule shall apply only to lots the instalment price of which does not exceed 3,000 pesos.

Ninth. The obligations guaranteed by pledges up to September 4, 1937, can be redeemed only by the property specifically pledged in the contract, and personal action against the debtor or his guarantors is therefore prohibited.

Thirteenth: * * *

(c) Obligations of the state, province, and municipality as debtors; * * *

(e) Obligations contracted by public-service companies which have the function of distributing electric energy, gas, water, or telephone service, although as subsidiary organizations dependent upon them they have control over sugar mills or cane colonias.

The provisions of paragraph (e) of this rule with respect to public service companies shall not apply to companies with a capital of less than 100,000 pesos and which are not dependent, annexed to, or subsidiaries of, other enterprises.

Guatemala's internal debt, funded and floating, decreased from 7,600,000 quetzales in 1933 to 4,600,000 quetzales in 1937. During the same time her external debt, funded and floating, decreased from 14,600,000 quetzales to 13,800,000 quetzales.

Total direct dollar investment, $50,387,000.

Haiti

[Population in 1936 estimated at about 3,000,000. Area estimated at 10,204 square miles]

Dollar debt:

Interest is being paid in full, but both issues are in default as to sinking fund. Official reports do not include a franc external indebtedness amounting to 26,934,000 francs, French loan of 1910. The Haitian Government called the entire issue for payment at par in 1923. It is understood 50,506 bonds have not been presented for payment.

Public debt of Haiti decreased from $12,166,000 in 1934 to $8,790,000 in 1938.

Total direct dollar investment, $9,671,000.

(a) One national issue of $37,037,500.

(b) Three state issues totaling $3,252,000.

(c) One issue of a corporation with a government guaranty of $21,877,100.

Total direct dollar investment, $479,465,000.

Mexican Government, since 1927, has been expropriating the larger land holdings.

Began in 1938 to expropriate foreign oil interests. Up to present time has expropriated holdings of about 17 corporations, the value of which runs into hundreds of millions of dollars.

Three years ago Mexican Government seized the 49-percent interest in the Mexican National Railway. The Mexican Government had owned 51 percent of it.

A dubious plan was provided for indemnifying parties from whom the 49 percent was taken. I understand no payments are being made under this plan.

Panama

Interest and sinking fund on all these issues went into default between April 1931 and March 1932.

In addition to the foregoing dollar indebtedness, Peru has an external sterling indebtedness of £3,720,900. Most of the sterling bonds have been in default during the same period as the dollar bonds. Some service was met on the sterling Guiana loan.

Despite economic improvement that has characterized the history of Peru during the last few years no payments have been made on the Peruvian dollar bonds other than the small unilateral payment offered on August 25, 1937, as reported in the Council's annual report for 1937. Despite this satisfactory economic position the Peruvian Government still continues in complete default on the dollar bonds. The British Guiana loan is being serviced at the rate of 4 percent interest and 2 percent amortization per annum.

Internal debt of Peru increased from $52,786,000 in 1934 to $57,353,000 in 1938.

Candidate Wendell Willkie Is Asked for "Information, Please"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JED JOHNSON

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 15, 1940

ARTICLE BY JAY FRANKLIN

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I submit a very timely and thought-provoking article by my friend, Jay Pranklin, well-known and widely read newspaper columnist, which appeared in the Washington Evening Star, August 12, 1940. The article is:

[From the Washington Evening Star of August 12, 1940]

WE THE PEOPLE—CANDIDATE WENDELL WILLKIE IS ASKED FOR "INFORMATION, PLEASE"

(By Jay Franklin)

DEAR MR. WILLKIE: There are certain questions which the American people would like to have you answer in your acceptance speech at Elwood. You have been publicized in radio and film as the man who knows all the answers in Information, Please! The mass of the people have not yet made up their minds about you, one way or the other, and have received the impression that you agree with President Roosevelt on foreign policy, with Secretary Hull on trade agreements, and with Henry Wallace on the farm-benefit program. If you are going to draw an issue against the New Deal, it must be on some other grounds than these policies which have been strenuously opposed by the party whose one-man leadership you have assumed since your march on Philadelphia last June.

Now the people want to hear your answers, so, to refresh your mind, I'll put the questions:

You have spoken of the need for the "decentralization of industry," both as an aid to national defense and as a spurt to industrial recovery.

1. Just how do you propose to accomplish this?

2. Have you assurances that the great American industrial empires, with their centralized financial control, will build plants in towns "like the towns scattered all over the State of Iowa"?

3. Just how do you propose to persuade industry to take such a step?

WHAT OF AID TO INDUSTRY?

4. Do you regard patriotism as sufficient motivation or do you feel that industry should be assured of a profit from such decentralization?

5. If industry refuses to fall in line with your proposal, how do you propose to effect it?

6. Do you regard financial assistance by the Government as necessary or even advisable?

7. Do you consider such Government aid, if needed, as "interference with business"? And, if given and accepted, would not such aid imply Government supervision and regulation of business?

8. Would you conscript industry as well as men in the formulation of an adequate national-defense program?

9. Do you regard the availability of cheap electric power as an essential of an adequate national-defense program?
10. If so, would you tap the unlimited sources of cheap electric power provided by T. V. A., Bonneville, Grand Coulee, and other public power developments?
11. Or would you prefer that power be supplied through private generating and distributing systems?
12. If so, how long would it take to make such power available to a decentralized industrial system, and would you propose a Government subsidy to make up the difference between private and public power rates?
13. Do you also advocate the decentralization of financial control of industry?

POSITION ON FOREIGN POLICIES

There are a number of other matters of national interest which you have mentioned, and there are many more that you have not mentioned. They give rise to such questions as these:
14. Just what is your position on international affairs?
15. Do you approve the President's foreign policy?
16. If not, wherein do you differ with him?
17. What do you believe will be the effect upon the political economy of the Western Hemisphere if Germany defeats Britain?
18. What steps do you propose the United States should take to meet that eventuality?
19. Would you favor an "appeasement" with a victorious Nazi Germany after the war?
20. Precisely what is your position with regard to compulsory military training?
21. Do you consider it incompatible with American tradition to train a civilian army in peacetime?
22. If not, just how much training do you consider sufficient and just what age groups should be affected?
23. If you propose to continue the New Deal's farm benefits agricultural program, as you have stated, just precisely what changes would you make in it and why?

WHICH ARE THE CANDY STICKS?

24. Just what concessions do you believe the Roosevelt administration's "candy-stock Government" has made in the last 8 years that should not have been made.
25. Do you regard social security as a "candy stick"?
26. The Wagner Labor Relations Act?
27. The Wage-Hour (Fair Labor Standards) Act?
28. The Security and Exchange Act?
29. The Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation?
30. The United States Housing Authority?
31. The Federal Housing Administration?
32. The Tennessee Valley Authority?
33. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation?
34. The Agricultural Adjustment Administration?
35. The Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation and its food-stamp plan?
36. The Electric Farm and Home Authority?
37. The Rural Electrification Administration?
38. The Civilian Conservation Corps?
39. Work Projects Administration?
40. If not these, precisely what "candy-stick concessions" has the New Deal made that you would not make?

Kentucky Leads in Per Capita Army Enlistments

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BEVERLY M. VINCENT

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 15, 1940

ARTICLE BY LORENZO MARTIN

Mr. VINCENT of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to call the attention of this House to the fact that Kentucky, during the last 6 months, has had the highest per capita voluntary enlistment in the United States Army of any State in the Union. Ranking seventeenth in population, Kentucky ranked fifth in Army enlistments during the first half of 1940, it is pointed out by Lorenzo Martin, Washington correspondent of the Louisville Times. I include Mr. Martin's article in the Louisville Times of August 12, 1940, which shows that if the per capita enlistments elsewhere had equaled the Kentucky figure, the total Army enlistment during the 6 months ending June 30, 1940, would have been almost double the actual figure, which was 74,579.

[From the Louisville Times of August 12, 1940]

STATE RANKS FIRST IN PER CAPITA ENLISTMENT—HAS VOLUNTEER FOR EVERY 856 POPULATION IN LAST 6 MONTHS

(By Lorenzo Martin)

WASHINGTON, August 12.—Kentucky had the highest per capita voluntary enlistment in the United States Army during the first 6 months of this year.

Analysis of figures compiled under direction of Maj. Gen. E. S. Adams, Adjutant General of the Army, shows Kentucky, seventh in population among the States, ranked fifth in number of voluntary enlistments.

Against Kentucky's 3,053 enlistments, Pennsylvania, second in population, enlisted 7,411; Texas, fifth in population, 6,648; New York, first in population, 5,471; North Carolina, twelfth in population, 3,442.

In per capita enlistment Kentucky ranks first with 1 enlistment for every 856 population. Texas was second with 1 enlistment for every 876 population, while Wyoming, second smallest State in population, ranked third with 1 enlistment for every 888 population. The population figures used are the 1930 census.

Of the three States in addition to Texas which reported higher total enlistments than Kentucky, but which, like Texas, had a smaller per capita enlistment than the Bluegrass State, North Carolina showed one enlistment for every 921 population; Pennsylvania, one enlistment for every 1,299 population; and New York, one enlistment for every 2,300 population.

In the last 6 months, therefore, as the war clouds have moved nearer to the United States, the Regular Army's enlistment laurels apparently have been won by Kentucky, with Texas a good second.

Total enlistments for the entire Nation during the last 6 months amounted to 74,579. If there had been the same per capita enlistment elsewhere that was reported in Kentucky, the total enlistment for the Nation would have been about double that figure, or, on the basis of the 1930 census, 143,428.

Foreign Policy Ad Lib

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER D. ANGELL

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 15, 1940

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the current issue of the Saturday Evening Post:

[From the Saturday Evening Post of August 17, 1940]

FOREIGN POLICY AD LIB

In the middle of the world, war to the left of it and war to the right of it, there is a rich country that casts abroad in all directions its likes and hatreds, its sudden thoughts and moral judgments, with neither the sword to make them good nor a mighty foreign policy.

What is the foreign policy of the United States?

We do not know. That could be ignorance. But as we read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD we discover that neither does the Congress know what it is, and we understand that the State Department gets it by revelation and is sure of nothing until it has received the latest daybreak inspiration from the White House. "United States foreign policy," writes a Washington correspondent innocently, "has been put on a 24-hour basis."

There was an American foreign policy, continuous from the beginning, deeply established in our national character, our sentiments, and our circumstances. Its four principal articles were clear and as well known in the world as the name we signed to them or the flag that waved over them.

The first was equal friendliness toward all, no meddling in the political affairs of other nations, and no alliances.

The second was freedom of the seas, with its implications of trade in the free way of trade, no favoritism, no discriminations; the open door.

The third was neutral rights above combatant rights, perfectly phrased by Jefferson, who said: "* * * when two nations go to war, those who choose to live in peace retain their natural right to pursue their agriculture, their manufactures, and other ordinary vocations; to carry the produce of their industry for exchange to all nations, belligerent or neutral, as usual."

The fourth was the Monroe Doctrine, which has been embedded in every international agreement made by or with the United States during more than 100 years. What it meant was that the will of the United States was law in this hemisphere. President Wilson said of it: "The Monroe Doctrine was proclaimed by the United States of America on her own authority. It always has been maintained and always will be maintained upon her own responsibility.

In brief, the Monroe Doctrine, backed by all the resources of the United States of America, says to all the rest of the world, 'Hands off the American Hemisphere.'"

What has happened to this old and sound design for living in the world is the material of current history.

The first thing was that, as the signs of a second world war became ominous, the peace-lovingness of the American character, together with the dread of becoming involved in another European conflict by emotional appeal, united to write and enact a neutrality law in which the two principles for which we had been heretofore willing to fight, and had fought, namely, freedom of the seas in time of war and the superiority of neutral rights, were both surrendered beforehand, on the ground that they were not worth war. This law forbade the sale of arms and ammunition to any belligerent, forbade American ships to enter war zones and forbade American citizens to travel where war was lest they should get themselves killed and so arouse the war passion in their countrymen.

Then it was said that we couldn't get into another European war if we wanted to. We had passed a law forbidding ourselves to do it.

Suddenly, when nobody was prepared for it, President Roosevelt proclaimed in a speech at Chicago that it was the duty of this country, owing to itself, to the world, and to civilization, to do something about the aggressor. With such a self-restraining law on our books, what was it we could do about the aggressor on other continents? The President's idea was that we could unite with the peace-loving nations of Europe, calling these the other democracies, to quarantine him. As to how this might be done there were no particulars. It was an idea only, and as such it did not very greatly intimidate the aggressor. In a contemptuous manner he went on building his war machine.

It was then that another article of our traditional foreign policy broke down. There was a call to moral indignation. The American Government, represented by the President himself, by members of his Cabinet, by the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate, and others, began to utter words of insult and abhorrence against the aggressor nations and their dictators, not only for what they had done but for what they were going to do and for their antidemocratic ideologies. If this was foreign policy it was inconsistent, to say only that of it. Germany, Italy, and Japan were denounced, but Russia was not, because the Roosevelt administration had embraced Russia; and in Asia, even as we denounced Japan for what she was doing to China, we went on arming her for profit. What policy is there?

Gradually the aggressor as a plural image became singular. There was one aggressor above all. His name was Hitler. And the whole world understood that President Roosevelt meant Hitler when he said in his message to Congress, in January 1939, that where words had been powerless to stop the aggressor there were yet ways more effective than words to do it—measures short of war.

Stop Hitler by measures short of war. That was to be the theme of American foreign policy thereafter, and it was theme enough, but it swelled. Several months before the war began the President moved with all his strength to induce Congress to change that self-restraining neutrality law in a way to give him unlimited command of the economic resources of the country in support of his foreign policy, whatever that might be.

This the Congress at first refused to do, and was about to adjourn without doing it, when, on July 4, 1939, at Hyde Park, the President informed the newspaper correspondents (New York Times, July 5) that "Prevention of war in all parts of the world was the first policy of his administration," and that that was why he was demanding that the neutrality law be changed "to give the Executive a free hand to determine when and to what countries American materials of war could be shipped."

So was the foreign policy of the United States disclosed in full splendor. It was not only to stop Hitler, not only to save the forms of Old World democracy from the German system; it was to banish war from the whole world—presumably still by measures short of war. Whether we should agree with it or not, we concede that this might well be the zenith of all foreign policy. But was it policy, in common sense? What had we behind it?

At that question the daybreak dream is shattered. In case the aggressor declared war upon us we were unprepared to fight. Moreover, as it turned out, measures short of war to the utmost, even free and unlimited access to this country's economic resources by the Allies, could not have altered the event in the least. There was not time.

After the war started, the neutrality law was changed. The Allies were free to buy anything they wanted here, and they had accumulated in this country a war chest of billions to buy with; but they couldn't spend the money in time. Seeing this, the President, on his own responsibility and in violation of international conventions to which we were bound by signature, opened the American arsenals to the Allies; and it availed nothing but to increase the aggressor's contempt.

We have now a letter from Secretary Ickes in which he blames us severely for an editorial entitled "And They Were Unprepared," printed June 22. It was unfair, he thinks, because, for one thing, we did not say, as Mr. Ickes says, "It was the Republican Party that systematically blocked defense measures in Congress." It follows from this that the Republicans were to blame for the country's shocking state of unpreparedness; it was their fault, not the President's, that he was caught bluffing with an empty gun.

We waive that dispute. If the country was unprepared, that was a fact. If the President was unable to persuade it to prepare adequately, that also was a fact. Given these two facts, any high-school essayist on foreign policy would know better than to insult, threaten, and provoke on one side the most powerful and fanatical aggressor of modern times, and on the other side the Japanese at the same time, and at last actually to intervene in the conflict with futile measures.

We suppose there is one standard by which all foreign policy must be judged. Does it increase the national security and promote the national well-being? Here we care to say only that we wish the answer to that question were not already so positive, to say nothing of all that may be yet to come.

In a world of new omens we are adrift in a perilous way. The sound old foreign policy by which we steered has been forsaken or stultified, save until the very last the Monroe Doctrine, and now something has happened to that.

Fearful that certain areas pertaining to this hemisphere that had belonged by very old right to European nations now conquered by Hitler, especially some islands in the Caribbean Sea, might pass to the hostile German system, the Congress reaffirmed the Monroe Doctrine with a resolution saying the United States would not permit any geographic region of the American hemisphere to be transferred from one non-American power to another non-American power, as, for example, the island of Martinique from France to Germany. The State Department served notice accordingly upon the powers of Europe, including Germany.

Hitler's reply was to say, in effect: What of your Monroe Doctrine and why bring it up? You meddle in Europe, don't you?

To this studied Germany impudicity the State Department had no ready answer and so decided to say nothing. The foreign policy of the United States had not been slapped. It had only received what in our exquisite vernacular we call the raspberry.

However, this created a situation that seemed to demand another idea to astonish the world. The President had it. On a Saturday morning at Hyde Park he sent his private secretary forth to impart it to the amazed newspaper correspondents.

It was an idea for rearranging the political geography of the world by means of three Monroe Doctrines—one for Europe, one for Asia, and our own. In Europe, let the European nations decide for themselves what disposition to make of their unfastened possessions, and in Asia let the Asiatic nations decide, just as in the American hemisphere the Pan American Nations all together were going to decide what should be done with the islands and areas hereabouts that Hitler might claim by virtue of having conquered the European nations that owned them.

No such interpretation of the Monroe Doctrine had ever been imagined before, nor had any reinterpretation of it been thought possible. The Congress by formal resolution and the State Department in a note to the powers of the world had just been emphasizing again the defensive character of the Monroe Doctrine and that it was vital to the peace and security of the United States. If that were true, how in any case could the operation of it be left to a congress of Pan American Nations in which the United States would have 1 vote in 21? Or would it? Or what? Suppose a Latin American country should go German?

This weird and reckless balloon ride in the firmament of world diplomacy had better be forgotten, Europe and Asia permitting. What concerns us here is the light in which it leaves us revealed to ourselves. Even as to Latin America we have no foreign policy that has been thought through to the first premise.

It is most exciting, and we dare say it is perfectly suited to the President's temperament, to extemporize for this great country day by day a foreign policy, to ad lib it, as the actors say; but in a time of awful events it is also very dangerous. It is dangerous, firstly, because we are facing an aggressor who knows what he wants and pursues it in a resolute manner by plan. It is dangerous, secondly, because a foreign policy is not in itself a design, nor a game. It proceeds, or should proceed, from the national design. It should be a statement to the world of what a nation is, where it is going, how it will live, and what it will fight for. This means that unless a nation has a definite, steadfast, unmistakable foreign policy, intelligible to itself, it will be unable to formulate a sound policy of national defense. It cannot be sure of what it is doing. It will not know beforehand what it is going to defend, or why, or whether it is going to be worth what it will cost. And that is the crucial matter—the problem of national defense.

Compulsory Military Service

OF

HON. JOHN C. KUNKEL

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 15, 1940

LETTER FROM DR. ALTON M. MOTTER

Mr. KUNKEL. Mr. Speaker, some days ago I received a letter from Dr. Alton M. Motter on the subject of the peacetime military-conscription bill. This letter is, in my opinion, one of the best, most concise and most thoughtful expositions of the reasons against conscription that I have heard or read. For that reason, I ask permission to include it in the RECORD as part of my remarks.

My inclusion of this letter is not intended to indicate my opposition to conscription at this time; only my awareness of its dangers and evils. I am still studying the question and waiting to see the final form of the proposal which we will be called upon to approve or disapprove. My ultimate decision will rest upon whether I feel that the bill as presented to Congress is reasonably necessary in order to provide our Nation with a completely adequate defense against aggression by any nations which might seek to attack us and destroy our American way of life.

THE EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH OF THE REDEEMER,
Harrisburg, Pa., July 31, 1940.

The Honorable JOHN C. KUNKEL,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN KUNKEL: For some days I have studied the Burke-Wadsworth conscription bill with much interest as reported by the press. Will you kindly send me a copy of the bill as soon as it is reported out of the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate in order that I may have a first-hand copy for further study? I will also appreciate your reaction to this bill.

In my own thinking, this is the most dangerous piece of legislation ever proposed before our American Congress during any period of peace within our own Nation. If it comes to the House, I sincerely hope that your vote will be against it.

The greatest long-range danger in the bill is the militarization of the American mind. As a matter of fact, this seems to be one of the purposes of those favoring the bill. The press reports Col. Henry L. Stimson testifying on July 2 that he supports military conscription not for its military value but for its propaganda value to arouse America. Mr. KUNKEL, this is nothing more nor less than the prostitution of democracy. To conscript 42,000,000 men between the ages of 18 and 65 as a propaganda step is the highest insult to America's intelligence that I can recall in my lifetime. The question naturally must be raised: If we must conscript manpower to support our Government's policies, then is it not possible that something is wrong with those policies?

The military value of conscription is seriously questioned by Maj. George F. Eliot in the July 2 issue of the New York Herald Tribune. Major Eliot points the new direction modern warfare is taking by quoting Col. Oliver L. Spaulding in his volume, The United States Army in War and Peace, as follows: "The most evident tendencies that may lead to a change are to be found in the increasing use of mechanical power. The airplane, the armored car, the tank, even the humble motor truck, are increasing the complication of operations and their speed. * * * There are indications that the use of power may enable fewer and smaller troop units to do the work of the many larger ones which we now plan to use." Major Eliot continues: "This is not to be achieved by half-trained troops. It was the misfortune of France that the decisive German blow on the Meuse fell upon the French Ninth Army, composed largely of reservists who had had only 1 year's training. * * * If this bill were to be enacted into law, the average American would immediately begin to delude himself with visions of a great army which would give us complete security. In fact, there would be no security; there would be only masses of partially trained men whom we could not arm, equip, or provide leadership for any reasonable time, and if we tried to do so, we would inevitably fatally handicap other elements of our defense forces which are of even greater importance."

The question is raised—"conscription, but conscription for what purpose?" Here, again, Major Eliot, perhaps unconsciously, states his conviction as to our own genuine need for a conscripted army: "A vast universal-service army can be really useful to us only if we are again to undertake large-scale operations in Europe or Asia (in which case we shall have time to create it) or if we are foolish enough to scatter our effort and our resources over too wide a field. * * *" He concludes with this statement: "The lessons of military history must be applied to present conditions, not confined within the rigid limits of outworn conceptions or outmoded legislation."

Mr. KUNKEL, if we need a large conscripted army only for military operations in Europe or Asia, is it the will of the American people that such an army be raised?

The more reasonable course would seem to be to develop not so much a huge army as a good army; not so much to give training to great masses of men—training which is in reality inadequate and which would send them forth to battle unprepared as to develop units of expert troops who are living in 1940—not 1861 or even 1921.

This would seem to be the way of even hard-boiled military sense. ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, JR., in an editorial in the Progressive of July 27, writes: "The power age has changed warfare. One does not have to be an expert to see that huge armies partially trained are a snare and a delusion. The war of movement by great masses of troops is finished. Tanks, airplanes, bombs, and motorized manpower have taken their place. This was proven in France. Most competent critics are agreed that the great masses of foot soldiers in that stricken country were a hindrance rather than an asset when the comparatively small hard-hitting German mechanized divisions swept through the low countries and France itself."

An even more convincing case is made by Hanson W. Baldwin in the current issue of Harper's Magazine. This military expert for the New York Times deals (pp. 236 to 238) with the kind of an army we need now and why the conscription bill should not be passed.

So far, I have talked mostly about the military aspects of this bill. I have done so knowing that in these days of war hysteria only cold-blooded military logic will be of any avail. But as a Christian pastor, I am much more concerned about the effects a conscription law would have upon American spiritual life. To militarize the manhood of America—which is apparently the chief aim of the bill—would be to set the clock of Christian teaching back a hundred years or more in this country. I say that because the military method is not the method of Christ or the followers of Christ, in the settlement of differences which may exist with those of another nation. When the military method—i. e., the method which depends on brute power and brute power alone—grows, then the chances for the peaceful settlement of disputes diminish. We talk about our good-neighbor policy now, but if we conscript American manhood for a single decade the expression will be completely omitted not only from our State Department but from the thinking of our people as well. To me, this is deeply tragic, for this is the way which has led to the downfall of every great nation in the past. These words of Jesus seem eternally true: "He that takes the sword shall perish with the sword." I suppose they are true because when we "take the sword" our faith and trust go to the sword rather than to processes of good will in our relationship with other peoples. And because the method of the sword is dependent upon hate and greed and selfishness it is eventually destroyed by another sword. And so, on and on.

Naturally, I also feel very deeply that such a law would be deeply contrary to true American democracy. Conscription is the seizure of a man's body, time, and service by force under threat of heavy penalty. While some say this is equality, I am afraid it is the equality which prevails among regimented galley slaves and is no more democratic than any other form of involuntary servitude.

While we used the conscription method in 1917 and 1918 for the first time on a universal basis, it is pointed out that this would not have been necessary if we had been raising a force for the defense of our territory rather than an army of 5,000,000 men for service in Europe.

Nor do I think it is necessary to be used today—in a time of peace—to defend the United States of America. The plan savors more of the Nazi policies of Germany than anything America has ever seen. Are democratic methods so hopeless that regimentation is necessary? To agree with that would be to confess that American people have grown decadent and that they must be conscripted to prepare for the possible task of defending their country.

I refuse to believe this. American youth are refusing to volunteer mainly because of dagger-waving speeches which will cost them their blood on the battlefields of Europe or Asia for the defense of European imperialisms, not for the defense of America or even yet of democracy.

Thanking you for your fair consideration of those proposals aimed to keep this country out of war and for your own deep-seated interest in keeping the long-range welfare of our country in first place, I am,

Most sincerely,

ALTON M. MOTTER, Pastor.

States' Rights

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM P. LAMBERTSON
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 15, 1940

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, on the 10th day of last June, President Roosevelt vetoed the bill to provide for intervention by States in certain cases involving the validity of any power by the United States, or any agency thereof.

This was a States' rights bill.

On last Monday, August 5, this House passed the bill over the President's veto by the overwhelming vote of 253 to 46.

In the debate the able and distinguished gentleman from Alabama, Judge HOBBS, pleaded for the passage of the bill "in the name of justice, in the name of statehood, in the name of that theory of States' rights which has been proclaimed in every lawbook in which there appears a Supreme Court decision on the subject, and thereby give to the States the rights therein provided." Mr. Speaker, if there is one State in the Union more than another that stands for and has always advocated States' rights as a fundamental and cardinal doctrine and principle in our form of government, it is the old Free State of Maryland.

That State has unswervingly exemplified and adhered to that principle throughout its colonial and constitutional history. It has resented any encroachment upon its sovereignty from without and has insisted upon its rights. It is recent history that when President Roosevelt undertook to purge a Maryland Senator because of his opposition to certain New Deal policies, chiefly his Court-packing scheme, and to interfere in an election with the free exercise of their right to manage their own affairs, the people of Maryland rose in their indignant might and repudiated such interference.

And so has it always been. The love of freedom and of home rule is inherent in the citizens of that old Free State. The principle of States' rights therein is bred in the bone and is of the warp and woof of its citizenry.

I was not surprised, therefore, upon an examination of the vote to pass the Satterfield bill over the President's veto that four of Maryland's Representatives in the House, namely, Messrs. COLE, D'ALESANDRO, KENNEDY, and WARD, were true to the Maryland tradition and principle of States' rights and voted to override the veto.

But I was also surprised to find that one member of the Maryland delegation, Mr. BYRON, of the Sixth Congressional District, was one of the 46 Members who voted against the bill. The gentleman from Maryland, Mr. BYRON, did not speak on the bill. I am therefore at a loss to know for what reason he departed from the time-honored principle of States' rights, so characteristic of Maryland freemen, unless it was through ignorance of that principle, or else his forgetfulness of it in a desire to uphold the objections of a Chief Executive whose attempt to purge a Maryland Senator was frustrated by the good people of the gentleman's own State.

I am wondering what reason or excuse the gentleman will give to the people of the Sixth Congressional District of Maryland for having voted for a bill of such vital interest to the people of that State in their relationship to the Federal Government and how he will undertake to reconcile his position against the bill in the face of its support by his four colleagues who voted for it.

Of course, the gentleman exercised his right to vote as he pleased, but I think he will have a lot of explaining to do.

In the coming campaign the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. BYRON] will have as his opponent for a seat in this House the national and favorably known candidate, my friend, Walter Johnson, a man of impeccable character as a citizen and as a successful dirt farmer in Montgomery County, Md., an example to the youth of this country of the value of thrift and clean living.

I doubt not that if Mr. Johnson had been a Member of the House on last Monday he would have voted with his four Democratic colleagues from Maryland to sustain the principle of States' rights so dear to the hearts of the people of that great State.

Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted by the House, I insert the following editorial from the Washington Post of August 7, entitled "Unreasonable Veto," in which it will be noted that it advocates passage of the bill in question by the Senate "so that the States may have an unquestioned right to lay their arguments, in constitutional disputes involving their powers, before the Federal courts":

UNREASONABLE VETO

In the excitement over war in Europe and national defense in this country a recent Presidential veto of an important bill passed almost without notice. To the credit of the House, it reverted to that issue on Monday and repassed the bill over Mr. Roosevelt's veto by a vote of 253 to 46.

Three years ago Congress was much concerned by the problem of threshing out constitutional issues in the courts. It properly decided that the Federal Government should have the right to intervene in lawsuits involving the validity of acts of Congress. Moreover, it permitted direct appeals to the Supreme Court in disputes of this character to which the United States is a party.

There is no question now as to the wisdom of that action. Congress has merely taken note of the fact that the States as well as the Federal Government have vital interests in lawsuits in which the powers of their respective governments are involved. Representative SATTERFIELD told the House that in nearly all the major cases establishing precedents for the exercise of National or State authority the States have not been parties to the litigation.

The House insists that the States should have the same rights to intervene to protect their constitutional powers against encroachment as has the Federal Government. It is difficult to see how there can be any reasonable dissent from that view. According to Congressman HOBBS, the bill was amended before its original passage to meet every objection raised by the Department of Justice and other Federal agencies.

The Post does not attempt to pass judgment upon the technical details of this bill. It is clear, however, that few Members of the House—a body in which the legal profession is abundantly represented—found merit in the President's veto message. Unless the Senate discovers defects justifying the substitution of another bill, it should also override the veto so that the States may have an unquestioned right to lay their arguments, in constitutional disputes involving their powers, before the Federal courts.

New Deal Preparedness for Coming Election

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 15, 1940

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, the administration is very gently easing out the news to the Nation that W. P. A. jobs are about to increase again.

The answer is that this is a campaign year. Despite the fact that this increase in W. P. A. jobs will come at a time when a rise in the activity of industry is already under way does not appear to bother the New Deal bureaucrats who have long since, apparently, come to regard W. P. A. as the happy hunting ground of the politicians.

In the smoke screen of war fears and national defense hysteria that has been created by the administration, relief has been relegated to the background of public thinking. And yet this Congress has appropriated $975,000,000 to support W. P. A. this year, with the provision that this sum of money may be spent in 8 instead of 12 months. Signs are accumulating that this money will be spent in the shorter period, which means that expenditures for relief will be as great as they were last year.

Recently the gentleman from Michigan, Representative PAUL W. SHAFER, of the Third Michigan District, revealed to the House of Representatives figures showing a startling increase in the printing of blank relief checks and food stamps by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. Within a week, Representative SHAFER disclosed, orders for 10,000,000 blank relief checks were received by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. This was more blank checks than had been printed by the Bureau in the last 9 months. Three million of these checks were printed for use in Minnesota, whose Governor is Harold E. Stassen. Other blank checks were for use in Illinois, New York, Michigan, and other key political States. More food stamps were shipped out in 3 days recently from the Bureau of Engraving and Printing than had been shipped out in the entire history of the food-stamp plan. The supply went to Brooklyn, Minneapolis, Cleveland, and other politically strategic centers.

The administration claims, of course, that the W. P. A. is not affected by the armament program or national-defense activities, although it is very difficult to see why this is so. It does remain a fact, however, that the past record of the New Deal administration discloses the reason why the relief rolls will rise again during this campaign. In the past, Federal relief rolls have greatly increased from June through October in each election year, while they have declined in the same period in nonelection years.

In 1933, a nonelection year, the number of persons on Federal relief declined 15.4 percent during those months, although the index of industrial production, reflecting employment, had also declined 16.5 percent in that period. Yet in the election year of 1934 the number of persons on Federal relief increased 11.6 percent from June through October.

In 1935, a nonelection year, the Federal relief rolls showed a decline of 9.6 percent from June through October; but in 1936, an election year, the Federal relief rolls increased 14.4 percent, although unemployment in that period had been reduced 13 percent.

In 1937, when there was no election, the Federal relief rolls showed a decline of 16.9 percent from June through October, although the index of industrial production also declined 10.5 percent in that period.

In 1938, an election year, the Federal relief rolls showed an increase of 19.2 percent, although unemployment declined 9 percent from June to October of that year. In 1939, when there was no election, the number on relief declined 25.5 percent for the months preceding the usual election date.

So it is not surprising that in this campaign year we should again be told that the relief rolls are going to rise although industrial activity has risen very greatly. It is easy enough for the bureaucrats to find excuses to show why the activities of industry in national defense are not relieving unemployment. The bureaucrats claim, of course, that the effect of these huge expenditures will not be felt for a year or two. They also claim that most of the workers on relief are unskilled labor and the demand in national defense is for skilled labor. And so the story goes. But the glaring fact remains that ever since the New Deal administration has been in power the relief rolls have risen in election periods and have declined in nonelection periods. Harry Hopkins, former W. P. A. administrator and one of the managers of Mr. Roosevelt's third-term campaign, as well as Secretary of Commerce, gave the blunt answer when he said in a press conference on July 21, 1938:

> We got about 3,000,000 people working for us, and they are Americans like ourselves, and no one can tell them how to vote * * * they have their own political views, and incidentally I think I know what their views are. * * * At least 90 percent of them are for Roosevelt.

The Outstanding Record of Achievement in Promotion of Industrial Peace in the United States, Under the National Labor Relations Act, Challenges Comparison

OF

HON. ABE MURDOCK

OF UTAH

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 15, 1940

ADDRESS BY J. WARREN MADDEN, CHAIRMAN, NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD, AND A PRESS RELEASE BY THE BOARD

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. Mr. Speaker, for 5 years now we have had the National Labor Relations Act on the statute books of the National Government. Notwithstanding the fact that 2 years of that time passed under the misconceived and misguided opinion of a large number of Liberty League lawyers that the law was unconstitutional, greater strides toward the goal of industrial contentment and peace have been made in these 5 years than in our entire previous history as a nation. Having supported the act and having kept in close touch with the achievements under it, I take pleasure today in submitting, for your consideration, a speech made by the Chairman of the National Labor Relations Board, Hon. J. Warren Madden, over the National Broadcasting Co. network, on July 5, 1940, and a press release from the Board, covering its work under the act, dated August 8, 1940:

LABOR AND NATIONAL DEFENSE

Five years ago today President Roosevelt signed the National Labor Relations Act. Today, then, is the anniversary of our national determination to accord to workmen of America the rights of citizenship in an industrial democracy. That is to say that those who tool and tend machines, those who dig and fabricate metals, those who spin, weave, mold, rivet, and assemble the articles of our daily use and enjoyment shall have a collective voice in negotiating the terms of their employment.

Five years ago collective bargaining was largely a pious theory, granted under pressures to those relatively few organizations of workers strong enough to insist upon it. Today it has been accepted by the great majority of employers who in 1935 rejected and fought it.

This is a change which needs appraisal. We are embarked as a Nation on a program of national defense. Government determines the measures of defense. Employers accept the responsibility of production. It is the millions of workers whose trained hands produce the actual products. It is essential that the relationship between employers and employees be a just one.

There are only two choices. Either the employer shall name the terms upon which he shall let men work for him, or else those terms shall be the result of bargaining between the employer and the representatives of his employees. At this moment of resurgence of national energy in production it is well to look to the experience of the past to see whether on July 5, 1935, we chose wisely in promoting the procedure of collective bargaining under the National Labor Relations Act.

The search for a parallel situation leads us at once to the intense preparation program pursued 23 years ago after the declaration of war on April 4, 1917. We were not, at that time, geared to produce goods adequate for the emergency need. We were in danger of the unrest which ferments when unorganized workers seek to fit their individual needs to fast-changing industrial conditions. Let me illustrate. The government of Woodrow Wilson said that ships must be built quickly and in quantity. Contracts were awarded. Shipyards sprang up on rivers that had not seen the laying of a keel since clipper days. Workmen gathered outside the new shipyard gates, the skilled and the unskilled, the unemployed, and the employed who hoped to better their wages. Such an unorganized labor market is no boon to an employer. Restless men come and go, and the cost of the turn-over is assessed on those who stay. There is no economy in this. It merely means chaos for the employer, for the worker, and for the Government whose need they jointly serve.

The Nation soon found this out in 1917. A shipbuilding labor adjustment board was established in August of that year to achieve uniform wage scales, to adjust wages to meet the increasing cost of living, to organize shop committees of workmen, to settle grievances—to do everything in fact which organized labor and organized employers achieve when they meet in good will across the bargaining table.

Shipbuilding, I have used as an example. Before the World War was over the unrest of the unorganized in other vital industries led to the establishment of adjustment boards for labor relations on the docks, on ships, on railways, in the fuel, clothing, food, packinghouse, and construction industries.

Piecemeal the labor adjustment boards served well the national cause in 1917 and 1918. Of more over-all importance was the National War Labor Board, contrived at the initial suggestion of employers to safeguard production by relieving employee unrest. This is the first clause in the statement of War Labor Board policy:

"The right of workers to organize in trade-unions and to bargain collectively, through chosen representatives, is recognized and affirmed. This right shall not be denied, abridged, or interfered with by the employers in any manner whatsoever."

If those words are familiar to you, it is because they were embodied almost verbatim in the National Labor Relations Act which President Roosevelt signed 5 years ago today. These words have not lost their validity. In fact it is to be regretted that a Federal law to protect collective bargaining was not passed immediately after the 1918 armistice. To remind you what informed people were thinking in 1918, I quote a public statement made shortly after the armistice by Charles Evans Hughes, who said:

"I trust there will be no more struggles in futile opposition to the right of collective bargaining on the part of employees. The recognition of the right of representation and the prompt hearing of grievances provide the open doors to reasonable and just settlements. And in returning to peace conditions there should be the utmost care to preserve every possible means which has been found helpful during the war for the investigation of the complaints of labor and for the adjustments of demands."

This expectation of the present Chief Justice was to be almost immediately disappointed. No sooner had the protecting hand of government been lifted than employers refused to recognize the unions with whom they had been dealing. The door of the bargaining room was locked. The channels for grievances were destroyed. Disappointed workers laid down their tools to force from employers rights which the law no longer accorded them. In 1919 half a million coal miners and about 400,000 steel workers struck and were beaten to their knees. A victorious Nation, whose employees and employers only a year before had worked in amity for national security, relapsed into savage industrial warfare. The year 1919 saw more than 4,000,000 workers on strike, the greatest number in our history, with a billion dollars lost in wages and property, and an incalculable destruction of the good will and stability which might have flowed from the collective-bargaining procedure during the decade ahead.

Industrial management in the 1920's engrossed its energies in corporate consolidations and the application of new techniques to mass production. The 1920's learned how to produce, advertise, and sell in the grand manner, but not how to govern human relationships in industry. That problem was left to the 1930's. Exactly in the middle of that decade your Government, distressed by endless strikes by workers seeking to enforce collective bargaining on unwilling employers, decided to abandon half-way measures and to give full protection to that procedure under the National Labor Relations Act.

I have not time to review the first 5 years of attacks upon the act, the injunction suits, the refusals to comply with the law, the review of Board rulings in the courts, the split in labor's own ranks, the conscious distortion of the act's aims, and what has amounted to a boycott on the facts which show its gradual acceptance as a wise working principle in American industrial life.

If today at last we have truly set our eyes upon industrial democracy, as we did briefly in 1917 and 1918, we have present reason to believe we shall not again relapse as a Nation into industrial savagery. The times call upon us for cooperation of men and management. The intensity of preparation for national security again will require that the hand of Government will protect collective bargaining. Most hopeful of all is the fact that the contractual relationship between strong unions and strong employers has gained more ground during the past few years than you probably realize.

Five years ago there were few if any labor agreements in many of our basic defense industries. Today 600 iron and steel companies employing 550,000 steel workers are under union agreements, 70 agreements have been written to cover about 50,000 rubbers workers, the automobile industry has binding agreements between 340 companies and 400,000 union members, the electrical industry has more than 600 labor agreements. Written agreements, renewed year after year, apply in the majority of the Nation's machine shops. Rail and water transport and the longshoremen who serve the ships are almost entirely covered by agreements. Soft coal mining is entirely organized and petroleum production partially.

Why during the past 5 years has the written agreement made such headway. The answer is that these contracts have earned their salt. They have decreased employment turn-over, increased stability of production, placed responsibilities on union shop stewards instead of on armed company guards, and have accorded workmen that independence as men which alone can assure loyalty to any enterprise. It is my guess that employers who have lived a year or two under written labor agreements would not go back to the open shop if they could.

A nation anxious for its security should be grateful for the new order that has found roots in American industry. We at the Labor Board have watched fear and labor-spy ridden industrial towns change to self-respecting communities as soon as the employer's supposed need to govern by force was relieved by open negotiations with his workers. We have watched the initial warfare continue sporadically even after recognition of a union, until time and responsibility ripened the relationship into an understanding between industrially mature men. We have reason at the Labor Board, because we have been close to what has happened, to believe that American workmen have courage and fairness and a will to contribute to the common good.

If you are concerned with the possibility of strikes interrupting defense preparations, let me assure you that the trend of strikes has been sharply downward since workmen have been allowed to organize. In the year 1937 the National Labor Relations Act was upheld as constitutional by the Supreme Court. During the next year strikes declined 42 percent, and during last year, 1939, strikes were 45 percent lower than in 1937.

Now consider these declines in some of the basic industries. We find that the number of iron and steel workers on strike declined 84 percent in 1938 and 92 percent in 1939, as compared to 1937; in nonferrous metals the decline was 73 and 79 percent. Similar decreases in the number of men on strike appear in textiles, in rubber, in machinery manufacturing, in transportation and communication, in lumber, and in marine transportation. The industries which ran counter to this improving trend were few and relatively unimportant.

Upon this record I confidently assert that the protection of the rights of workmen under the National Labor Relations Act has fostered a procedure which permits men and management the widest scope for cooperative adjustment of the thousand and one problems which plague every industrial enterprise. The problems are inherent. The cure must be of man's invention; and there the choice seems to lie between an autocratic control of industry and the usages of democracy.

During the past 5 years it has required the handling of 27,000 cases, the conduct of thousands of hearings and elections, and the pleading of hundreds of cases in court in order to establish compliance with the National Labor Relations Act. In another 5 years, if rights of workmen to organize and bargain collectively make comparable gains in industrial practice, the function of the National Labor Relations Board will be reduced to that of a routine traffic officer. On this, its fifth birthday, my best wish for the act is its decreasing need as an instrument to bring together employers and employees in democratic adjustment of their mutual problems.

Disputes Drop Despite Industrial Upswings

Industrial disputes remain at low levels despite increased industrial activity, the National Labor Relations Board announced today.

Comparison of the 2 fiscal years of 1936–37 and 1939–40, representing approximately equal levels of industrial activity, reveals that industrial strife has been greatly reduced, it was pointed out.

The Federal Reserve production index registered 114 during the fiscal year ending 1937, as compared with 111 during 1940.

However, during the two periods, respectively, the total of strikes numbered 3,840 and 2,147, a drop of 44 percent.

Workers involved dropped from 1,743,192 to 641,933, or 63.2 percent. Man-days of idleness fell from 26,998,000 to 9,077,000, or 66.4 percent.

Comparison confined to strikes for recognition and against discrimination, involving matters directly concerning the National Labor Relations Act, reveal similar declines during the two periods under review, it was pointed out.

Between the two 9-month periods—July 1936–March 1937 and July 1939–March 1940—the number of such strikes declined by 43 percent; and in terms of number of workers the decline was 73 percent. During the former period recognition and discrimination strikes represented 42 percent of all strikes; during the latter period the proportion fell to 32 percent. In terms of number of workers involved the percent declined from 54 to 25 percent. (Detailed data on recognition and discrimination strikes are available only up to March 1940.)

"Although the sharp decline in industrial strife since 1936–37, when industrial production almost reached the 1929 level, may be variously attributed, there is no doubt that a major factor has been the growth of labor organization and extension of collective bargaining in recent years, arising largely out of the existence and administration of the act," Chairman J. Warren Madden said, in commenting upon the figures. "Economic factors, such as relative stability of cost of living and maintenance of wage rates during the 1938 recession also had some influence."

"This sharp decline in industrial strife between periods of comparable industrial activity," he added, "would seem to indicate that a good part of the readjustments in industry accompanying enforcement of the act have been accomplished, thus making probable relative peace and stability in industrial relations during the coming period. Also, this decline in strike activity, together with the wide-spread increase in written trade agreements providing machinery for adjustment of disputes, should facilitate realization of our national-defense objectives."

At the same time the Board released its monthly summary showing that since the start of operations in the fall of 1935 it had averted and settled 2,949 strikes involving 471,075 workers.

The data showing Board activities up to July 1, 1940, follows:

N. L. R. B. Handled 28,661 Cases to July 1, 1940, Involving 6,233,319 Workers

A total of 28,661 cases has been handled by the Board. This figure includes action on charges of unfair labor practices and petitions for elections received by the Board and its 22 regional offices. The cases involved 6,233,319 workers.

The data show Board activities up to July 1, 1940. During June 529 new cases arose, involving 85,726 workers, as against 577 new cases during the previous month, involving 103,759 workers.

Of the 529 cases filed during June, 242 cases, involving 25,183 workers, were filed by A. F. of L. unions. C. I. O. affiliates filed 193 cases, involving 33,224 workers. Unaffiliated unions and individuals filed 90 cases, involving 26,933 workers, and in 4 cases, involving 386 workers, employers filed petitions.

The Board announced that 25,608 of the cases handled, or about 89 percent, have been closed, leaving 3,053 cases pending on July 1.

Of these 25,608 cases, 12,309, or 48 percent, were closed by agreement of both parties, involving 2,006,495 workers.

Four thousand three hundred and thirty-one, or 17 percent, involving 1,145,159 workers, were dismissed by the Board and regional directors.

Six thousand nine hundred and seventy cases, or 27 percent, involving 1,301,268 workers, were withdrawn.

One thousand nine hundred and ninety-eight cases, or 8 percent, involving 684,966 workers, were closed in some other way, including compliance with the Board's decisions and trial examiners' intermediate reports, certification after elections, refusal by Board to certify, intermediate report finding no violations, transfer to other agencies, such as the Conciliation Service of the Department of Labor and State labor relations boards, and by the issuance of cease and desist orders.

Of a total of 2,806 strike cases handled, involving 445,518 workers, 2,100, or 75 percent, were settled and 275,510 workers were reinstated after strikes and lock-outs.

An additional 20,556 workers were reinstated after discriminatory discharges.

Eight hundred and forty-nine threatened strikes, involving 195,565 workers, were averted through the Board's action.

There were 3,257 elections held in which 1,194,781 valid votes were cast.

During the 57 months of the Board's operation a total of 19,148 cases, involving 3,368,237 workers, were filed charging that employers had engaged in or were engaging in unfair labor practices defined in the act. The Board has received, up to July 1, 1940, a total of 9,513 petitions asking either certification of representatives or the holding of elections under Board supervision to determine the bargaining agencies of the employees. A total of 2,865,082 employees joined in these petitions. Seventy-one of these petitions, involving 208,407 workers, were filed by employers.

Cases closed during June, 579, involving 106,420 workers.

Agreement of both parties reached in 253 cases, representing over two-fifths of the total cases closed during June, and involving 35,655 workers.

Thirty-eight cases, involving 7,173 workers, were closed by compliance with Board decisions and trial examiners' intermediate reports.

Twenty-nine cases, involving 7,880 workers, were closed by certification after elections.

Cases dismissed by the Board and regional directors, 97, involving 13,152 workers.

Cases withdrawn, 154, involving 39,960 workers.

Two cases, involving 2,500 workers, were transferred to other regional offices.

Six cases, involving 100 workers, were closed since the Board decided not to proceed with further action.

As a result of settlements secured by the activities of the Board, employers agreed to pay $50,413 in back pay to 199 workers who were alleged to have been discriminated against.

In 38 cases under consideration of the Board or its offices, 4,432 workers were out on strike, and 24 of these cases were settled during the month by agreements between the parties.

Eleven threatened strikes, involving 2,598 workers, were averted through the Board's action.

Three thousand three hundred and seventy-four workers were reinstated after strikes or lock-outs during June.

One hundred and eighty-six workers were reinstated after discriminatory discharges.

During June the Board conducted 98 elections, of which 59 were held by the consent of all parties and 39 by direction of the Board. This excludes one election which the A. F. of L. lost, though the final results have not yet been received. About 40,245 workers were eligible to participate in these elections, and 36,849 workers, or 90 percent of those eligible, actually cast their ballots. A total of 36,320 ballots were considered valid.

Of the 36,320 valid votes cast, 3,604 votes were cast for A. F. of L. affiliates in the 56 elections in which they participated, 18,834 votes were cast for C. I. O. affiliates in 49 elections, and 6,067 votes were cast for unaffiliated unions in 18 elections. In addition, 7,398 votes were cast against all unions and 417 votes were cast "for neither" when more than one union appeared on the ballot.

Of the 98 elections, 77 elections were won by labor organizations. The A. F. of L. won 40 elections, the C. I. O. won 26 elections, the unaffiliated unions won 11 elections. In the remaining 21 elections no union was successful.

In 14 elections A. F. of L. and C. I. O. unions appeared on the same ballot. The A. F. of L. won 7 elections, the C. I. O. won 4 elections, and in 3 elections neither union was successful.

Dictatorship or Defense?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL W. SHAFER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 15, 1940

MEMORANDUM BY ERRETT G. SMITH, WASHINGTON ATTORNEY AND WORLD WAR VETERAN

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I include the following memorandum, entitled "Dictatorship or Defense?" prepared by Mr. Errett G. Smith, prominent Washington attorney and World War veteran. It presents the proposition that it is unconstitutional to call the National Guard of the States into the Federal service "for training" and suggests that the passage today by the House of Representatives of the so-called National Guard bill may be a further move in the direction of dictatorship.

DICTATORSHIP OR DEFENSE

The President may not legally call National Guard (the militia) into Federal service "for training" either with or without legislation by Congress.

An attempt to do so would be unconstitutional.

The "authority of training the militia" is one of the things the Constitution specifically reserves "to the States respectively" (Constitution, art. I, sec. 8, clause 16).

This is one of the basic elements whereby the Constitution preserves to the States their rights and prevents dictatorship by any person or clique within the Federal Government.

Power already exists for the President to "call forth" the militia:

1. When Congress has (a) declared a national emergency; and (b) authorized the use of our armed land forces for any purpose requiring use of troops in excess of those of the Regular Army (title 32, U. S. C. A., sec. 81);

2. Whenever the United States is invaded or in danger of invasion from any foreign nation or of rebellion against the authority of the Government of the United States, or the President is unable with the regular forces at his command to execute the laws of the Union (title 32, U. S. C. A., sec. 81a); or

3. To enforce the faithful execution of the laws of the United States or to suppress rebellion against the authority of the Government of the United States (title 50, U. S. C. A., sec. 202).

MILITIA A STATE ORGANIZATION

The principle of the militia being always in peacetime an agency of the several States has never been changed since the foundation of our Government, nor has it ever been seriously questioned. In 1861 the United States Attorney General explained that the obvious theory of the Constitution and of the acts of Congress based on it is that while Congress shall prescribe by general rules a uniform militia system for the States, securing the enrollment of all able-bodied white male citizens and maintaining the system of discipline and field exercise observed in the Regular Army, yet that the details of the militia organization and management shall be left to the State governments, requiring only that an annual report of the condition of the service in each State shall be made to the President. (Power of President to Create a Militia Bureau in the War Department (10 Op. Atty. Gen. 13).)

No doubt it was in order to maintain this set-up that the original constitutional restriction was made; that is, to assure the militia being under the authority of their respective States during their training periods.

WHICH IS BETTER METHOD IN A DEMOCRACY—FRANKNESS OR INDIRECTION?

If sufficient reason exists for calling out the National Guard, why should not the country expect those responsible for doing it to have the political guts to do so directly, rather than to devise a new cover-up method which does not divulge the actual reason? There could be no more favorable circumstance for getting a dictatorship started than to have all of the Nation's armed forces under one centralized control for long periods during peacetimes. However, when the National Guard is called out for one of the purposes for which Congress already has legitimately provided, the situation is quite different. Then they are frankly engaged in one of the functions for which they are maintained. Moreover, the country fully understands the move and hence may judge it on its true merits.

EXISTENT POWERS AMPLE TO ALLOW THE PRESIDENT TO CALL OUT NATIONAL GUARD EVEN AGAINST THE DANGER OF INVASION

The Supreme Court (opinion by Mr. Justice Story), in a decision rendered more than 113 years ago, and which does not appear ever to have been seriously challenged, said: "* * * the power to provide for repelling invasions includes the power to provide against the attempt and danger of invasion, as the necessary and proper means to effectuate the object. One of the best means to repel invasions is to provide the requisite force for action before the invader himself has reached the soil" (Martin v. Mott (N. Y., Feb. 2, 1827), 25 U. S. (12 Wheat.) 19, 29).

This interpretation of the act of 1795 was in answer to the two contentions raised: (1) That the act of 1795 was not within the constitutional authority of Congress; and (2) that Congress may not lawfully provide for cases of imminent danger of invasion, as well as for cases where invasion has actually taken place. The Court, after mentioning these contentions, said that "In our opinion there is no ground for doubt on this point," and then proceeded to declare the rule, as above stated.

The Court said further: "We are all of opinion, that the authority to decide whether the exigency has arisen, belongs exclusively to the President, and that his decision is conclusive upon all other persons" (p. 30). The opinion proceeds to explain why this is true—the service in question being a military service, requiring prompt and unhesitating obedience, and continues thus: "The power itself is to be exercised upon sudden emergencies, upon great occasions of State, and under circumstances which may be vital to the existence of the union" (p. 30).

The Court thus replied to the objection that such a strong power might be abused: "It is no answer, that such power may be abused, for there is no power which is not susceptible of abuse. The remedy for this, as well as for all other official misconduct, if it should occur, is to be found in the Constitution itself. In a free government, the danger must be remote, since, in addition to the high qualities which the Executive must be presumed to possess, of public virtue, and honest devotion to the public interests, the frequency of elections, and the watchfulness of the representatives of the Nation, carry with them all the checks which can be useful to guard against usurpation or wanton tyranny" (p. 32).

Previously, the Court, in referring to the constitutional power for "calling forth" the militia, had said: "The power thus confided by Congress to the President is, doubtless, of a very high and delicate nature. A free people are naturally jealous of the exercise of military power; and the power to call the militia into actual service is certainly felt to be one of no ordinary magnitude. But it is not a power which can be exercised without a correspondent responsibility. It is, in its terms, a limited power, confined to cases of actual invasion or of imminent danger of invasion" (p. 29).

NOTE.—This power is less limited than when the decision quoted from was rendered, because the word "imminent" was removed from the statute in 1903 or earlier (title 32 U. S. C. A., sec. 81 a).

The Supreme Court, in this Martin case, reversed the judgment of the lower court, thus rendering it against the militiaman who had been called but who had refused to rendezvous.

DEFENSE

It is not desired herein to suggest anything which in any manner needs to impede the national-defense program, but rather to show that, as to legality, there is a right way and a wrong way to do that job, so far as pertains to the method of obtaining additional Army personnel.

The right way: To increase the strength of the Regular Army.

The wrong way: To attempt to pervert the National Guard's proper function; that is, from being always, in time of peace, a State militia.

DICTATORSHIP

The only purpose a well-advised Federal official could have in planning to call the National Guard into Federal service "for training" (in view of the constitutional provision reserving that function to the States) would be in furtherance of dictatorship. The National Guard units in the several States, if not already purloined by the Federal Government, well might have proved to be the people's only bulwark against a power-mad Federal official when he decides to try more completely to take over. Can we assume that those advisers who know the technique of revolution have been unaware of this one-time obstacle to their drive for power; or that they would not thus (meaning, by seeking to put over H. J. Res. 555 or S. J. Res. 286) try so expertly further to sabotage (from the States' point of view) the militia in advance?

It is the purpose of this memorandum to point out this dictatorship squeeze play and to indicate why Congress should not permit it to proceed any further; and, perhaps, also why Congress should correct the part of it already perpetrated; that is, in June 1933, when the States' militia organizations were nationalized.

DO THE STATES NOW, IN A REALLY EFFECTIVE SENSE, HAVE A NATIONAL GUARD OR MILITIA?

A new element was added by the act of June 15, 1933, to the definition of what the Army of the United States shall consist of. That new element was "the National Guard of the United States." The definition continued to carry, as it had done before, "the National Guard while in the service of the United States." The same act, by another section, "hereby established * * * the National Guard of the United States." It seems that this group which, on paper, consists of two agencies, is composed of substantially the same men. "The National Guard of each State" is described as consisting of members of the militia having certain qualifications "and federally recognized as hereinafter provided." Then, in the next paragraph, "the National Guard of the United States" is described as consisting of "those federally recognized National Guard units" who have been appointed or enlisted "in the National Guard of the United States, as hereinafter provided." (Title 10, U. S. C. A., sec. 2; title 32, U. S. C A., secs. 4, 4a, and 4b.)

There is in section 4a, just referred to, a proviso, "That the members of the National Guard of the United States shall not be in the active service of the United States except when ordered thereto in accordance with law, and, in time of peace, they shall be administered, armed, uniformed, equipped, and trained in their status as the National Guard of the several States." This seems like a bow to the original intent of what the militia or National Guard should be and to the constitutional provision placing them under authority of the States for training purposes. But the real question of the effectiveness of the States' militia organizations against a Federal grab for all power would be this: In case of a conflict of orders to a certain militia organization from the President and from the Governor of the State, which must the men follow? Or it might not even come to that, for if they are away for training in peacetimes, under Federal control, the State simply has no militia. Under the general principles of the superiority of the Federal Government's powers over those of the States in matters where the Federal Government has authority, there would seem to be no doubt that the President's orders would control over those of the Governor, even though the militia had not been called into Federal service under one of the statutory provisions.

A very reputable legal work, namely, Corpus Juris Secundum, after describing the National Guard of the United States, newly created by the act of June 15, 1933, as above set out, says: "This changes the previous composition in that it makes the National Guard a part of the Army, while under the previous enactments it was a part thereof only while in the service of the United States, and at other times it was merely a State organization" (6 C. J. S. 350, sec. 6).

Even when the National Guard is not formally called into the service of the United States, it might be that the President effectively is its Commander in Chief. If so, there is nothing lacking now for a complete dictatorship set-up. The constitutional provision is that "The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the militia of the several States, when called into the actual service of the United States" (Constitution, art. II, sec. 2, clause 1). The Supreme Court has said that "The President is thus, in like manner, made Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States at all times, and Commander in Chief of the militia only when called into the actual service of the United States" (Johnson v. Sayre (Va. 1895), 158 U. S. 109, 115). But neither of these statements of the law shows definitely what the conclusion must be, under the present statute, as to the President's powers as Commander in Chief of what may or may not be a State militia. There would seem to be at least two possible decisions: (1) That the same men who compose the National Guard of the States are also the National Guard of the United States; hence the President is their Commander in Chief (leaving, of course, the clear inference, even if it were not stated, that there is really no State militia or National Guard); or (2) that the Constitution clearly contemplates a separate and, in peacetimes, independent State militia, hence any law which would deprive it of that status (even though indirectly through merging it into a newly created National Guard of the United States) is unconstitutional and void. If we are not sure in advance that the final decision would be No. 2 of these possible views, then our protection from dictatorship, by reason of the States' militia organizations, is very shadowy indeed.

It may be asked why we should worry now about an attempt by Congress to give the Executive power to call the militia into national service "for training" if the National Guard or militia of the States already has been embezzled by the Federal Government. The reasons are: (1) It is much easier, in what has been a democracy, to slip into a dictatorship, if it can be done, in the beginning, through the forms of democracy—legislative action, popular approval, etc.; (2) Congress might not wish to pass this clearly unconstitutional legislation if that element is called to its attention; and (3) Congress—the people's protection against the creeping paralysis of dictatorship—might conclude to restore to the States the militia which the Constitution clearly intended should belong "to the States, respectively," always during peacetimes.

INTERESTING OMISSION (?) IN LEGISLATION PROPOSED FOR CALLING NATIONAL GUARD OF STATES INTO FEDERAL SERVICE "FOR TRAINING"

It is not a little interesting to note that the words "for training" do not appear in the latest of the proposed enactments giving the President plenary power to call the National Guard of the States into Federal service at this time. However, these words are prominent in the sales talk by which the attempt is being made to sell this plan to the public. Many newspaper stories carried this idea prominently at about the time House Joint Resolution 555 was introduced and following the President's renewal of his suggestion for power to call the States' National Guard units into Federal service at this time. Among other places, stories of this kind were on the front pages of the Washington Evening Star of July 13, 1940, and the Washington Times-Herald of July 13, 1940.

On July 30, 1940, Gen. George C. Marshall, Chief of Staff of the Army, at a hearing before the Senate Military Affairs Committee, in the name of the War Department, urged the necessity "that at least a portion of the National Guard be ordered to active duty and recruited up to full strength and seasoned and trained as rapidly as possible." The President, in his message of July 29, 1940, transmitting to the Senate the proposed joint resolution, which became Senate Joint Resolution 286, said: " * * * I am therefore transmitting herewith legislation that, if enacted, will enable me to order the National Guard of the United States to active service for such period of intensive training as may be necessary to raise its efficiency to a point comparable with that of our small Regular Establishment."

Could it be possible that the propagators of this legislation to popularize the federalization of the National Guard, which the Constitution intended should belong "to the States respectively," have been fully aware all along that it is squarely unconstitutional to employ the militia, that is, the National Guard, in the service of the United States for training (Constitution, art. I, sec. 8, clause 16); but that they are attempting insidiously to get the congressional stamp of approval on the scheme regardless of any doubts which they, the said propagators, may have as to its constitutionality?

NOTING THE ANTAEAN CHARACTER OF THIS PROPOSED LEGISLATION

The progress of this measure may be enlightening if we cast the scientific eye of dissolution upon it. At the end of his May 31 message to the Senate, the President recommended: "That before adjournment this Congress grant me the authority to call into active service such portion of the National Guard as may be deemed necessary to maintain our position of neutrality and to safeguard the national defense, * * *." Accordingly, Congressman MAY, chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House, introduced House Joint Resolution 555 in its original form. When it came out of the committee, among a few slight changes, there were added, as of June 10, the words, "and training," making the introductory part of the resolution read: "That if, at any time prior to the convening of the Seventy-seventh Congress, the present Congress is not in session and, in the opinion of the President, a national emergency arises requiring the use and training of troops in excess of those of the Regular Army," etc.

This matter next "broke" upon public attention by the President's message to the Senate, July 29, transmitting the proposed joint resolution which became Senate Joint Resolution 286, introduced by Chairman SHEPPARD, of the Senate's Military Affairs Committee, providing: "That during the period ending June 30, 1942, the President be, and is hereby, authorized to order into the active military service of the United States," etc. Thus, without any ifs and ands, or the necessity of giving any reason of any kind for using it, the plenary power is to be given "hereby" to the President to "order into active military service all reserve components of the Army of the United States."

Every time this proposal touches its mother earth, the White House, it comes back with renewed strength and more in the form of a dictator's ukase, the imperial order of a czar. Like Hercules of Greek mythology, slaying the Libyan giant, Antaeus, it may be necessary for Congress, if it is to stifle this further progress of our dictatorship, to prevent this measure again coming into contact with the White House. Antaeus long had been an invincible wrestler because his strength was renewed every time he touched the earth, his mother, until Hercules strangled him while holding him off the ground.

EXPERT PUBLICITY TECHNIQUE EVIDENT

The emergence upon the public view of this questionable proposition to federalize our militia "for training" bears the expert stamp of that gentle infiltration method, the stalking and stopping technique of the modern supersalesmen who are executiveizing our Government. This stalking and stopping technique is worked thus: Its perpetrators immobilize the people's interest in the subject being marketed by a quick start in the beginning of its public incubation; then stop until the first flare of interest or opposition has died; and, a short time later, advance to the objective while the wearied interest of the would-be sophisticates among the public—being "bored" with anything they gave half a thought to last week—is somewhat offguard. The evolvement, in the present instance, of this now common pattern is evident from what already has been said here and from a careful view of the chronology of events making up the record of this scheme based upon the hope that the two Houses of Congress each will be so gullible as to father such unconstitutional procedure as calling the National Guard into Federal service "for training."

The history of this legislation is:

A Southerner's Estimate of Roosevelt

OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 15, 1940

LETTER FROM CHARLES E. GIBSON, OF THOMASTON, GA.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, not all southerners are new dealers, as is evident from a letter received this morning from Thomaston, Ga. It reads:

DEMOCRACY'S LAST STAND

When we think of outstanding examples of heroism—of battles waged at fearful odds—four in particular immediately occur to our minds: The Spartan defense at Thermopylae, the charge of the Light Brigade at Balaklava, the defense of the Alamo, and Custer's last battle with the Indians in Montana. There are others no less famous, but there isn't room for all.

Thinking of Custer's last stand reminds me of another, and that is our problem today. "Peace hath her victories no less renowned than war," and a victory achieved in time of peace may avert a senseless war. You may ridicule this statement if you will, but it is a fact, nevertheless: We are making our last stand for civil liberty today—that is, if we lose. When civil liberty falls religious freedom dies with it, and our blood-bought heritage will be swept away.

President Roosevelt has been weighed in the balances, and is sadly lacking in weight. In support of that statement I invite your attention to the record. Just a casual survey of that record will show:

1. That he has absolutely no regard for his word.
2. That he has shown an inveterate hostility to the press.
3. That he has destroyed the prestige of the Supreme Court.
4. That he has attempted to dominate Congress.
5. That he seeks to silence all opinions not in harmony with his own.
6. That he is an incurable spendthrift.
7. That Commissar Wallace has enslaved agriculture.
8. That Commissar Lewis has demoralized labor.
9. That Commissar Madden has disrupted industry.
10. That he—the President—has fairly smothered himself with radicals.
11. That he has debauched the electorate.
12. That he buys some, intimidates others, and meddles with all.
13. That, for the third time, he plans to buy the Presidency.
14. That his record is an endless chain of "emergencies."
15. That his compulsory registration bill is more political than otherwise.
16. That such a sickening performance doesn't merit an encore.

In other words, he is forever chasing after something new, and entirely too much of it is wrong. Human nature is fallible and we all make mistakes, but these blunders of his are plain habit.

After nearly 8 years of meddling and muddling, the problem nuts that he was going to crack—unemployment, agriculture, a balanced Budget, and mushrooming bureaus—are problems still.

Eight years is long enough—in fact, altogether too long—to dabble with the destinies of 132,000,000 people.

CHARLES E. GIBSON.

What of the Draft?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL W. SHAFER
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 14, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE BATTLE CREEK (MICH.) ENQUIRER AND NEWS

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I include the following editorial from the Battle Creek (Mich.) Enquirer and News:

[From the Battle Creek (Mich.) Enquirer and News]

WHAT OF THE DRAFT?

The objection to the conscription plan at Washington is that we seem to be going about the business backward—to be inviting the very difficulties we say we are trying to avoid.

If there is any difference of opinion in this country about having trained men, and enough trained men, to defend the country, those who take the opposite are too small in number to need notice.

Where there is argument over this conscription proposal, the argument does not arise over objection to a sound national-defense policy, or objection to a universal call to the defense when the call is needed and when it can be answered effectively.

But there are two objections now.

One is that a mystery hangs over the matter. Washington is telling the country too much or too little—too much about the dangers which Washington seems to know but which the people (whose sons and whose property will make up the defense) don't know; too little about the facts which would justify the excitement and nervousness at Washington.

That's one objection. This is still a democracy. The people feel that if they accept conscription they are entitled to do it themselves, of their own deliberate will—and that they are entitled to know just why they are doing it.

They don't know that yet.

The other objection is the backward action of the proposal.

We are for military training as an avoidance of waste, confusion, sacrifice. We train men that they may not lose their lives and their fight by going untrained against men who are trained.

As to their willingness to go when the need arises—as to the willingness of the country to send them and support them—there is no question.

The only place where Mr. Bryan was wrong when, as a profound pacifist, he said a million men would spring to arms in this country overnight in case of need was in his limitation of the number.

Not a million—but millions.

But they would be unarmed, and therefore ineffective. They couldn't save the cause and they couldn't save themselves.

So, we believe in training—adequate, thorough. And in such numbers as may guarantee safety. Coupled with this we believe—the responsible opinion among us believes—in the universal responsibility of citizenship; in the obligation owned by every one of us to serve the country according to its needs and his ability.

But not to be called hastily, unnecessarily, ineffectively—and not be called without full knowledge to us of the necessity and the method of meeting it.

The same duty which makes all of us liable to call is joined to the right of free citizenship that we be fully consulted as to the reasons and the purposes which take possession of our lives and property.

All that we know of the situation now (including all that we know of England's dire peril as Mr. Stimson states it, and all that we know of perilous outlooks as the President suggests them) is joined to the apparent fact that if a million men were called to arms next week or next month, they couldn't be trained. There would not be the clothes or the equipment or the personnel to make their training possible.

And so, invoking universal draft to avoid the penalties of unreadiness, we should be running headlong into unreadiness.

Why not do the first things first? Why not have a plan and a program and a procedure—instead of having so much excitement and emotion over something that is not fully explained?

If Washington knows something that we don't know, which something puts haste above every other consideration and justifies the disruption of our national life in the processes of a universal service call, why doesn't Washington say fully what that something is?

If at Washington there is some dire fact which is due to pop out at us later and clarify the present mystery as to why we should be doing something that Canada has not yet done, though Canada has been at war these several months—if Washington expects to be able to show us, at some other time, the reasons not shown us now for rushing unprepared into the universal draft for preparedness—what's Washington's excuse for not telling us now?

This newspaper believes in getting ready when we know what we are getting ready for—in whatever that may mean for any of us in contribution of whatever we have to contribute.

But this newspaper has never seen a big job that could be done successfully through excitement and emotion—without a systematic plan calmly carried out.

If this were the time, if the needs were convincing, if the uses were practical, for universal conscription, this newspaper would be for it.

In addition, this newspaper could be for universal military training for youth in time of peace. But the purposes would have to be right, the conditions would have to be right and, above all, the leadership would have to be right.

It would have to be a leadership free of emotion, free from the lure of adventure, free from the passion for dramatics. It would have to be a leadership profoundly and reverently and reliably dedicated to the American system and a recognition of the fact that sovereignty rests in the people, not elsewhere.

This is the question which comes now in this proposal for universal conscription. Have the people been told the reasons for it? Is their authority being fully consulted? Is something concealed? What is it? If the reasons not yet explained constitute a valid reason for it—are we ready for it? Are we ready to put it into use without the very penalties of unpreparedness which we are seeking to avoid? Have we not something to do first?

Are we not proceeding on emotion rather than plan?

And what is the ultimate objective of the emotion?

To What Kind of an Organization Do You Belong?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 15, 1940

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, do you believe that, in order to get or to hold a job, you should pay me? Do you think that I should have the power to charge you for the opportunity to work in a factory? Is it your idea that, before you and your fellow citizens can go about your daily tasks, making the things which are necessary to protect you and your neighbors, your homes, from foreign invasion or from enemies from within, you must join the Elks, the Masons, the Odd Fellows, the Methodist, the Baptist, the Lutheran, or the Catholic Church? Of course not, you reply.

Nevertheless, certain labor organizations are insisting that all manufacturers must sign contracts for a closed shop. That means that only those who belong to those particular unions can work in those factories. Of course, such an idea is not only un-American but it is unjust and it enables criminal racketeers to collect and use for their own purposes a part of the wages of honest workingmen.

Not only is the idea and practice that only those who belong to a certain organization shall have the privilege of working unjust, but all too often those organizations which insist upon this practice are at the mercy of Communists and racketeers.

Note this article from the Grand Rapids, Mich., Labor News, under date of August 2, 1940. It is as follows:

C. I. O. HIRES HARRY AMES TO ORGANIZE—WILL HEAD CONSTRUCTION WORKERS' UNION IN WAYNE COUNTY AREA

DETROIT.—Members of the C. I. O. will be pleased to know that their imported State Director Sholle, of parts unknown, and James B. Boyne, State director of the Construction Workers' Union of the C. I. O., have recently employed Harry F. Ames, dynamiter, thief, and racketeer, who was thrown out of the American Federation of Labor for stealing the money of the Building Laborers and Hod Carriers' Union and for permitting sewer contractors of Detroit to employ members of the union at a wage rate less than that set up by P. W. A. projects by the Federal Government, for which his associates were thoroughly convinced he took money from contractors.

Before coming to Detroit Ames did a stretch in prison in Indiana for blowing up a theater in the northern part of the State in an effort to help some one to collect from an insurance company.

Harry Ames, as the national director of the Hod Carriers' Union of Detroit, had full charge of all receipts and expenses. An investigation of his books by other local officers and the international revealed that among the things the money of the union was spent for during Mr. Ames' administration by and under his orders were diamond rings, oil stock for Mr. Ames, landscaping for his home, rentals for his summer cottage, money for his motorboat, and expenses for the Ryma Chemical Co., as well as the cost of several saddle horses.

The investigation revealed that Ames had surreptitiously spent and diverted to his own account and expenses many thousands of dollars, and that in order to avoid prosecution in the criminal courts, he made a "settlement" with the local union for $3,000. This was at a time when funds of the local union were so completely depleted because of Ames' raid on the treasury that there was no money to pay the regular running expenses of the union.

Just how long will honest, patriotic, Christian American workers submit to this kind of procedure?

Air Supremacy Will Decide Battle of Britain and Many Future Wars

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 15, 1940

ARTICLE FROM THE WASHINGTON DAILY NEWS

Mr. THILL. Mr. Speaker, the air warfare now waging over Britain will decide the immediate future of the British Isles. If one belligerent has a vastly superior air force to another and succeeds in stifling the enemy's air power, it means success in wars as they are fought today. To talk about sending 50 destroyers to England and to state that it may well mean the difference between victory and defeat is nonsense if the British air force is inferior and succumbs to that of the enemy.

We should proceed with a well-planned program of pilot training and aircraft production which will make the United States supreme in the air. Training of the National Guard and development of a huge standing army will count for little if we do not have an adequate air force.

The following newspaper article discusses the air offensive over Britain:

[From the Washington Daily News of August 15, 1940]

"ALL-AIR WAR"—THIS IS THE MAIN BOUT, EXPERTS SAY

(By Maj. Alexander P. de Seversky)

The spectacular battle raging over and around the British Isles is not, as old-line swivel-chair experts have led the public to believe, a preliminary match. It is the main bout. The action is generally regarded as the prelude to an invasion or some other grand offensive involving ground troops and naval craft. But it is nothing of the sort. What we are watching is the authentic big push.

A more realistic understanding of the air battle as the main bout underlines the absurdity of talk about saving England by contributing 50 American destroyers. The issue immediately at stake will be decided without the intercession of the Navy.

Those who have failed to adjust their tactical thinking to the realities of 1940 take it for granted that the old pattern of battle will be followed. Wherefore they assume the stage is merely being set for a regulation war of mile-by-mile conquest. They are able to point out, truthfully, that even in the recent "blitzkriegs" on the European continent that pattern was followed, though at a greatly accelerated pace.

SOMETHING NEW

But soon it should become apparent that something new and unique is transpiring. The classic all-air battle foreseen by a few of the more imaginative tacticians has become a fact. When the question of mastery of the skies over the British Isles and their sea approaches is definitely answered by the course of the present "aerial Trafalgar," the other questions will be minor by contrast.

The air offensive is developing as expected, with heavy numerical advantage on the challenger's side and clean-cut, qualitative advantage on the defender's side. Nothing has happened so far, according to available information, to indicate a genuine break through of British defensive lines by the Nazis. Not until Hitler's air power begins to inflict serious damage in the interior of England in daylight raids with relative immunity will there be justification for alarm.

If Great Britain should lose the present battle, it will in effect have lost the war, at least so far as the mother country is concerned. Whether the victors then decide to invade the islands, or prefer to lay it waste systematically from the air without anything more than a token occupation of a few spots, will be a matter of detail, without essential military significance.

Old-style military and naval men are simply unable to assimilate the startling fact that land and sea forces have become mere onlookers in a fateful engagement that started in the air, develops on an ever larger scale in the air, and is likely to be fought to a decision in the air.

We Rose With Roosevelt—Why Wilt With Willkie?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAMPTON P. FULMER

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 15, 1940

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker, what the future holds for us no one can accurately foretell.

However, the seriousness of the war which is now raging in Europe, and the numerous problems which will be confronting the Congress and the Government for the next number of years, regardless of who wins the present war, should be very apparent, not only to every Member of Congress, but to the average citizen of this country.

The things to be done during this period, the legislation to be adopted, the leadership to steer the ship of state, the reaction and response of the American people to the events which lie ahead in the struggle between dictatorship and democracy, will, in my judgment, irrevocably fashion the pattern of life to which we, our children, and our children's children will of necessity conform.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the propaganda that is now being carried to the country in the press, and otherwise, daily, about the wonderful ability of the Republican candidate, Mr. Willkie, should be carefully scrutinized to ascertain the real facts, not about Willkie as he was when he used to wash dishes, drive cattle, and so forth, but the Willkie as he is today, which is clearly set forth in an article carried in a magazine entitled "Dynamic America," written by John Bauer, which article I am, under leave to extend my remarks, inserting herein, believing that same will be of interest to the readers of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. In this article the writer very efficiently portrays the lack of the necessary qualifications of Willkie to meet the situation which I have just described, and the type of leader which we should have.

I am sure that the people of this country will not forget that "We had it hard with Harding, cool with Coolidge, hungry with Hoover, and rosy with Roosevelt."

WENDELL WILLKIE: THE REPUBLICAN CANDIDATE

(By John Bauer)

The Republican masses were probably no less amazed at Mr. Wendell L. Willkie's nomination as their candidate for the Presidency than were the Democrats. While he has been an increasingly prominent figure during recent years in public utility and financial circles, his fame had not reached the plain American voters—those who piled up the 11,000,000 Roosevelt majority in 1936.

A month before the Philadelphia convention Mr. Willkie was less known to ordinary business, labor, and farmers than any other candidate nominated by a major party since the Civil War. His meteoric rise to the Republican nomination is thus most remarkable, particularly as he had been a registered Democrat only 2 years before.

The extraordinary circumstances of his nomination require care by the ordinary voter to consider who Mr. Willkie really is, what he is, and whom he primarily represents in his campaign for the Presidency. That he is a person of ability there is no doubt, or that he has affability, personality, a smile, and a voice that may compete successfully with the most famous possessor of those qualities.

But, is Mr. Willkie really qualified for the Presidency of the United States? The next 4 years will be crucial ones for this country, both as to internal and external affairs. Proper Presidential leadership will be of utmost importance. This involves both outlook and seasoned experience as to national interest and welfare. Voters must ponder particularly the following three questions:

First. What are Mr. Willkie's basic qualifications in training and experience for the Presidency?

Second. What is his personal outlook on problems with which the country is confronted?

Third, what are the interests which have been backing Mr. Willkie and brought about his nomination? What would be their influence on his leadership and position in the various national and international issues that will require determination of policy and administration?

I. BACKGROUND AND QUALIFICATIONS

The voters will be regaled during the next 4 months with the extraordinary business attributes of Mr. Willkie. They will be told incessantly that he has not been a politician and would apply business methods to the Government. He will be glorified as a great businessman—needed to guide the country at this critical juncture with the same ability and standards as he devoted to the private corporation which he has headed since 1933.

Because of this impending enchantment, it is important to inquire into Mr. Willkie's background which is said to qualify him supremely now for the Presidency of the United States. Is he really one of the country's great businessmen? What is his record? And, apart from private business, what governmental experience has he had to attest suitable leadership at this time of national urgency?

As to his experience with private business, this adds up to practically nothing so far as direct development or operation of American industry is concerned. Mr. Willkie is rather young, only 48. He had an excellent family background as to intellectual, cultural, and public interests. As a student in Indiana University he was somewhat of a liberal.

After graduation in 1913 he started as a teacher, but soon abandoned the educational field for the law because, it has been stated, he wanted more money than teaching would provide. Here has doubtless been an emotional conflict between liberal impulses and business actualities. I have known other young liberals to become public-utility lawyers.

Mr. Willkie was admitted to the Indiana bar in 1916 and practiced for a time with his father. During this period he has been reported as representing successfully a labor group against an injunction in a picketing case. In 1919 he moved to Akron, Ohio, and became a rapidly rising corporation lawyer. In 1929 he went to New York City as co-counsel for the Commonwealth & Southern Corporation. In 1933 he was elected president, and has since devoted himself to the affairs of this huge public-utility holding company system.

Heading the Commonwealth & Southern

When Mr. Willkie became associated with Commonwealth & Southern, this public-utility empire had already been established. Whoever the business genius may have been that built up the system, it was not Mr. Willkie.

Furthermore, he headed the top-holding company which by itself was not an operating enterprise. It controlled the operating subsidiaries, and each had its own president and other official set-up, and each actually conducted the business within its own domain. He knew little or nothing about the physical properties and operation, and has had only casual contact with the actual business of the far-flung operating units.

Mr. Willkie contributed nothing in producing a great industry. He is not an Edison who fathered basic inventions upon which the electric industry has been erected. He is not a Charlie Schwab who built up the Bethlehem Steel Corporation. He is not a Henry Ford who through his own genius created the Ford Motor Co. He is not a Hill or a Harriman. He is not a businessman at all in the sense of the great business leaders of the country.

Mr. Willkie was brought to the Commonwealth & Southern because of his engaging and effective personality. After the empire had been built up, especially after the 1929 financial storm when water-logged utility systems were tottering, someone was badly needed to handle public relations. Mr. Willkie's personal qualities, plus his being a Democrat in 1933, fitted the situation. His job as president was primarily to present in favorable public light the interests of Commonwealth & Southern, to keep the empire intact against the forces of collapse which had already reached the Insull system and were threatening other grossly overcapitalized holding company organizations.

Accomplishments for the system

Mr. Willkie has done an excellent job for Commonwealth & Southern. This has included, first, smoothing out the political relations of the system companies in the various States and communities. Second, presenting the system attractively before the public at large through discussions and appearances before governmental groups. Third, opposing the advance of municipal ownership within the Commonwealth & Southern territory. Fourth, obstructing T. V. A. in its power program and other regional developments. Fifth, selling the Tennessee properties to the public for about $25,000,000 more than their intrinsic fair value—on the basis of their special nuisance value to T. V. A. in getting rid of Mr. Willkie's obstruction tactics.

All this was fine for Commonwealth & Southern during a difficult period, and has left the system today with rather generally recognized respectability. Mr. Willkie did a swell job of handling public relations for his company, but his experience has not been that of a great businessman. His work has been primarily that of an ingenious, clever, and successful defense lawyer of a public-utility holding company system which, except for his personal qualities and efforts, might have encountered grave difficulties in maintaining its position against the forces of national progress.

Mr. Willkie's accomplishments must be considered particularly in the light of the fact that when he took the presidency the system was one of the most waterlogged or overcapitalized in the country. According to analysis based upon figures reported by the Federal Power Commission for the year 1933, the gross book values of the Commonwealth & Southern's electric properties amounted to about $815 per customer. This compares with about $560 per customer for the 22 largest holding-company systems in the country, and with a maximum of about $300 per customer that would be reasonably justified on the grounds of prudent investment. Practically all the 22 systems were overcapitalized, but only 1 exceeded Commonwealth & Southern. The latter even topped Associated Gas & Electric, whose flagrant overcapitalization has been a matter of nauseous notoriety.[1]

Mr. Willkie's principal job as president of the Commonwealth & Southern was thus to represent and defend a system whose capitalization build-up could not be justified. He did not create the overcapitalization, but he has successfully supported it. In so doing he has helped to obfuscate the general situation in the country, and especially to obstruct the advancement of the great projects which were undertaken as a matter of national policy. This is his unvarnished record as a businessman. It is for the voters to decide how this experience aptly qualifies him for the Presidency of the United States.

No participation in Government

Apart from private business, what has been Mr. Willkie's experience in direct governmental affairs? Has he ever been concerned actively in the development of public policies? Has he come to grips with the economic problems of the country at large? Has he had legislative or administrative experience in Government? Has he ever been concerned with any aspect of government except as the interests of his private clients have been affected in litigation? Has he ever represented in any important matter the public interest against private claims?

The answer is glaringly obvious. It may be that Mr. Willkie's special abilities heretofore exercised exclusively for the benefit of Commonwealth & Southern, or other corporate clients, might be applied with equal zeal and effectiveness to the affairs of the American people. This, however, would be unsupported assumption, a fervent hope, but not a sensible probability. In the light of his actual experience and activities, either as a corporation lawyer or as president of Commonwealth & Southern, Mr. Willkie is a poor bet as a progressive leader for the United States at this time.

II. OUTLOOK ON PUBLIC PROBLEMS

As to Mr. Willkie's attitude on national questions, internal and external, nothing very definite can be said. One can only imply from his past activities and associations, and from his limited published statements.

As to past connections, Mr. Willkie, as already presented, has been engaged exclusively in representing private interests, mostly against governmental policies established through national legislation. This at least indicates that in any basic conflict between public and private interests, his influence will lean to the private side. He can hardly be expected to lead forcefully on lines of public welfare where conflicting private interests are involved. Can he thus be selected as the national leader for the crucial years ahead?

As to his public statements, Mr. Willkie has naturally limited himself to generalities which can mean anything to any voter. He expressed broad approval to the New Deal measures, but thinks they have been carried to extreme, especially by the administrative agencies. But he also has stated that the issue in the forthcoming campaign is clear and simple—opposing or supporting, the New Deal. Certainly as the Republican candidate, and presumably as President of the United States, he would thus largely undo what the New Deal has done.

The truth appears to be that (a) Mr. Willkie has liberal impulses for public welfare, but (b) has been associated too closely with the reactionary sides, and (c) has not had occasion to give close consideration to fundamental matters of public interest. Hence his position has been evasive and even contradictory.

Look at the vital internal problem of the country—mass unemployment. Mr. Willkie has stated that if private business cannot furnish jobs for everybody, other means must be used. This sounds like the New Deal. But he has also stated that private business must be relieved from taxes and restrictive regulation—and that then it will be able to expand, prosper, and furnish the needed jobs. He thus joins the National Association of Manufacturers, the United States Chamber of Commerce, the public utilities, bankers, and practically all big business, in demanding that the Government retire from the economic field and leave business alone (except for casual regulation). This appears to be Mr. Willkie's solution for unemployment.

Here is the fundamental issue between the New Deal and its opponents, whether in the Republican Party or Democratic. The New Deal represents the view that Government must assume fundamental responsibility in the economic field, and must participate actively as may be required for the welfare of the masses of people. This has been carried out in part by direct Government employment and in part by regulation of private business. But opponents look upon such governmental participation in economic affairs as evil and destructive to national welfare. If they should succeed in electing their President and Congress they will certainly strive to get what they fought for. Could Mr. Willkie avoid doing what he was elected to do?

III. THE INTERESTS SUPPORTING MR. WILLKIE

Mr. Willkie probably does not agree wholeheartedly with the extreme opponents to the New Deal and the ardent Roosevelt haters. However, he is supported by these groups, and presumably would be heavily influenced by them. It is important, therefore, to consider the origin of his build-up for the Republican nomination.

The allegation has been surging all around that the nomination was forced by an overwhelming popular demand coming from the grass roots of the country. It has been vociferated as a stupendous popular victory against the politicians. The preconvention campaign is said to have been conducted by amateurs against the determination of the political machines, and this alleged fact is urged as demonstrating the popular basis of the selection.

All the grandiose effusions about the spontaneous popular demand for Willkie are just window dressing for the realities. They come under the category of sanctimonious "blah." As stated before, Mr. Willkie had not been known to the masses of people whose votes will be needed for election. The build-up came from those who knew what they wanted, and experts in getting what they want. Big business used big business methods to pick its man and to get him nominated.

In the promotion of Republican candidates along traditional lines during the past year, Senator ROBERT A. TAFT was the natural choice of big business, and so of the Republican politicians. His obvious difficulty, however, was lack of personality or "oomph" to attract mass voters. As conditions unfolded in recent months, the fact seemed manifest that Mr. TAFT could not be elected, especially if Mr. Roosevelt should be nominated again by the Democrats, as appeared increasingly evident. So, where and how could a suitable candidate be found who had the requisite personal qualities, also the views of big business, who could be advanced to the nomination, and who finally could be elected?

Finding Mr. Willkie

In the regular political field there was no one who fitted these requisites. A new personality had to be sought, and a new technique had to be used for the nomination. No one had the palpable fitting. A try-out was started for Mr. Willkie, and it met with good response in the higher business circles, but with misgivings regarding his public-utility connections.

His personal qualities were excellent. Since there was everything to gain and nothing to lose, real experts went to work. First, there was Oren Root, Jr., a famous name and member of a leading firm of New York corporation lawyers, with lots of public-utility background. Next came Russell W. Davenport, who had been managing editor of Fortune Magazine—who had brilliant experience in organizing publicity campaigns.

The small but competent initial group had ready access to the leading business names throughout the country, and everywhere found surging eagerness to assist in promoting Willkie. Consequently, practically every broker's office in 48 States (also advertising and publicity agencies, newspaper columnists, public-utility headquarters, and other big business) became an active focus of expanding effort to promote Willkie. Here are the sources of the numbers that signed the Willkie petitions, the avalanche of telegrams to the Philadelphia convention, and the packing of the convention galleries with Willkie shouters. The techniques had been duly developed during the corporate fights against the Holding Company Act of 1935 and other New Deal measures.

In none of the organizations to promote Mr. Willkie's nomination was there a spontaneous and popular movement. All these people knew why they wanted Willkie, and they fervently hoped that he would lead in sweeping out the New Deal and bringing normalcy back to the Government in its relation to business. The support was large and popular with respect to big business, but it did not reach the grass roots from which the millions of voters will be needed for election.

His alleged independence

The statement has been made repeatedly that Mr. Willkie is under no commitments to politicians or other groups, and is singularly free to act as he thinks in all matters affecting the welfare of the country. This claim is doubtless true so far as specific obligations and commitments are concerned. Its real significance, however, should be considered from the standpoint of what Mr. Willkie's supporters believe and expect, and what he himself believes as indicated by his past activities and published statements.

It is, of course, possible that if Mr. Willkie should be elected President of the United States he would really carry on the New Deal, but would do the job more efficiently and better. If so, he would go counter to the assumptions of those who built up his nomination, and through such double-crossing he would end up by being hated as much as Mr. Roosevelt himself.

However, progressive-minded people who believe that government should be responsible in the economic field and do whatever is essential for public welfare, should not rely on any theory that Mr. Willkie really believes in the New Deal and that he would finally ditch his supporters in the campaign. Such an assumption is not backed by the reasonable expectations regarding a man whose business career has consisted principally in supporting a grossly overcapitalized public utility holding company system.

On July 12 Mr. Willkie spoke in Denver as an American, not as a partisan, and dedicated himself to three things:

"One, a united people without class consciousness, distinction, or class hatred.

"Two, the rehabilitation of our national economic life.

"Three, the building of an adequate defense program."

As generalities, how can anyone disagree with these pronouncements? Concretely, there is probably substantial agreement between the New Deal and its opponents on "Three." As to the first two, however, a specific blueprint is necessary.

First, the New Deal has sought unity for national welfare, but has met with class hatred. Second, it has striven heroically for economic rehabilitation of the country but has been obstructed at practically every turn by those who have promoted Mr. Willkie.

Mr. Willkie's supporters, and doubtless Mr. Willkie himself, do not want unity and rehabilitation on the broad New Deal bases but along the lines represented by the National Association of Manufacturers and their fellow travelers in big business. We all want unity and rehabilitation, but we can probably get them only through outright governmental responsibility for mass welfare—not through Government resignation from responsibility and retirement from the economic field. The decision is up to the voters on the basis of clear issues and vibrant personalities.

Shall the Judges of the Supreme Court be Impeached?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. THORKELSON

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 15, 1940

ARTICLE BY COL. WADE H. COOPER

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my own remarks in the RECORD, I include an article by Col. Wade H. Cooper, of Washington, D. C., entitled "Shall the Judges of the Supreme Court of the United States Be Impeached for a Gross Perversion of the Constitution of the United States?"

Mr. Speaker, it is extremely important that the people take greater interest in the administration of their own Government. This should be clear as one begins to review the mass of legislation which has been enacted over a period of many years—legislation which restricts the people and deprives them of their rights. The Constitution was drafted by and is an instrument that belongs to the people of this Nation. Liberalizing this document or misinterpretation of it can only end in a steady elimination of those rights which the people reserve to themselves in the ninth and tenth amendments. What are these rights? They are the unwritten powers of the Constitution which are not delegated to Congress or denied to the States.

It is easy for a legislative body to take the position that they are the law, but in this case the Constitution is the law and the very platform upon which legislation must rest for validity. When legislative bodies depart from this document disintegration of government begins; and the result of such breaking down in the Government is quite obvious today, particularly in view of the fact that Congress is now forced to remain in session to watch so that the President does not lead this country into war. This could never happen had the people always looked after their rights; had the people watched Congress and taken care that they obey the law as it is written into the Constitution itself.

The people are the power, and the Constitution is the document through which they speak to the three branches of the Federal Government. It is therefore obvious that Congress must not widen or deviate from the meaning of the Constitution itself without specific permission from those who give this document to Congress; that is, the people of the United States.

The little pamphlet which I have inserted expresses the opinion of Mr. Cooper, and there are thousands of others throughout this Nation that hold to this same opinion. We Members of Congress must realize that we are a responsible body—with no greater rights than those written in the Constitution itself. To stretch or widen its meaning means nothing else than destruction of the people's liberties and rights, in direct proportion as legislation is enacted to deprive them of such rights.

The chaotic state in which we find our Nation today has been created by Congress itself, for had we maintained the Government as it was set up it would have been sound today. Misinterpretation of the fundamental law destroys the law itself, and when such attack is made upon the fundamental law that gives a nation security and life, the security and life are destroyed.

SHALL THE JUDGES OF THE SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES BE IMPEACHED FOR A GROSS PERVERSION OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES?

(By Wade H. Cooper, LL. D., Litt. D.)

The juxtaposition of the New Deal and the Supreme Court of the United States is such that it is difficult at times to speak of the one without referring directly or indirectly to the other.

Constitutionally, the Supreme Court is a separate and independent part of the Government, but practically and actually it has automatically become the strong arm of the New Deal. If you should wish to know whence originate the visions and dreams of the New Deal, you have only to read Rousseau's Social Contract, Sir Thomas More's Utopia, Francis Bacon's New Atlantis, or Campanella's City of the Sun—all exploded as impossible utopian dreams in the long ago, though revived by the bright but inexperienced and impractical young men surrounding and advising our inexperienced and impractical President. This accounts for the impractical spending and lending or squandering of billions and billions of dollars of the taxpayers' money.

However, it is not easy to determine how our Supreme Court ever got the idea that our bureaucratic Government officials are the masters and not the servants of the people, with plenary powers to maliciously take away or wreck and destroy the property or the reputation of the citizen at pleasure and without responsibility or liability to anyone.

Instead of being a veritable citadel for the protection of the rights and liberties of the people, the Supreme Court has become, I regret to say, a battering ram for the destruction of the rights of the people as guaranteed under the Constitution of the United States.

Let me be brief, but let me be specific.

The fifth, ninth, and tenth amendments of our Constitution specifically preserve and protect the rights of all our people; the ninth amendment declares:

"The enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people." This means that a bureaucratic government official shall not have the right to purposely destroy your property or your reputation, without responsibility or liability. A number of our rights, such as freedom of the press, freedom of speech, freedom of conscience, and the writ of habeas corpus are enumerated in the Constitution, but numerous other rights, while not mentioned, are preserved under the ninth amendment, as pointed out.

The fifth amendment declares that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation.

Article III, section 2 of the Constitution gives the Supreme Court authority to "hear and determine all cases in law and equity arising under the Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made or which shall be made under their authority." All legislative authority is vested in the Congress of the United States, according to article I, section 1 of the Constitution.

Article I, section 6 of the Constitution grants immunity to Senators and Representatives only for speeches in their respective Houses. Now it is perfectly plain from the above that the Supreme Court is without any legislative authority whatever. It is equally as plain that Senators and Representatives are the only officials in the United States who have the constitutional right of immunity.

Yet in the face of these constitutional safeguards and in the face of the common law of England, our Supreme Court has acquiesced in or affirmed the doctrine laid down by the New Deal Court of Appeals at Washington to the effect that the citizen cannot hold any bureaucratic official, high or low, responsible or liable for damages for the wrongful and unlawful destruction of his property, regardless of how arbitrary or malicious his act may be, if the matter in question is within the jurisdiction or within the "scope of authority" of the destructive bureaucratic official in question.

"Scope of authority" is merely a smoke screen for the protection of lawless Government officials. "Scope of authority" should mean and really does mean that the official must act in good faith, within the law, as there is no authority for him to go beyond the law or to maliciously or vindictively destroy the property of the citizen. But some of our courts, with the approval of the Supreme Court, have distorted and twisted "scope of authority" to mean that the Government official can abuse this authority and wrongfully and unlawfully destroy your property and not be held liable in damages for the same; there are numerous cases like this. There are numerous bureaus and commissions in Washington which have autocratic power, where the citizen is denied the right of review by the courts; if a citizen cannot appeal to the courts and cannot hold the offending lawless official liable, then his rights are all gone and he is at the mercy of a lot of irresponsible despots. Can Stalin or Hitler or Mussolini beat that? The Walter-Logan bill which passed the House a few weeks ago is intended to put a stop to such tyranny in certain cases but not all of them, as certain bureaus, for some reason, were omitted from the bill, which has not yet passed the Senate.

It is impossible to give you a clear conception of this unconstitutional granting of immunity to all officials by the Supreme Court. It is used to cover up lawless negligent or fraudulent acts on any and all occasions. Numerous cases, involving millions, have been brought. The Comptroller of the Currency alone has been repeatedly charged with violating his duty, with violating the law, with mismanagement and neglect of duty, in fraud of depositors, but all without avail, as he was acting in the "scope of his authority." He alone was involved in 17,500 lawsuits in 1935, according to his own statement, made in one case, as an excuse for neglect of duty in 1933, where he had been sued for over $1,000,000 on behalf of depositors. He was sued by a depositor in one case for the purpose of compelling him to recover all or a great part of over $2,000,000 wrongfully paid out to attorneys and for salaries, but this smoke screen, "scope of authority," still protects him, as it does all Government officials.

When—and where—will this end?

As late as 1912 the Supreme Court, in the case of the Philadelphia Co. v. Stimson, Secretary of War, said:

"The exemption of the United States from suit does not protect its officers from personal liability to persons whose rights or property they have wrongfully invaded," citing authorities.

But sometime thereafter the Supreme Court acquiesced in the doctrine of the Court of Appeals at Washington that a Cabinet officer could not be held responsible for libel as he was immune, as a Government official, and now the New Deal Court of Appeals has granted immunity to any and all Government officials, high or low, if the matter in question is in the jurisdiction or "scope of authority" of the lawless and offending official concerned.

The Supreme Court refuses to review or reverse the doctrine thus laid down by the Court of Appeals, and has therefore acquiesced in the same. This doctrine is nazi-ism, fascism, or communism accentuated, accelerated, and multiplied, as it makes every official, high or low, an irresponsible despot. Such a doctrine is an implied invitation by the courts for these officials to commit all manner of wrongful, unlawful, and fraudulent acts, with advance notice that they will be protected.

Cooley's Blackstone (1883), page 243, in discussing this subject, concludes thus:

"Since it would be a great weakness and absurdity in any system of positive law to define any positive wrong without a positive remedy."

To say that an official sworn to obey the law can maliciously, wrongfully, and unlawfully disregard the law and destroy your property and not be held liable because he was acting within the "scope of his authority" is tantamount to an acceptance of the Tertullian theory credo quia absurdum est and should not be tolerated by a free people. The sheriff aids in lynching the prisoner he is sworn to protect, but it is within the scope of his authority; the agent of the Watch and Ward Society abuses the children he is bound to protect, but it is within the scope of his authority; the Comptroller of the Currency wrongfully and maliciously wrecks and destroys a solvent bank that he is bound to protect, but it is within the scope of his authority, according to the doctrine of immunity.

Such transparent sophomoric sophistry ought to be repugnant to all men who love justice and have an appreciation of their own constitutional rights.

It is the common law of all civilized nations that the private property of the citizen cannot be taken from him or destroyed without judicial umpirage or judicial review. In England, acts of Parliament contrary to natural law or natural justice are void (Day v. Savage (1 Hob. 87)). The first great adjudication on this subject is Vanhorn v. Dorrance (2 Dall. 304). According to Cooley's Blackstone, "the King's prerogative stretcheth not to the doing of an injury." And says this same author: "When King James II invaded the fundamental constitution of the realm, the convention declared an abdication whereby the throne was rendered vacant, which induced a new settlement of the Crown."

In Outlines of Constitution Law, by Chalmers and Asquith (4th ed., Sweet & Maxwell, Ltd., London, 1930), it is stated that the Crown—that is to say the Government—cannot be held liable. "The remedy for any such wrong is against the individual wrongdoer (Rogers v. Dutt Moo, P. C. C. 209). But in practice the Crown often pays any damages which may be caused by its servants' wrongful acts committed in the course of their employment."

After explaining that Senators and Representatives were immune under the Constitution and could not be held liable for any speech or debate in either House, President Roosevelt, on March 4, 1939, in the Congress of the United States, gave utterance to a solemn truth when he declared: "And that immunity is most certainly not extended to either the Chief Justice or the President."

It seems perfectly clear that the Court of Appeals, at Washington, with the acquiescence or approval of the Supreme Court, and following the trail blazed by the Supreme Court, has annihilated the constitutional rights of our people as indicated, by an abuse of judicial power or an invasion of the Constitution.

I would not overthrow the Constitution or the Supreme Court, but I would overthrow the men who pervert the Constitution or the Court. Our Constitution must be preserved.

Status of Outstanding Foreign Bonds

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FREDERICK C. SMITH

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 19, 1940

EXCERPTS FROM ANNUAL REPORT OF THE FOREIGN-BOND HOLDERS PROTECTIVE COUNCIL, INC.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD my remarks and include therein certain tables showing the status of outstanding foreign dollar bonds of the Latin American countries, Europe, Far East, Africa, and Canada and indebtedness of foreign governments to the Government of the United States as shown in Foreign-Bond Holders Protective Council Annual Report for 1938.

The following schedules of outstanding foreign bonds and statement of indebtedness of foreign governments to the Government of the United States should be of the greatest interest to the Congress in considering H. R. 10361, a bill to provide for increasing the lending authority of the Export-Import Bank of Washington, in the amount of $500,000,000, "to assist in the development of the resources, the stabilization of the economies, and the orderly marketing of the products of the countries of the Western Hemisphere."

It is important to note, as shown in the schedule 4, the great amount of default of Latin America as compared with Europe, Far East, Africa, and Canada.

The proponents of the bill here referred to put up the argument that none of the governments of the Latin American countries owe the Government of the United States any money that is in default. The experience of the Export-Import Bank, which has been lending considerable sums to those countries, is also cited as showing the good credit rating of those states.

An examination, however, of the indebtedness of other foreign governments to the Government of the United States, as shown in tables 1, 2, 3, and "the German debt," should certainly show a great hazard of making loans to any but a very few foreign governments.

It can be expected that the governments of the Latin American states will pay back the loans our Government makes to them as long as we continue to lend to them in increasing amounts. It should not be expected, however, that they will be prompt in paying back these loans once we stop lending them any more money.

INDEBTEDNESS OF FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS TO THE GOVERNMENT OF THE UNITED STATES

The United States made loans to the Allied governments before and after the armistice for the purpose in general of assisting those governments to purchase supplies in connection with prosecution of the war. In addition, the United States after the armistice sold surplus war and relief supplies on credit to various countries of Europe, including some of the Allied governments. At the conclusion of the war period the Treasury held obligations of 20 nations, payable either on demand or within a short period of time.

The total indebtedness to the United States aggregated $10,350,479,074.70, distributed as follows:

Pre-armistice cash loans	$7,077,114,750.00
Post-armistice:
Cash	2,533,288,825.45
War and relief supplies	740,075,499.25

The initial indebtedness of each foreign government is shown in table I.

Owing to the state of financial disorder existing throughout the world in 1921 and 1922, Congress, under date of February 9, 1922, passed an act creating the World War Foreign Debt Commission with authority "to refund or convert and to extend the time of payment of the principal or interest, or both, of any obligation of any foreign government now held by the United States of America, or any obligation of any foreign government hereafter received by the United States of America * * * arising out of the World War, into bonds or other obligations of such foreign governments in substitution for the bonds or other obligations of such governments now or hereafter held by the United States in such form and of such terms, conditions, date or dates of maturity, rate or rates of interest, and such security, if any, which shall be deemed for the best interests of the United States of America."

The principal and interest of the total debt at the time of funding operations aggregated $11,577,260,885.

The details of the indebtedness of each Government, as of that date, are shown in table II.

On March 1, 1939, the total funded indebtedness of foreign governments to the Government of the United States was $12,710,628,623.86, distributed as follows:

Principal unpaid	$11,231,083,955.50
Interest postponed and payable under moratorium agreements	184,091,606.16
Interest accrued and unpaid under funding and moratorium agreements	1,295,453,062.20

The total unfunded indebtedness of foreign governments to the Government of the United States was $408,675,575.52, distributed as follows:

Principal unpaid	$204,561,214.86
Interest postponed and payable under moratorium agreements
Interest accrued and unpaid under funding and moratorium agreements	204,114,360.66

The details of indebtedness of each government, as of March 1, 1939, are shown in table III, the total indebtedness to the Government of the United States being $13,119,304,199.38.

On June 20, 1931, President Hoover proposed the postponement during 1 year of all payments on intergovernmental debts, reparations, and relief debts, both as to principal and interest, subject to confirmation by Congress, during the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1931. The object of the proposal was to give time to permit debtor governments to recover their national prosperity and did not involve any approval of the cancelation of the debts to the United States.

On December 23, 1931, there was signed Public Resolution No. 5, Seventy-second Congress, authorizing the postponement of amounts payable to the United States from foreign governments during the fiscal year 1932 and their repayment over a 10-year period beginning July 1, 1933, with interest at 4 percent per annum. The resolution specifically declares it to be against the policy of Congress that any of the indebtedness of foreign countries to the United States be in any manner canceled or reduced.

On May 12, 1933, there was approved the Agricultural Readjustment Act authorizing the President for a period of 6 months from the above date to accept silver in payment of installments due from any foreign governments, such silver to be accepted at not to exceed a price of 50 cents an ounce. In the payments due June 15, 1933, the Governments of Great Britain, Czechoslovakia, Finland, Italy, Lithuania, and Rumania took advantage of this offer.

On April 13, 1934, there was passed an act entitled, "An Act to Prohibit Financial Transactions with Any Foreign Government in Default on Its Obligations to the United States" and known as the Johnson Act. The act provides:

"That hereafter it shall be unlawful within the United States or any place subject to the jurisdiction of the United States for any person to purchase or sell the bonds, securities, or other obligations of, any foreign government or political subdivision thereof or any organization or association acting for or on behalf of a foreign government or political subdivision thereof, issued after the passage of this act, or to make any loan to such foreign government, political subdivision, organization, or association, except a renewal or adjustment of existing indebtedness while such government, political subdivision, organization, or association is in default in the payment of its obligations, or any part thereof, to the Government of the United States. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall upon conviction thereof be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned for not more than 5 years, or both.

"SEC. 2. As used in this act the term 'person' includes individual, partnership, corporations, or association other than a public corporation created by or pursuant to special authorization of Congress, or a corporation in which the Government of the United States has or exercises a controlling interest through stock ownership or otherwise."

The accompanying tables are taken from Memorandum, Treasury Department, Office of Commissioner of Accounts and Deposits, revised to March 1, 1939.

Wendell L. Willkie

OF

HON. JOSEPH F. GUFFEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 19 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

EDITORIALS FROM THE PHILADELPHIA RECORD

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD three editorials from the Philadelphia Record, appearing August 17, August 18, and August 19, relating to the candidacy of Wendell L. Willkie for the Presidency of the United States.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Philadelphia Record of August 17, 1940]

DIAGRAM FOR A CANDIDATE'S ACCEPTANCE SPEECH

Today is Wendell Willkie's deadline.

This afternoon, in the little town of Elwood, Ind., the Republican nominee formally makes his party's 1940 bid for power in his long-awaited acceptance speech.

Our country today is facing its gravest crisis since 1860, when the first Republican President—the immortal Lincoln—was elected.

Yet, in spite of the fact that Congress for 8 weeks has been debating one of the most momentous legislative programs in America's history, the Republican candidate for 1940 has expressed not a single opinion on a single controversial issue now before the Senate and House.

Up to today Mr. Willkie's silence could be overlooked. It could be said that he is lacking in governmental experience; that he was wise in withholding his opinions until he had the opportunity to make a thorough study of our problems. It could be said that his own party has been divided; that the candidate, for sound political reasons, preferred to hold his fire until he could find the direction in which the Republican Party finally decides to move.

But those excuses are no longer valid. The candidate, after 2 months for research and mediation, has had far more time than Mr. Roosevelt to make up his mind and to offer at least the framework of a program.

Mr. Willkie is more than a mere candidate. He is the leader of a major political party. This year of 1940 is more than an ordinary Presidential campaign year. It is a year of national and international crisis which probably will completely change the course of our Nation.

Our Government is a two-party government. Our two parties have usually been responsible parties. This year, more than ever before in our history, it is essential that party leadership be responsible leadership.

It would be the height of presumption for a New Deal newspaper to tell a Republican candidate what to say in his acceptance speech. But we feel we are performing a public service in pointing out the obvious issues that any Presidential candidate must at least discuss in these challenging days of 1940.

What is Mr. Willkie's stand on the bill giving the President authority to call out the National Guard? The Senate and House have passed this bill, at the President's request. But it was amended in the House, must now go back to the Senate for concurrence or changes. A responsible leader will either approve or oppose it, give his reasons and obligate himself for his party's actions.

What is Mr. Willkie's stand on the conscription bill? It has been reported favorably by a Senate committee. It is now being debated on the Senate floor. There will probably be a vote next week. As Senator JOHNSON of Colorado said on Wednesday: "If Mr. Willkie comes out for this bill it will resolve the doubts of many Republican Members and it will pass without question." Mr. Roosevelt gave conscription his unqualified endorsement. Mr. Willkie can do no less than be equally explicit either for or against it.

What is Mr. Willkie's attitude on America's foreign policy? The President has recommended, and Congress has passed, a neutrality bill which quite obviously favors Britain against the totalitarian powers. It becomes clearer each day that the question of giving even more help to England will loom as a national issue. Of course, Mr. Willkie cannot see far enough ahead to chart a definite course, but he owes it to his party and to his country to say whether he approves or disapproves of our present policy of help for England, whether he thinks we have given too much or too little. To avoid this question is to evade an obvious responsibility.

What is Mr. Willkie's stand on the extension of publicly owned power plants—such as T. V. A.—in the interest of national defense? The President has asked such an extension. It has been approved by Mr. Stettinius, of the Defense Advisory Council, a Republican. But action was delayed because Republican Members of the House refused to give consent to immediate consideration of such a bill. Willkie surely needs no time for a study of this issue; electric power has been his business for many years. The country surely has a right to know Mr. Willkie's very specific opinion on this particular issue.

What is Mr. Willkie's stand on the Wagner Act? The Wage and Hour Act? Should we expand or contract W. P. A.? Does he favor modifications of the social-security laws? What is industry's role in national defense and how should President and Congress cooperate in changing our tax laws to facilitate our procurement program? A responsible candidate of a major party cannot ignore these questions.

Of course Mr. Willkie today will launch a violent attack upon the "wasteful extravagance" of the Roosevelt administration; long oratorical boos at the "corrupt Democratic machines" in the gr-r-eat cities. Mr. Willkie will probably refer to the Democratic campaign books and denounce the canvassers who solicit advertising for them. He may be slick and smooth in implying that the President's family has somehow profited from the prestige of living in the White House; he has tossed off quite a few hints about that, already.

All that we may expect as part of the American tradition in a red-hot campaign.

But that, alone, would be like putting on a vaudeville act for an audience that came to hear a symphony concert.

What Mr. Willkie doesn't say may be far more significant than what he does say.

When the sun sets behind the banks of the Wabash this evening we'll know more about Mr. Willkie than we knew last night.

For the country's sake, we hope he demonstrates the courage and the intelligence to meet the challenge of the times, to take his place as the responsible leader of a responsible party in this hour of grave national crisis.

In our editorial on Mr. Willkie's speech in Monday's Record we will compare the speech itself with our advance diagram of what a Presidential candidate's acceptance speech should be.

[From the Philadelpia Record of August 18, 1940]

MOONSHINE ALONG THE WABASH

Candidate Wendell L. Willkie discussed only two specific issues in his acceptance speech in his old Hoosier home yesterday:

1. Conscription.
2. Our foreign policy.

On conscription, he came out for "some form of selective service." But he gave not an inkling to his Republican colleagues who are Members of Congress as to whether he favors the conscription bill now being debated in the Senate.

Willkie didn't straddle on the principle of conscription but he cleverly avoided getting into the slightest argument on the merits of the one bill which will provide conscription. It was not the forthright statement of a courageous man.

On our foreign policy, the candidate approved the President's course in providing England with "the material resources of the Nation." But, he said, the President is leading us into war by his "inflammatory statements."

Whereupon Willkie said: "I promise * * * both in business and in war to outdistance Hitler in any contest he chooses in 1940 or after. And I promise that when we beat him, we shall beat him on our own terms."

We leave it to Willkie's closest friends to find any statement ever made by President Roosevelt one-tenth as "inflammatory" or irresponsible as that.

To find such a contradiction in so important a speech by the candidate of a major political party is so amazing that it staggers the imagination of well-balanced men and women.

Besides his casual remarks on conscription and his astounding contradiction in discussing our foreign policy, Candidate Willkie used about 5,300 other words to tell what was in his heart and to expound his political philosophy.

In those words lurk at least a half dozen other obvious contradictions, a plain desire to run away from the facts of life and five paragraphs closely resembling weasels. There is, however, an excellent Algeresque biography of a tousle-haired Hoosier lad playing 'round the cabin door. The boy's name is Willkie, Wendell L. He wants to be President.

As the Record promised yesterday, on Monday we will compare his speech in detail with the diagram of what a candidate's acceptance speech ought to be.

It will be a hard editorial to write. Almost as hard as trying to lasso a headless horseman who suddenly disassembles and rides off in all directions.

[From the Philadelphia Record of August 19, 1940]

THE MAN WHO WOULD BE PRESIDENT

In 6,000 words of an acceptance speech which left his listeners somewhat bewildered, Wendell L. Willkie on Saturday unveiled the major issue of the 1940 campaign:

Willkie doesn't like Roosevelt. Willkie wants Roosevelt's job.

That is the only completely clear thought in the entire speech. Nearly all the rest of the address was so vague and so full of self-contradictions that even the wobbly G. O. P. platform, by comparison, seems crystal clear.

Saturday morning in this space the Record listed nine of the important issues confronting America in these days of national crisis.

We believed any Presidential candidate ought to express his opinions on (1) conscription, (2) foreign policy, (3) National Guard bill, (4) extension of publicly owned power in the interest of national defense, (5) Wagner Act, (6) Wages and Hours Act, (7) social security, (8) future of W. P. A., (9) Government aid to industry in the national-defense program. We promised to compare the speech itself with our diagram.

It is to Willkie's credit that he discussed two of these issues at some length—conscription and our foreign policy. He briefly referred to three others—Wagner Act, Wage and Hour Act, and social security, and approved "in principle" all three reforms. It is to Willkie's discredit that he carefully skirted any comment whatever on the National Guard bill, extension of publicly owned power in the interest of our defense, Government aid to industry in our defense program, and avoided any reference to W. P. A.

It was quite natural that many Republicans deluged Willkie with questions immediately after the speech as to what he really thinks about conscription. He said he favors "some form of selective service." That statement can mean he favors the Burke-Wadsworth bill—an act written by two of his supporters—or it can mean he favors the Maloney amendment, which also approves conscription but would postpone it for months while we try to raise a volunteer army. Both provide "some form of selective service."

Willkie is for conscription "in principle." But when he avoided discussing the one bill which can give us conscription now he was obviously guilty of a straddle. His colleagues who are in Congress find not leadership here from a man who ought to lead.

On our foreign policy Willkie had the courage to approve, with only a few qualifications, the President's program of helping England "with the material resources of the Nation." He criticized the President for leading us into war by "inflammatory utterances" directed at foreign powers. But when Willkie then issued a virtual challenge to Hitler to "C'mon and fight; I'll lick you," he committed one of the classical political inconsistencies of the age.

We agree with Willkie that the President and his State Department have done too much scolding in their relations with Germany and Japan.

But neither has gone off half-cocked in so blatant and amateurish a fashion as did Willkie at Elwood Saturday afternoon. We are sure the country will still have greater faith in Roosevelt's handling of our affairs abroad than in Willkie's.

Willkie endorsed nearly all of Roosevelt's domestic program. He pledged himself to maintain and enforce collective bargaining by representatives of labor's own choosing without interference; to continue minimum standards for wages and maximum standards for hours; to maintain regulation of securities markets; to continue extension of rural electrification, Federal old-age pensions, unemployment insurance.

These reforms are the heart of the New Deal administration. After endorsing them, Willkie said in almost the same breath: "This administration stands for principles exactly opposite to mine."

No wonder so many listeners were bewildered. Willkie is for the Roosevelt foreign policy. He is for the Roosevelt domestic policy. Yet the Roosevelt policies are exactly opposite to his own. Roosevelt is too inflammatory, yet not one-tenth as inflammatory as Willkie.

Yes; it's all very confusing. The speech defies analysis on logical grounds. But it leaves the issue of the campaign very clear:

Willkie doesn't like Roosevelt. Willkie wants Roosevelt's job.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ERNEST LUNDEEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 19 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

RADIO ADDRESSES BY HON. ERNEST LUNDEEN, OF MINNESOTA

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD two radio addresses delivered by myself, one on July 28 and the other on August 10, 1940, on the subject "Conscription."

There being no objection, the addresses were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

(July 28, 1940)

SHALL WE CONSCRIPT AMERICAN MANPOWER NOW?

Fellow citizens and fellow Americans, we have come a long way down the road toward war since the President declared a national emergency on September 8, 1939. Our neutrality law aimed to keep us neutral. At the demand of the administration, Congress was called into special session to remove the arms embargo in order that this great Nation of peace-loving people might arm one European nation against another. Interventionists in the quarrels and boundary disputes of Europe now demand that we give our guns and powder, our Army equipment, our warships, our war planes, and the entire facilities of our industries to Great Britain, and they are enforcing their demands.

LAST CROSS ROAD BEFORE WAR

We have now arrived at the last cross road before we enter the second world war, and as far as this administration is concerned, there is no turning back. For us it is either peace or war. The administration forces now place before Congress a European-minded conscription bill which lists and regiments every man from 18 to 65 years in the military services of this country—an army of 42,000,000 men.

All this in the name of defense for the United States. We are not at war with any nation. We maintain friendly and diplomatic relations with every nation on earth. There is no danger of invasion from abroad. No one has threatened us, and we have not broken diplomatic relations with any foreign countries. Why a peacetime conscript Army? No one can attack us now, or in the near future. Unless America now is to send overseas an expeditionary force to Europe, Asia, and Africa, there is no reason for a conscript Army.

THEIR WARS ARE NOT OUR WARS

American volunteers have always been willing to defend this country from invasion and from insurrection. Our citizens have repeatedly refused to serve on European soil in the armies and under the flags of foreign nations. Their wars are not our wars. Their quarrels are none of our concern. We are not interested in their real-estate titles and boundary disputes.

CONSCRIPTION SLAVERY

The Burke-Wadsworth bill is purely a wartime measure, which no country has ever enacted before in times of peace. We propose the military extreme of placing 42,000,000 men in the yoke of conscription. Whether for military service or work armies, this is conscription slavery, where men earning far beyond $21 per month are forcibly taken from their families and jobs to be enslaved at a starvation wage, leaving their dependents to shift for themselves in a truly militaristic system. I cannot support peacetime conscription, and I will fight to maintain some semblance of reason and sanity in our national-defense policy.

UNEMPLOYMENT IN AMERICA

In our conduct with foreign nations, in our repeal of the Embargo Act we are asking for trouble, yet we have more in the United States than we can take care of. At least, it is apparent that we have been unable to solve the unemployment problem. We have been unable to give jobs and some form of security to more than 10,000,000 persons in these rich United States. We have nearly 5,000,000 out of schools and out of work, and you say to them, "Get into the army; get into the Navy; be ready to fight on foreign soil." There is no justification for a peacetime conscript army of 42,000,000 men in these United States, except in the minds of those who think in terms of Europe and the Old World and in the minds of "world savers," who would sacrifice America on the altar of Old World problems.

You will pay them from $5 to $21 a month for their services and for their lives in wars beyond the seas.

NEW YOUTH BILL—CONSCRIPTION

This is the new youth bill, which the administration has given to its young people. For over 8 years, youth organizations and groups have asked for some type of bill which would give them a job, a chance to make a decent living. Their demands went unheard; their voices struck a stone wall and reverberated over this Nation. They thronged the streets, they walked the dusty highways, they became the boy and girl tramps of America, trying to find decent employment. Our wealthy industries replied: "Help not wanted." Now, you ask Uncle Sam to say to these people, "Johnny, get your gun. I need you now." Is this their destiny? Is this the American way? This conscription slavery idea was used by the kings of Europe to keep their millions in humble subjection; and it is now proposed that we import that system to enslave the American people.

INDUSTRY WANTS PROFIT

Uncle Sam is also asking industry to serve. Unlike our young people, who have no voice in the matter, our big industries reply through the statements of their presidents on various occasions and they say bluntly that they cannot expand their industries or build the needed equipment unless they have a definite and enormous profit. Our boys are asked to serve at the paltry sum of five to twenty-one dollars a month. They are asked to sacrifice their lives in foreign wars.

"Theirs not to reason why,
Theirs but to do and die."

OLD WORLD INDUSTRIAL SLAVERY

We denounce other nations for militaristic, totalitarian conscription. We condemn them for their slave labor, for absorbing their unemployed by creating conscript armies; yet, now we propose to do the same thing over here. The administration has no solution for our vast unemployment. I ask is this an American doctrine to absorb our men into conscript armies, or is this the imported European, Old World system of industrial slavery?

MINNEAPOLIS CENTRAL LABOR UNION OPPOSES CONSCRIPTION

I have before me a telegram from the Minneapolis Central Labor Union, opposing this bill. It is their opinion that no conscription should take place at any time until sufficient wealth has been conscripted to afford employment for the unemployed at union wages. They recognize that our domestic issues are far more important to America, to American security, and American freedom than conscription which has every semblance of war and intervention.

CONSCRIPTION UNCONSTITUTIONAL

We refuse to conscript our wealth to employ our people; surely, we cannot afford to give our material defenses to any foreign country. America is the issue, not Europe!

Conscription for foreign service is unconstitutional. The great Daniel Webster said that, "A free government with arbitrary means to administer it is a contradiction; a free government without adequate provision for personal security is an absurdity; a free government with uncontrolled power of military conscription is a solecism; at once, the most ridiculous and abominable that ever entered into a head of a man." You cannot conscript American manhood for any other purposes than these: First, to suppress a rebellion; second, to repel an invasion; and third, to execute the laws of the land and that you can do only in your own country and on the decks of your own ships. That is the provision of our Constitution, article 1, section 8.

Hannis Taylor, well-known authority on constitutional law, stated during the last World War: "Every citizen of this country should know, first, that under our Constitution no American soldier can be sent abroad except those composing the Regular Army; second, that the ranks of the Regular Army can only be swelled by voluntary enlistment."

The present bill provides compulsory military training for 42,000,000 men. Let it be remembered by all of the people of this Nation that we won our liberty and our independence with a volunteer army. Our fathers won the second war of independence with a volunteer army. The Mexican War was fought entirely by volunteers. The vast majority of the Grand Army of the Republic were volunteers, and those in the Spanish-American War were volunteers.

CRUCIFIXION ON CROSS OF KINGS

When the cause is an American battle, our men are ready and willing to fight for the defense and security of this country. But you cannot crucify our American youth on the cross of kings and Old World empire struggles. They refuse to volunteer for such un-American service.

CONSCRIPTION BEFORE WAR

During the first World War, conscription followed the declaration of war because men would not volunteer for foreign service. Now, the order of events seems to have changed. Our leaders are aware of the tremendous opposition to foreign service and they seek to corral American youth by so-called compulsory training and service, which means conscription. They expect to do this before there is an actual declaration of war. Under the guise and sham of national defense and with a blare of false patriotism, 42,000,000 men are to be conscripted not only for training but for service as the bill indicates. What service? I say, war service, and since there is no war here, we must find a war somewhere, somehow.

FARMER-LABOR PARTY OPPOSED TO FOREIGN SERVICE

The old parties may favor conscription for foreign service, but I can give you one party which does not favor conscription—the Farmer-Labor Party of Minnesota. This is their foreign policy: "We are unalterably opposed to any imperialist wars or designs, and to the sending of our men across the oceans or elsewhere to participate in such wars."

ESSENTIALS OF TRUE DEFENSE

If we are truly interested in national defense, there are three necessary elements. First, jobs for every person capable of working. Second, American possession of all islands off both our coasts and the fortification of these islands by land, air, and sea. Third, creation of a separate department of the air service for the unification and effective training of our air forces. It is evident that no country can have supremacy of the sea without supremacy in the air, that ships are helpless against land-based planes.

This is the true pattern for American defense. It does not involve the fortunes of kings. It places Europe second and America first.

CONSCRIPTION

America prepares to take the last step before entering another World War. A nation of conscripted men, together with Ambassadors who constantly make statements that antagonize foreign countries cannot expect to remain long at peace.

The Burke-Wadsworth bill proposes to conscript Americans from the cradle to the grave. Serfs and peons—that is your destiny. I call upon the youth of America to put a stop to these un-American, pro-European doctrines. Regimentation of our youth and manhood is unnesessary in this free land of ours.

AMERICA DECEIVED

The trend of slogans is amazing. First we heard that America had no defenses, and we needed billions to build up our Army and Navy. No sooner had the money been granted and the ink dried on the approved bill than another shout arose from the blue, and we were told that we were flooded with surplus arms and that we should send them abroad. The American people barely recovered from this obvious deception when our material sent to Europe was discovered to be not obsolete and old surplus materials but the actual equipment of the United States Army and Navy.

Planes were flown to the United States-Canadian border and pushed across the boundary line to evade the laws of the United States—all with the complete sanction of the administration. Our merchant ships were transferred to foreign registry with such rapidity that in January we had lost 250,000 tons of shipping without a shot being fired—ships transferred to foreign registry and subject to all the perils of the present war. A few weeks ago the press came out with the amazing report that the President sanctioned the sending of 50 United States war vessels to England. And only a few days ago the suggestion was made by administration men that we send 50 destroyers.

Britain was then reported by the press to be willing to give us in return a few of her useless battleships—death traps and dinosaurs of the deep.

Our war makers have placed the American frontier on the Rhine, on the battlefields of Europe, Asia, and Africa.

STRIPPING AMERICA FOR BRITAIN

The record shows that we have authorized and expended more than $50,000,000,000 on preparedness in the last 50 years. More than one billion a year for 50 years. We have appropriated and authorized in this Seventy-sixth Congress alone more than $14,000,000,000 for war. We are now told by the administration that there is no preparedness, that we have no weapons—at least, our weapons are not sufficient in quantity for even a small army. I ask, and our fellow citizens have a right to ask, what became of the $50,000,000,000 we appropriated? If there is no preparedness today, what became of these $50,000,000,000 we have expended?

One of the reasons we have a shortage of weapons today is that we turned over our three-inch field pieces to Great Britain. Pictures were published in the press showing huge shiploads of these cannon on the way to the British Isles, stripping our own American army of its defense weapons. Now our soldiers, as shown by a picture in the metropolitan press the other day, are practicing with wooden guns and wooden trench mortars, and no doubt a little later we will have to train our conscripts with broomsticks because of the shipment of 800,000 rifles to the British Isles.

We sent them our powder, so we have no powder now to keep dry, as the old saying goes, and we sent them in one shipment 132 carloads of TNT. We have sent the French more than 1,700 planes—they are all Hitler's now. At Brest alone 200 complete planes and 2,000 American motors with blueprints to mount them were captured in one battle, and they are now being used to bomb Britain.

I warned the American Congress not to send our defense weapons abroad. I warned that it was dangerous, but they would not listen. They would not listen to me in 1917, and they will not listen now. I say the stripping of weapons from the American Army, our Navy, and our air force is un-American, pro-European, and pro-British. It is dangerous to the very life of America, because no matter what our manpower may be, if we take the swords out of the hands of our soldiers and leave them barehanded, we will become the most tempting nation for invasion ever known in the history of the world. Every military man, every naval man, and every airman knows that if we keep our weapons to ourselves and have a reasonable degree of preparedness, common-sense preparedness, invasion is not possible either on the Pacific or on the Atlantic. The oceans are too great; the lines of communication are too long. No army or navy can strike across such expanses. Every admiral and every general will tell you that. The only possible method of attack is through island bases on the oceans along the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, through Canada, Mexico, Central or South America. For years I have advocated taking over the islands and arming them for air, land, and sea bases. I have advocated their acquisition by purchase and by credit on war debts, and I have stated that in a crisis seizure of the islands may be necessary, as once advocated by Andrew Jackson, our great American President. Danish and Dutch, British and French island possessions in the Western Hemisphere—all must become American. Only recently has the administration been giving some thought to that. Always late, always asleep until the hour and opportunity passes.

AMERICAN UNEMPLOYMENT THE ISSUE

In the meantime our debts are piling sky high, approaching fifty billions, with a $6,000,000,000 deficit this year, while our workmen go jobless and hungry and our farmers are losing their farms. Progressive, liberal, and labor-minded people have time and again urged an American common-sense program which will solve our defense and domestic difficulties, but our Wall Street plutocracy will not listen. They seem bent on their own and the Nation's destruction. "For whom the gods would destroy, they first make mad."

William S. Knudsen, head of the great General Motors Corporation, now tells us that we cannot equip even an army of 2,000,000 men before 1944. We are told that we cannot have any tanks until 1942—that we are now drawing blueprints of these tanks. In the name of common sense and all reason, what have our experts and defense men been doing? Have they all been asleep while the world was burning? I have always advocated adequate American defense, and we have made available huge sums of money, greater peacetime sums than any other nation in the history of the world. Now we are being urged on by insane hysteria. Reason! We seem to be bereft of reason. We talk about conscripting 42,000,000 men and paying them $5 a month. It is true that after the cold reception by the general public of these proposals certain changes are being considered; but remember, my fellow citizens, the proponents have not yet given up their original proposals. They are even now arguing for their restoration. Such proposals are worthy of a program for the serfs of the Old World.

CONSCRIPTION FOR FOREIGN SERVICE UNCONSTITUTIONAL

Conscription for foreign service is entirely illegal. Hannis Taylor, well-known authority on constitutional law, stated during the last World War: "Every citizen of this country should know, first, that under our Constitution no American soldier can be sent abroad except those composing the Regular Army; second, that the ranks of the Regular Army can only be swelled by voluntary enlistment."

When they tell you that conscription is constitutional, tell them that our greatest constitutional lawyer, Daniel Webster, defined it not only as unconstitutional but absurdly contrary to the very spirit of our Constitution and American Government.

An administration that will not limit the National Guard to service in the United States and its possessions, including the Philippines, is planning to stand on foreign soil.

WHY STAND ON FOREIGN GROUND

Washington, our greatest President, warned: "Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalship, interest, humor, or caprice?"

The World War proved the impossibility, even in Europe, of waging effective offensives with great unwieldy armies of conscript civilians. The present war in Europe proves that large civilian conscript armies, when confronted with small, fast-moving armies of experts, are outflanked and surrounded without ever coming to grips with combat troops.

We must not be stampeded into embracing the conscription system of foreign countries. A decent American standard of pay and a decent American opportunity for training and advancement will unquestionably provide us with an Army of adequate size. The Navy has no recruiting problem because, as one Army man has recently pointed out, the average pay of the sailor is 90 percent greater than that of the soldier. Nor does the Air Corps have a recruiting problem.

BRANDING TRUE AMERICANS

The spontaneous objections of the American people to this conscription bill have been termed Nazi-directed and subtle Nazi propaganda. Your many letters and cards were so referred to by a Senator in the hearings on the Burke-Wadsworth bill. The free expressions of Americans who refuse to be yoked to military slavery at $5 to $21 a month, the objections raised by millions of Americans to underwriting the safety of the British Empire, is being met with the cry of Nazi propaganda.

I am weary of such unfair attacks upon the sincerity of Americans. I have never heard of a German or a German-born American with the gall to ask that we help Germany; but red, yellow, brown, black, and white races—all are expected to die for the British Empire.

I warn the American people that we cannot defend America by defending the old empires and kings of Europe. Any such reasoning by any propaganda committee proclaiming such a doctrine is dragging America into European war and is subversive to the best interests of the United States. We are not a colony of the Old World. If we continue to act like one, we may as well declare our Declaration of Independence a scrap of paper.

LET AMERICANS BE HEARD

The conscription bill has not passed. Its passage is not inevitable. It can be defeated. The people should make known their protest. Write your Congressmen and Senators. Telephone them. Wire them. Come to Washington to see them. You must do this now. Immediate protest will block the way to militarizing our Nation.

I have just received a wire from the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, addressed to:

"Hon. ERNEST LUNDEEN,

"Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

"Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen respectfully requests you to vote against Burke-Wadsworth military conscription bill. We oppose this bill setting up a regimentation of citizenry as out of line with democratic principles.

"G. T. LINDSTEN, Chairman."

Let me say to the members of the Railway Brotherhoods, I shall remember your wire. I will stand by the American way.

Willkie and Utilities

OF

HON. H. H. SCHWARTZ

OF WYOMING

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 19 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ARTICLE BY GEORGE SANFORD HOLMES

Mr. SCHWARTZ. Mr. President, I ask to insert in the appendix of the RECORD an article appearing in the Sunday Herald of Bridgeport, Conn., August 18, from the pen of George Sanford Holmes. Mr. Holmes is a well-known newspaper man and writer, for 20 years connected with Scripps-Howard newspapers at Denver and in the city of Washington.

Mr. Holmes quotes from the address of Wendell L. Willkie delivered before the Economic Club of New York and the Harvard Business School Club January 31, 1935, wherein the Republican candidate places his zeal for preserving "public utilities privately owned" as more appealing than was that of his past general service to his country.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Bridgeport (Conn.) Sunday Herald of August 18, 1940]

WILLKIE ON UTILITIES MAJOR CAMPAIGN ISSUE—EARLY SPEECH SHOWS CANDIDATE'S SENSE OF DUTY MAY BE DIVIDED

(By George Sanford Holmes)

WASHINGTON.—Students of Wendell Willkie's public utterances are wondering if, in outlining his beliefs as a Presidential aspirant, Mr. Willkie will reiterate his famous statement placing the preservation of the private-utility industry on a par with patriotism and service to his country.

The Republican candidate openly pledged himself to the task of saving the private utilities at a joint meeting held in New York January 21, 1935, by the Economic Club of New York and the Harvard Business School Club.

The unrestrained terms in which Mr. Willkie, then speaking for Commonwealth & Southern, announced his devotion to this cause attracted considerable attention, and his address was printed and circulated in investment circles and Wall Street.

Since then it had apparently been lost sight of, however, until exhumed from the voluminous mass of his writings and speeches by proponents of public ownership, who are interested in learning whether or not Mr. Willkie, in his White House candidacy, will stand by or repudiate his do-or-die pledge to the power industry.

Printed copies of his speech are now said to be practically collectors' items.

The fervor of Mr. Willkie's statement regarding his own consecration to what he described as a duty aroused special interest because in the same speech he accused some of the advocates of public power of entertaining beliefs that "partake of the nature of religious frenzy."

New Dealers here acquainted with Mr. Willkie's remarks at the Wall Street dinner, however, contend that nothing the most fanatical of them has ever said on the power question compares with the emotional, almost religious zeal with which the Republican candidate in 1935 assured his hearers that he regarded the fight for the utility industry as a patriotic duty. This is what he said:

"Those who oppose the utility organization, whether they be holding companies or operating companies, assume an attitude of superior virtue and patriotism.

"They seek to paint us who represent private enterprise in the utility business as antisocial, unpatriotic, and the despoilers of men. * * *

"I yield to no Government official, be he high or low, in my social obligations, love of country, or fellow feeling for the struggling masses of humanity.

"I do not like to make personal references but I want to say to you that no duty has ever come to me in my life, even that in the service of my country, which has so appealed to my senses of social obligation, partiotism, and love of mankind as this, my obligation to say and do what I can for the preservation of public utilities privately owned.

"All that I have observed, all that I know, and all that I read teaches me that I could do nothing nobler for the future financial stability and political good of my country or the social and economic well being of my fellow citizens than to stand firm and unafraid against this foolish fad and fancy of the moment."

New Deal spokesmen have underscored this sophomoric "oath of allegiance," as an all-time high in Wall Street oratory.

They do not criticize either its sincerity or accuracy as demonstrating the philosophy of its author.

What they are wondering is just how it squares with the concepts of public duty of a Presidential candidate.

Believing the power question will be one of the major issues of the campaign, if not the dominant one, they hold that the voters should be made acquainted with the Republican candidate's views in the matter.

When he puts duty to the utilities on an equal plane with that of duty to his country, they claim Mr. Willkie has gone further than any other advocate of the power interests.

If he should be elected, they point out, the conflict between this allegiance and that of his oath of office will become most important in view of the immense public power projects to which the Nation stands committed.

It is acknowledged by them that Mr. Willkie may assert there will be no conflict between the two devotions.

However, that is what they want to find out and in view of the Republican candidate's reputation for frankness, they hope he will make his position clear, now that he is no longer spokesman for a special interest but a candidate for the highest honor in the gift of America.

The question is all the more pertinent, they point out, because Senator CHARLES L. MCNARY, of Oregon, candidate for Vice President on the Republican ticket, is recognized through the Nation as a friend and proponent of public power, a supporter of the Tennessee Valley Authority enactment and an ardent advocate of Bonneville Dam, an undertaking of great importance to his own State of Oregon.

Just how the two team mates can reconcile their opposing stands has puzzled Washington ever since Mr. Willkie dictated the choice of Mr. MCNARY as his running mate, either as an antidote to his own views on the utility question or as a bid for the farmers' votes, or both.

The 1935 speech of Mr. Willkie before the New York business interests is regarded here as the Mein Kampf of the Republican nominee.

It enunciates his economic and political philosophy, his personal convictions on the utility issue, and charts his course in the struggle to preserve the private-utility interests.

This was long before he became a candidate for President, of course, and prior to his unsuccessful court action to have the T. V. A. declared unconstitutional.

It is now being referred to by new dealers as containing the essence of his ideas and beliefs on the theme of private, corporate control of water-power sites and streams belonging to all the people and they expect him to stick by it.

The claim that in their case, Job's prayer, "Oh, that mine adversary had written a book," has been answered.

The speech before the Economic Club was an all-around defense of the utility interests by Mr. Willkie and an attack upon the alleged inefficiency, waste, political manipulation, and patronage system of municipally operated plants.

It was in this speech that he referred to Mr. Samuel Insul as a "forceful, dynamic, and attractive figure."

Year 1936 All Over Again

OF

HON. LISTER HILL

OF ALABAMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 19 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE MONTGOMERY (ALA.) ADVERTISER

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, yesterday there appeared in the Montgomery (Ala.) Advertiser, from the pen of Mr. Grover Hall, an editorial entitled "1936 All Over Again." The editorial concludes with these significant words:

Perhaps this time Maine and Vermont will see the light, too.

The speech delivered on Saturday afternoon by Mr. Willkie was the subject of the editorial. I ask unanimous consent to have the editorial printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Montgomery (Ala.) Advertiser of August 8, 1940]

NINETEEN THIRTY-SIX ALL OVER AGAIN

There is one great issue in the coming Presidential campaign, according to Wendell Willkie, the Republican nominee. It is whether the New Deal can be dealt more economically by the Democratic Party or by the Republican Party. As nominee of the Republican Party, Mr. Willkie is convinced that he and his party can deal it best.

"The New Deal stands for doing what has to be done by spending as much money as possible. I propose to do it by spending as little money as possible. This is one great issue in domestic policy, and I propose in this campaign to make it clear," said Mr. Willkie.

So much for the issue upon which Mr. Willkie desires to base the coming campaign. The subject of economical operation of government is one of interminable and often fruitless argument not only between the two great political parties of this Nation but even within them. If Mr. Willkie intends to argue about those details of government before the people of the United States for the next two and a half months, he will only succeed in boring them. The first assumption made about the nominee of either of our two major parties is that they are capable and efficient men. That should be the first assumption made by the electorate concerning any candidate for any office who is ultimately granted the privilege of serving. The United States approves President Roosevelt's administration insofar as the details of that administration are concerned. No valid criticism has ever been made of that management of fiscal affairs. However, upon the matter of policy much criticism has been offered, some valid, some not. If Mr. Willkie has no criticism of that policy but only of the administration of it, then he hasn't raised any issue at all.

As for the rest of Mr. Willkie's speech, it was as depressing a disappointment as his attempt to create an issue that could not be brought to life by the best of miracle workers. The speech fell easily into three general classifications.

1. Political fluff that can be found in any mayor's address to an American Legion convention—any struggling lawyer's address to a southern audience at the cemetery on Memorial Day. Considered alone, this political fluff is worthless, but if it is implemented by a significant offering it is the most valuable aspect of democratic action.

2. Demagogic contradiction of which the Advertiser, as well as many another institution, we suspect, did not believe Mr. Willkie capable until yesterday.

3. The definition of issues, which has already been discussed.

Mr. Willkie is undoubtedly a sincere patriot. He is as convinced of the rightness of the democratic life as any other citizen of this democracy from Franklin Roosevelt on down to the lowest devotee of faith. But in that he differs not one whit from the whole range of adherents to the democratic faith.

Though Mr. Willkie denied that he would allow personalities to enter into his campaign, he made this pointed charge against President Roosevelt: "There have been occasions when many of us have wondered if he is deliberately inciting us to war. * * * And I believe it to be the first duty of a President to try to maintain peace. But Mr. Roosevelt has not done this. He has dabbled in inflammatory statements and manufactured panics. Of course, we in America like to speak our minds freely, but this does not mean that at a critical period in history our President should cause bitterness and confusion for the sake of a little political oratory."

With that charge firmly in mind, it is illuminating to review again these other statements by Mr. Willkie.

"We must admit that the loss of the British Fleet would greatly weaken our defense.

"We must face a brutal, perhaps, a terrible fact. Our way of life is in competition with Hitler's way of life."

"I promise, by returning to those same American principles that overcame German autocracy once before, both in business and in war, to out-distance Hitler in any contest he chooses in 1940 or after. And I promise that when we beat him, we shall beat him on our own terms, in our own American way."

Thus Mr. Willkie places himself in the strangely contradictory position of indicting President Roosevelt for making inflammatory statements (about which Mr. Willkie is politically vague as to date and time of utterance) and then he tries to go President Roosevelt one better in acknowledging the danger which faces the United States, in excoriating the author of that danger, Adolf Hitler as leader of the German people. Mr. Willkie even promises to "beat" Germany in 1940 if given a chance, but condemns President Roosevelt for creating a "manufactured panic" about the dangers facing the Nation. By implication, Mr. Willkie charges that President Roosevelt would lead us into war for his own political designs, but Mr. Willkie would "beat" Hitler on our "own terms" in 1940 if the electorate of the United States will only discard their present warmongering President and elect Mr. Willkie.

Mr. Willkie was the Advertiser's candidate for the Republican nomination. In assuming that position, the Advertiser was not acting in a shrewdly partisan manner. Frankly, the Advertiser was disappointed yesterday when it discovered that it had picked a dud. But this much must be said in apology for the error. Mr. Willkie was a dud among duds. Every other candidate for the Republican nomination had hung himself upon the public tree of intellectual incompetence. Mr. Willkie presented nothing but hope. He has made a fine record both as a lawyer (for corporations) and a corporation manager. He is still a good and sincere man. As much could be said for his disappointed rival, Senator ROBERT TAFT. But he is an inadequate political philosopher. He only claims, rather brashly, that he can do what President Roosevelt is doing better than President Roosevelt is doing it.

It looked for a time as if the outcome of the Presidential election would be decided principally upon the development of the situation in Europe. Now that Mr. Willkie's keyenote address has been delivered, it is apparent that it will be decided on the same issues which were presented to the electorate in 1936. Perhaps this time Maine and Vermont will see the light, too.

The Acceptance Speech of Mr. Willkie

OF
HON. STYLES BRIDGES
OF NEW HAMPSHIRE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, August 19 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ARTICLE BY RAYMOND CLAPPER

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I ask leave to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article under the heading "Sincere and brave words," by Raymond Clapper, appearing in the Washington (D. C.) Daily News of today, relative to the acceptance speech of Mr. Willkie.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Washington Daily News of August 19, 1940]

SINCERE AND BRAVE WORDS

(By Raymond Clapper)

REHOBOTH BEACH, DEL., August 19.—The Willkie acceptance speech was better in the newspapers than it was on the air. It must be read in type to be appreciated. Whereas President Roosevelt's remarks gain in effectiveness by delivery over the air, Mr. Willkie's lose.

The very real merits of the Willkie acceptance speech were muffled by the sloppy delivery, with frequent stumbling and slurring of words. The effect of this upon Republicans and Willkie worshipers here at this small summer resort was one of pain and disappointment. They had no specific suggestions as to the content of the speech. They said that it somehow just didn't measure up, didn't give them a thrill, didn't have the lift they had expected. That was about all one could get out of these friendly critics, but inasmuch as they are all Roosevelt-haters of long standing and had been intensely proud of Willkie, I regard their reaction as a significant index. I found that some changed their opinion about the speech after reading it in the newspapers the next morning, and thought it far better than they had at first realized.

The fact is that Mr. Willkie is being judged, as was Alf Landon 4 years ago, by the Roosevelt standard of radio crooning. The middle-western homespun style doesn't appear to have the appeal of the tailored Roosevelt speech. Mr. Roosevelt probably could have taken the Willkie script and made it sing. This all seems silly to me, but if people are going to be swayed by the cut of a radio voice, then that fact has to be taken into account. Mr. Willkie might well hope that President Roosevelt ignores his challenge to joint debate.

Not many major political utterances in modern times have rung with such courage as this Willkie acceptance speech. The world situation is driving the Roosevelt administration into steps that are disturbing and not welcome—such as conscription. Everyone would like to think that the outlook is not as black as President Roosevelt has pictured it. All would like to think with Colonel Lindbergh that everything is going to be just dandy, no matter who wins the war in Europe, and that it won't make much difference to us whether Britain wins or loses. There are some Republicans who have been tempted to dangle that fool's paradise before the voters this year. Mr. Willkie refused to indulge in such political day dreaming.

Mr. Willkie did not say things that were pleasant to hear. He spoke of toil and sweat and sacrifice. He spoke for conscription. He faced frankly the reality that the loss of the British Fleet would greatly weaken our defense, and he spoke for all possible material aid short of military involvement in present hostilities. He recognized that if Britain is defeated, we stand face to face in competition with Hitler—a competition in armaments, in production, in salesmanship.

Win or lose in this election, Mr. Willkie is bound to be a powerful voice in America for the next few years. This gives great importance to his pledge as follows: "I promise, by returning to those same American principles that overcame German autocracy once before, both in business and in war, to outdistance Hitler in any contest he chooses in 1940 or after. And I promise you that, when we beat him, we shall beat him on our own terms and in the American way."

That statement, for all practical purposes, freezes the general direction of our foreign policy for some time to come. In that pledge, Mr. Willkie has destroyed utterly the fugitive dreams of appeasement which have been hovering just below the surface of public discussion in the United States. Mr. Roosevelt in his acceptance speech warned that the opposition party might become an appeasement party. He tried to hang the tag of appeaser on Mr. Willkie. The trick didn't work. Some big business influences which have been toying with the idea that they might find a good thing in doing business with Hitler are now without any responsible spokesman.

A smaller man than Mr. Willkie, one with a weaker sense of public responsibility, one who was playing politics on a short-haul basis, would have made an entirely different kind of speech. A small-minded politician would have plunged the country into a bitter political struggle over foreign policy at a most fatal moment. He would have paralyzed us in the presence of real danger. Mr. Willkie has risen above that. He has placed national interests above politics in this crisis. He has spoken sincere and brave words. Whether the majority of voters will recognize them as such remains to be seen.

Unveiling of Bust of Senator Norris at Norris Dam, Tenn.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LISTER HILL

OF ALABAMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 19 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. LISTER HILL, OF ALABAMA

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, last Labor Day, September 4, 1939, I had the honor of speaking at the unveiling of a bust of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] at Norris Dam, Tenn., under the auspices of the Tennessee Valley Trades and Labor Council. I ask unanimous consent that my remarks made on that occasion be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Fitting it is that we gather here on this day, Labor Day, set aside to commemorate all those who labor and toil, to do honor to GEORGE W. NORRIS, whose life is a story of unremitting toil and of unending labor; fitting that on this day we should do honor to him who has so tirelessly and unceasingly fought labor's battles and than whom labor has had no truer, braver, or more devoted friend; fitting that this tribute should be accorded here at this beautiful place where all about us we behold GEORGE W. NORRIS' handiwork, the wonder and the glory of his dream and where his faith has indeed removed the mountains and subdued the kingdoms.

This bust presented to the people of the Nation and to the Tennessee Valley Authority by the workers of the Tennessee Valley will stand through the years a reminder to all who pass this way of the love, the esteem, and the appreciation in which the men and women of the Tennessee Valley Authority hold GEORGE W. NORRIS.

"What is the secret of your life?" asked Elizabeth Browning of Charles Kingsley. "Tell me, for I want to make mine beautiful, too." His reply was, "I had a friend."

We who work with the Tennessee Valley Authority have a friend. We have GEORGE W. NORRIS and because of his friendship our lives have been made fuller and richer and our memories of the past will be sweeter and happier. Through the years that have come and gone GEORGE W. NORRIS has dethroned autocratic power, lashed and driven out corruption in high places, convicted the spoilsmen, defeated monopoly, destroyed entrenched privilege, rescued the people's government from the hands of the despoilers, written law after law upon the statute books, and even changed the Constitution itself. With prophetic vision he saw the coming of the power age with its miracles and its marvelous possibilities and he declared, "Since Adam and Eve were driven from the Garden of Eden there has never been discovered an element in nature with so many possibilities of usefulness and pleasure as electricity. All that is needed to give humanity the full enjoyment of this modern giant is to cheapen its production. If stock manipulations can be eliminated and if financial legerdemain and unconscionable profits can be removed, it is the cheapest source of power and light known to man."

He stood upon the banks of the Columbia River and saw the roaring torrents unharnessed going to waste, the white plumes of water tumbling vainly to the sea while about him he beheld dimly lit homes in which smoking kerosene lamps sought to combat the deepening twilight, the farmer laboriously pumping his water by hand, the wife bending her aching back over the family washtub, and the children straining their young eyes by the flicker of the kerosene lamp. GEORGE W. NORRIS put on his armor. He went forth to battle to properly insure and safeguard the development of water power that the people might enjoy their inheritance; that they might get the benefit of the power that God Almighty had given to them.

In 1920 he became chairman of the Senate Committee on Agriculture which committee had jurisdiction over bills affecting Muscle Shoals. He visited Wilson Dam and he beheld again the picture that had so challenged him on the banks of the Columbia. Single-handed and alone he began the great fight to save Wilson Dam and the Tennessee River to the people of the Tennessee Valley. That fight constitutes perhaps the finest chapter in all American history of one man's courage, of one man's unending devotion, of one man's ability to hold at bay through the years and finally to conquer as unscrupulous, as powerful, and as dominating forces of privilege as this Nation has seen. GEORGE W. NORRIS made ready for the great fight. He studied power reports. He studied engineering plans. He made numerous visits to Muscle Shoals at his own expense and knew in every detail every phase of the Muscle Shoals question. He mastered the intricate technical details of hydroelectric generation and transmission. He studied every major river in the United States. He went to Canada. He studied at first hand the Ontario power system, the Seattle and Tacoma systems. He forsook all else and became the master of public power.

On the floor of the United States Senate GEORGE W. NORRIS met the enemy, the public-utility companies. He compared their high rates with the low rates of public power plants. He laid bare all the sordid story of their stock manipulations, unconscionable profits and exploitation of the people's heritage. These enemies of the people's rights denounced him and hurled their anathemas of contumely at him. They called him a dreamer, an enemy to advancement, a Socialist, a Bolshevist, a Communist, and everything else within the category of denunciation. They filled the country with their propaganda. Newspapers and magazines, many of which were owned by them, university professors, public speakers, and every possible means of propaganda were put to their service. Attempts were made to insert their propaganda even in the text books of the schools. As Senator NORRIS declared, all the power of society, of wealth, and of politics and the influence of one of the greatest trusts and monopolies on earth seemed arrayed against him.

Like Leonidas at Thermopylae GEORGE W. NORRIS held the pass. He stood steadfast and unmoved day after day, week after week, month after month. The fight dragged on. Muscle Shoals developed into a perennial political issue. GEORGE W. NORRIS never relented in his struggle to bring cheap electricity with all its blessings to the people. Time and again in the face of seemingly certain and overwhelming defeat he refused to place his trembling hands upon the altar of compromise. He never yielded to serve the hour. No thought of self, no allurement of personal preferment ever changed his course. He refused to strike hands with the wrong upon the theory that he might advance the right. When others retreated he moved forward. When others turned their backs to the foe he charged the enemy's ramparts. He fought on and fared on and finally after years of bitter warfare had come and gone he passed his bill for public ownership and public operation of Muscle Shoals through both Houses of the Congress, only to have the bill killed by the veto of Calvin Coolidge. Undaunted and undismayed, once again he passed the bill to have it killed by the veto of Herbert Hoover. As we see him tired and worn, as we see his struggles, his disappointments, his defeats, as we see him spent in the long weary fight of 13 years of bitter and constant warfare there come to us the lines of the old English ballad:

"Fight on my men," says Sir Andrew Barton,
"I am hurt but I am not slain,
I'll lie me down and bleed a while
And then I'll rise and fight again."

At long last there came to the helm of State at Washington another gallant warrior whose daring battles as Governor of the State of New York had caused GEORGE W. NORRIS to say of him, "He is the nearest right on the power issue of any man in public life"—that other great humanitarian and friend of the people, Franklin D. Roosevelt. In January of 1933 Franklin D. Roosevelt, the President-elect and GEORGE W. NORRIS stood at Wilson Dam on the banks of the Tennessee and on that historic day agreed that GEORGE W. NORRIS' dream was to come true and that the Tennessee Valley Authority would be established with all of its benefits and blessings for the people of the Tennessee Valley and with its word of promise for every American home.

As the Tennessee Valley Authority and its army of loyal workers carry on through succeeding days meeting high expectations and bringing more and richer accomplishments to the social and economic life of the people of the Tennessee Valley we see unfolded in brighter outline, in more golden color the fundamental justice and the wonderful possibilities of the dream of GEORGE W. NORRIS. Here indeed is the wisest and widest experiment ever conducted by a Government moving to successful fruition, not alone a program to bring electricity in abundant fashion to all the people, not alone a coordinated plan to develop and conserve the natural resources of the vast basin of the Tennessee River, not alone a project of reclamation and conservation but indeed a program "that touches and concerns all human needs."

Because of the fight GEORGE W. NORRIS waged the people of the country became power conscious. They became aware of the shocking wrongs and the ruthless exploitation of the Power Trust. Public sentiment demanded an end to the abuses. The Holding Companies Act was placed upon the statute books; Boulder Dam, Grand Coulee, Fort Peck, and Bonneville were built and under the leadership of GEORGE W. NORRIS and Franklin D. Roosevelt, the Federal Government became the match, if not the master, of the Power Trust. Today this same Power Trust, perhaps a little chastened but still powerful with its same billions in over-capitalization and watered stock, its same lust for profits and its same desire for power and control, would sabotage, would undermine, would weaken, and, if possible, would destroy the Tennessee Valley Authority and the public-power program of the Nation. Only eternal vigilance and resolute courage on the part of the people can insure the life and the future of the Authority and the program.

The Tennessee Valley Authority, denied necessary appropriations by the Congress, denied the cooperation of the Congress, denied the support and confidence of the executive branch of the Government after 1940, hamstrung, shackled, and crippled, would be an Authority doomed to die. The resurgent efforts of the Power Trust to again influence the affairs of government and, if possible, to control and dominate government for its own selfish ends are indeed evident. It seems to have captured the capitals of at least certain of our States. Its handiwork and its potency were well seen in Washington during the past session of the Congress in the fight for the appropriation for the Watts Bar Dam, as well as in other struggles. At all costs, if the rights and heritage of the people are to be protected and preserved the Power Trust must not be permitted to capture the Nation's capital.

GEORGE W. NORRIS has never lost faith in the ultimate judgment of the people. He believes in them, in their final judgment and the moral standards that move and at last control them. He has often declared that if the people were informed and understood the truth their judgment would be just. If we would be true to him, if we would be true to the great principles for which he has fought, if we would save and preserve for ourselves and for our children and our children's children the untold benefits and blessings of the great handiwork that he has wrought, we must fearlessly and courageously carry the message to the people. We must see to it that they know the truth that the truth may make them free. We must bear the advancing torch of light and wisdom as GEORGE W. NORRIS has done that the people may not be defeated in their rights and their welfare by the powers of privilege and entrenched greed sustained and supported by those who are opposed to progressive change.

Here in this presence on this moving and historic occasion, with hearts resolved and purposes fixed, let us dedicate ourselves to the great purpose that the rights of the people and their heritage shall be preserved and in the sacrament of this hour, in holy resolution, let us plight our sacred honor, our fortunes, and our faith to GEORGE W. NORRIS and declare to him:

In the valley of decision
  Down the road of things that are,
You gave to us a vision;
  You appointed us a star;
And through the cities of derision
  We followed you from afar.

On the hills beyond tomorrow,
  On the road to things to do,
With that strength of hand we borrow
  As we borrow soul from you
We know not sloth nor sorrow
  And will build your vision true.

Eire's Stand for Neutrality

OF

HON. JAMES E. MURRAY

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 19 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ARTICLE BY PETER LYNE

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, the able Prime Minister of Eire, Mr. Eamon de Valera, outspoken champion of the rights of small democratic nations, has taken a resolute stand on the right of his country to remain at peace. He speaks with the authority of a courageous statesman who has spent a lifetime in the cause of freedom. His spirited defense of Irish neutrality at this time is a matter of great interest to all freedom-loving Americans who sympathize with the plight of small nations in this war-mad world.

The Christian Science Monitor of August 12 contains an article by Peter Lyne, its staff correspondent, which tells the story of Eire's stand for neutrality. I ask unanimous consent that this article may be printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Christian Science Monitor of August 12, 1940]

EIRE "UNITEDLY NEUTRAL"—DE VALERA

(By Peter Lyne)

DUBLIN, August 12.—The danger of Eire falling an easy prey to aggression, like Denmark, Belgium, the Netherlands, and Norway, was vigorously discounted by Eamon de Valera, head of the Dublin Government, in an exclusive interview.

"Our position is in many ways not comparable to that of those other small neutrals," Mr. de Valera declared to this correspondent. Asked "Who?" Eire's leader was immediately beset with difficulties confronting a neutral spokesman discussing possible war developments. He consequently resorted to terms such as "If A attacks us, B would * * *." Incidentally such references come easily to him as a mathematical scholar.

Briefly his reasons for confidence were:

1. That geographically the position of Eire vis-à-vis the main belligerents presented considerable difficulty for invasion by any long sea route and that any attempt at a land invasion could be made very costly.

2. The training of the small, well-equipped, and mechanized Irish Army has for 20 years naturally been directed in large measure to the problem of how best to resist invasion.

DEFENSES STRENGTHENED

3. That in addition the recent recruiting of volunteer organizations and coast-watching services has greatly strengthened defenses.

4. That Eire in its resolve to defend its neutrality is united as never before.

5. That those in Eire who might aid one or other of the belligerents are negligible in numbers.

Finally, as Mr. de Valera expressed it, "If A invades us, B would be ready to come to our aid."

Less neutrally stated, this means to this correspondent that if Germany succeeded in landing troops in Eire, Britain would send immediate aid from the large forces waiting along the Ulster border, or in case of British invasion Irish resistance would inevitably attract intervention by Germany.

RESENT DOUBTS ON DEFENSE

So, with confidence in his country's defense and strategical position, with full support of his people for a neutral policy, and with firm conviction that any attempt at British occupation would have the most determined opposition, Mr. de Valera reaffirmed once more to me his resolve to "stay neutral."

I discussed with him certain radio-press comments in Britain and the United States which belittled or even ridiculed Eire's ability to defend itself, and drew the conclusion that these are resented here.

With regard to suggestions in one of the American comments that Britain was showing an exaggerated respect for Irish rights and should take control of Eire's land and sea defenses, Mr. de Valera said that in a war claimed to be for the liberation of occupied territories it was curious to find citizens of a neutral country speaking of exaggerated respect for another neutral's rights and demanding violation of another neutral's independence.

To a further suggestion, also from the United States, that Eire's policies of neutrality were dictated by extremists his comment was simply to recall a meeting of the Irish Parliament last September at which the spokesmen of every party—Opposition, Labor Party, Independent Group, and Government Party—unanimously approved a declaration of neutrality. The declaration was supported the next day by newspapers of every shade of opinion in the country. The Irish Times, whose British sympathies are known, declared: "In all the circumstances it is the only policy which the Irish Government could pursue."

NO PRETENSE IN RESISTANCE

When I drew Mr. de Valera's attention to a report that an Irish army would put up a mere show of force if Britain marched in first, the Premier said: "That is a dangerous misapprehension." Whoever violated Irish territory would find that there would be no pretense about the resistance the Irish people would put up. Perhaps the best way for an American to understand our situation, he said, would be to consider what he himself would do if any invader entered his country. No matter who the invader was he would resist to the fullest of his strength. So would the Irish people.

I discussed with him statements so widely made that the German Legation staff in Dublin numbers 60 and 100, that at least 500 Germans are located around Dublin, and that the River Shannon power scheme is managed by German engineers.

Mr. de Valera said the facts were that the German Legation staff numbered six, which was less than the British or American; that in the whole of Eire there were only some 300 Germans, and that the Shannon scheme engineers had gone home long before the war. He mentioned parenthetically that the last census showed over 22,000 British in Eire.

PUZZLED BY AMERICAN PRESS

Mr. de Valera seemed genuinely puzzled by the latest press attitude in the United States which so often in the past had championed the struggle for Irish independence.

Part of this attitude, he feels, is due to misapprehension of the extent of Irish preparations for defense. Eire's population is less than a fortieth of that of the United States, yet Eire's regular defense forces are almost a third of the Regular United States Army as authorized by Congress April 1938. In this connection it must be remembered also that Eire's territorial area is less than a hundredth part of that of the United States.

The recent recruiting drive for additional forces, Mr. de Valera told me, has already had a remarkable response. The total at the beginning of August was more than 170,000. This, added to the regular defense forces, means that almost one men in every four of the entire male population between 18 and 64 has enrolled for one or other form of defense. A similar proportion in the United States would be over 10,000,000.

The Irish Army command, Mr. de Valera continued, has, of course, kept up with the latest military developments and the new problems they present. Eire's terrain, Mr. de Valera claimed, is peculiarly suited to a general military policy of small mobile columns and the army proper is well equipped with modern weapons.

Premier de Valera admitted that they hadn't in the country all the arms they would like to have for the new forces that had been raised. He added, "That isn't our fault. Contracts placed for arms abroad have not been filled. We are seeking arms anywhere we can get them; we are ready to pay cash for them. We have sought them even in the United States."

ALL POWERS INCLUDED

Commenting on the suggestion that the United States might be prepared to send its fleet to protect Eire's neutrality, Mr. de Valera said he did not think the United States was prepared to do anything of the kind.

He did say, however, that an effective international guaranty of neutrality, particularly if the United States were a party to it, would be the best policy for a small country like Ireland. Indeed, he added, that was the policy of the Irish Government back in 1921 when an effort was made to negotiate a just peace with Britain.

Questioned further, he said that by "international" he meant to include continental powers as well as Britain.

He discussed the question of partition, regretting that it had not yet been settled. "Long before this war broke out," he said, "I stressed the importance of this island being a strategic unit for the purposes of defense.

"Were the partition of our country removed and the Irish people as a whole responsible for the national territory, a position of great defensive strength would have been reached.

"The mere removal of partition which is resented in every part of Ireland and by the great Irish populations overseas would have been in itself a source of strength. But partition was allowed to remain, and it is no use denying that it presents a serious danger in the situation as it exists. It creates division in public opinion in the partitioned area which profoundly weakens the defensive power of that part of Ireland."

GOOD WILL NEEDED

Asked if he saw any chance of partition being abolished now Mr. De Valera said that the wisest thing from every point of view would be to get rid of it. The right to maintain Irish neutrality was fundamental to the solution of the problem, but if there were good will on all sides a way undoubtedly could be found out of the difficulty.

Seven months before the war began he had stated in the Senate that unity could not be purchased at a price which would include taking from the Irish nation the right to decide for itself whether or not it would participate in any war.

Mr. de Valera denied reports that he had met Viscount Craigavon, Premier of Northern Ireland, since the war. "I met him once in 1921," he said, "to discuss differences between us." A smile came over Mr. de Valera's aquiline face as he referred to the fact that they had agreed on nothing.

"I have been his guest twice since them," he added, and his Irish smile broadened—"in gaol." This referred to Mr. de Valera's visit to his Northern Ireland constituency in County Down for which both he and Lord Craigavon had been elected, and to his later visit to the Nationalist city of Derry. On both occasions he was arrested and imprisoned for crossing the border.

Conscript Armies

OF

HON. BENNETT CHAMP CLARK

OF MISSOURI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 19 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

STATEMENT BY FORMER REPRESENTATIVE PETTENGILL

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a release from the pen of former Representative Samuel B. Pettengill, of Indiana, entitled "Conscript Armies."

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONSCRIPT ARMIES

Must the world become a munitions dump and a once Christian civilization a concentration camp? No one knows, and until the fog lifts we must keep a lot of powder dry.

Still the question remains, Is there a safe middle road between inadequate preparedness and the conscript armies that have been the plaything of kings and the curse of mankind? Must we in America have a "Cossack on the back of every peasant"?

Just now we are on one of our periodical sprees. They come in different forms—barnyard golf, tree sitting, marathon dancing, Florida real estate, food fads, mission furniture, "manifest destiny," and "make the world safe for democracy." Of the last two, one took us to Asia and the other to Europe.

Conscription is now "the thing." The herd mind is on a stampede; and if anyone says, "Come, let us reason together," Senator PEPPER, self-admitted patriot, sprains his larnyx. This bill, the principle of which Mr. Roosevelt has advocated for 20 years, was written by some very enthusiastic gentlemen. In its original form the bill allowed the conscript soldier $5 a month, or $40 for 8 months. If he spent nothing for cigarettes or postage on letters to mother, he would have at the end a little more than if he had been in prison. Some people are very generous in the sacrifices they ask others to make.

Contrast the conscripted soldier with the C. C. C. boys. The latter gets $30 a month, serves only 6 months, are not under military discipline, and take no risk of stopping a bullet. These young boys get six times as much pay as the writers of the bill allowed the conscript. The C. C. C. boys get more even than the $21 a month paid the private in our Regular Army. One would think that before resorting to peacetime conscription for the first time in our history, these different kinds of service would at least be placed on an equality of pay.

Then, too, it might help if the able-bodied sons of prominent and well-paid fathers in Washington, D. C., and elsewhere were to volunteer as buck privates. "But the wind listeth and there is no sound."

Large religious groups are becoming aroused over the spread of the spirit of militarism. Organized labor is asking where it will lead. John Lewis and Philip Murray say that if you are going to conscript men you should also conscript money. This is fundamentally just. The difficulty is that the conscription of all men and all property in peacetime is the exact equivalent of totalitarianism.

It is easy to say that patriotism is not something to be purchased. I agree. And in wartime no complaint in principle could be made against the conscript serving without any pay whatever, providing everybody else works for a bare subsistence also, the machinist, farmer, manufacturer, and the pay rollers in Government, Congressmen and Presidents included.

But peacetime conscription is another story. Why should the forced conscript give up 3 years of his life in the service of the Nation for less pay than a fireman or policeman gets in the service of his town or city? And if that pay were allowed, would we need conscription? Moreover, with the present Regular Army, National Guard and reserves totaling 750,000 men, many of whom could be trained only with broomsticks, why must conscription go into effect 1 month before election?

Conscript armies have been the curse of the ages. They are the enemy of free institutions. They are to be endured only as a matter of bitter necessity when everything else fails and then only for the period and to the extent actually needed. Whether in the barracks of czar, kaiser, or Hitler, peacetime conscription teaches men to "soldier." It makes men docile. It conditions them for the spiritual goosestep and the worship of Caesar. If this is not so then our forefathers learned nothing in centuries of tyranny.

America must be invulnerable from attack but it can be attacked only from across wide oceans. Give us then a Navy and an air arm sufficient to defend our homeland against every hazard. Give us also a small mechanized volunteer Army, magnificently equipped and well paid. Then we may escape the blight of militarism and imperialism in the land which was once the beacon of the oppressed.

SAMUEL B. PETTENGILL.

Address By Ambassador William C. Bullitt

OF

HON. ALBEN W. BARKLEY

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 19 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE PHILADELPHIA RECORD

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial in today's issue of the Philadelphia Record commenting on the speech delivered yesterday afternoon by Ambassador Bullitt.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Philadelphia Record of August 19, 1940]

THEY ARE COMING

A sentry in a tower, a frightened fisherman scudding home, gave the alarm of old when the enemy approached. Nowadays the physical position of a possible adversary is almost always known. But his direction and intentions are not so clearly revealed. Modern communication eliminates the necessity of a Paul Revere's ride. But modern complexity creates confusion that gives the surprise attack as much force as it ever had.

The sentries of our time are men who use their heads as well as their eyes. Men who can analyze movements afar and say "That is danger. They are coming."

William C. Bullitt has been, for 4 years, our Ambassador in Paris, an outpost. He returns and tells his countrymen what he has seen and the meaning of what he has seen. Last evening, in Independence Square, Bullitt sounded an alarm in language plain enough.

We quote here some excerpts from a speech that should be read in full:

"America is in danger. It is my conviction, drawn from my experience and from the information in the hands of our Government in Washington, that the United States is in as great peril today as France was a year ago."

* * * * * * * *

"To prepare the way for military attack on a democracy they—the dictators—employ every variety of agent and propaganda to befuddle the public so that the democracy will not prepare in time."

* * * * * * *

"How many Americans are playing the dictators' game without knowing it?"

* * * * * * *

"The truth is that the destruction of the British Navy would be the turning of our Atlantic Maginot line. Without the British Navy the Atlantic would give us no more protection than the Maginot line gave France after German troops had marched through Belgium. The soothing words 'Maginot line' were the refrain of a lullaby of death for France. The soothing words 'Atlantic Ocean' are being used now by the propagandists of the dictators in the hope that they may become a lullaby of death for the United States."

* * * * * * *

"Our defense against the enemies who are already within our country has still to be organized. Nealy all our defense against the enemies that are still outside our country has still to be organized."

* * * * * * *

"The fighting line of the war for the enslavement of the human spirit is nearing our shores. * * * Our fate and the fate of our children depends upon what each of us does now."

It will be said that Bullitt exaggerates the danger. Is that too grave a fault in a sentry, even if it were true? Isn't it far better that the enemy be reported as a mile off, when he is actually a mile and a quarter away, than that a sleeping sentry not see the enemy at all?

Our defense lags. Conscription is still snarled up in congressional verbiage. Production is snarled in confusion and conflict over price.

If Bullitt is "alarmist" enough to alarm us into action he will have saved his country. We can think of no higher praise for one of the great speeches of our time.

Private Versus Public Ownership of Electric Power

OF

HON. STYLES BRIDGES

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 19 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. STYLES BRIDGES, OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD a radio address delivered by me on August 18, 1940, on the program of the American Forum of the Air in a debate on the subject Private Versus Public Ownership of Electric Power.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Sixty years ago, when Thomas Edison gave to the world a practical method of putting electricity to man's uses, the public ownership and operation of electrical systems was as common as public ownership of water and sewer systems is today. But the art of manufacturing and distributing electricity is a much more difficult proposition than the simple problems of water supply. As the science developed, the skill and brains encouraged by private enterprise soon demonstrated that in this field private operation was far superior to public operation. By 1902 only 7.8 percent of the Nation's power bill was paid to public agencies. Today the percentage is down to 4.3 percent. The failure of public ownership to survive without the aid of substantial subsidy in competition with private ownership is the best practical test of its value.

Under private development electricity today is just about the cheapest item in any family budget both for quantity and quality. It is the one item that, with the exception of the war year, 1918, has been less expensive to the consumer each year since the industry began. The national average price per kilowatt-hour 50 years ago was 25 cents; today the average cost is 3.9 cents. According to Government studies, electricity is the least costly item in the poor man's budget, averaging only 1½ percent in the living expenses of the family with a total of $1,300 income.

The electric-utility industry of today, carrying all the comforts and conveniences of electricity into 30,000,000 American homes, presents the finest picture of what the American system of free enterprise can contribute to the development of a nation. Every American citizen has at his command more than twice as much electric current as does the average citizen of any other nation in the world.

The growth of this great servant of the people is typical of the possibilities of how private enterprise, blossoming under the American way, can and has spread comfort, wealth, and happiness to everyone. The automobile, the radio, the telephone, air conditioning, and a hundred other examples could be named.

After all, this huge industry is owned by the public—really a form of public ownership. Most everyone—you and I—directly or indirectly owns a substantial part of it. Besides the 4,000,000 Americans who directly hold stock in it, one-fourth of the whole value of the electrical industry is represented in the underlying securities which back up 65,000,000 life-insurance policies of the Nation. It's the clever thing nowadays among the smart-aleck New Deal intelligentsia to jeer at the widows and orphans as unimportant factors in their new blue prints for America. But to you and to me and to all home-keeping folks the security and protection of our dear ones after we can no longer provide is not the subject of wisecracks and light-hearted indifference.

In addition, there are millions of rainy-day savings accounts, each of which is partly invested in utility securities. The industry is owned on Main Street, not on Wall Street. New Deal blows aimed at big shots on Wall Street have struck the little fellow on Main Street.

In the past 7 years, however, the old, discredited idea of putting Government in business, and especially in the electrical business, has assumed new importance. Local public ownership of electrical utilities in general having proved a failure, it therefore was natural that the new dealers would like to extend the failure on a national scale; not only did the idea present a wonderful opportunity to spend other people's money but it created tremendous possibilities for the perpetuation of the New Deal regime by the building up of an army of officeholders whose self-interest lay in expansion of the program.

The only check in the downward march of public ownership has been during the New Deal spending spree.

That strange combination of hard-boiled politicians and soft-boiled dreamers whose cynical alliance constitutes the New Deal "planned it that way." They had, for years, a standing offer of a 45-percent bribe to communities which would go into business in duplication of existing business. The record of failure established by public ownership had been so glaring that only by such outrageous use of money appropriated for unemployment relief could any interest in such projects be aroused.

But even that tremendous inducement failed in its purpose. The vote of 561 communities on this subject from the year 1934 to 1939, inclusive, stood 3 to 1 against letting the city-hall gang get its hands on the local light plant. The vote was against the bosses by approximately 7,000,000 to 2,000,000.

That's the only kind of referendum that counts in our democracy. We Americans have several fundamental ideas about the functions of our Government. We believe that our Government should serve us; not that we should be the creatures of our Government. Hence we instinctively avoid men and measures aiming to reverse our relationship with the Government.

We believe that the job of government is to govern. That is, the job of government is to divert, in taxes, a part of each year's annual productivity into channels which will provide for the national welfare. These channels include the national defense and public safety, the improvement of health, the protection of labor, of the underprivileged, and the regulation and encouragement of commerce.

We do not believe that it is the function of government to invade the field of productivity, to enter into the fields of trade and manufacture. We do not believe it to be a proper function for government to enter into competition with its citizens whose productivity furnish, in taxes, the sinews of government.

The new dealers, therefore, rarely admit that socialization of this essential American industry is their objective. No, indeed; all they say that they want are such high-sounding objectives as "conservation of our natural resources"—and who does not—the development of so-called yardsticks, unemployment relief and other sweet and noble experiments that only reactionaries could oppose.

Behind these pretty words, the New Deal fellow travelers have built themselves a mighty political machine that has little in common with cheap power. So-called cheap power such as T. V. A. supplies is about the most expensive kind of power there is when your tax bills are added.

T. V. A. charges off 50 percent of its investment to the non-revenue-producing functions of alleged control and alleged navigation improvement. Thus, it cuts its power costs in half. Its benefits in navigation and flood control are obviously phony according to the testimony of all unbiased engineers. That charge-off chiefly serves the purpose of permitting T. V. A. to set up bogus yardstick power rates at the expense of the taxpayers. It does not even pay interest to the United States Treasury on the sums appropriated by Congress. Why should you and I as Federal taxpayers have to help pay Congressman RANKIN'S light bill in his home town in Mississippi?

Let's analyze the forces behind the public-ownership movement in this country today. This movement constitutes a combination of commercial and political racketeers with enough sincere and zealous followers, who, as a whole, cover up the promoters and racketeers.

A typical example is the case of Carl D. Thompson, sometimes called Dr. Thompson because he is an ex-preacher who forsook the pulpit to take up socialism.

Dr. Thompson has a long record of activity with the Socialist Party. Years ago, while he was director of propaganda for the Socialist Party, he founded and became head of a forerunner of the 1940 "Communist transmission-belt" organization. It was called the Public Ownership League of America. It is principally financed by commercial interests profiting by the sale of services and equipment in connection with publicly owned plants. Its "front", in addition to the estimable Thompson, consists of earnest, zealous people whose intentions should not be questioned.

The coming of the New Deal and the power division of the P. W. A. was a bonanza for Thompson. His friend and patron, Harold Ickes, promptly put Thompson on the P. W. A. pay roll as an examiner of applications for municipal ownership power grants. Thompson doubled in brass on that job, continuing without interruption his job as executive secretary of his personal meal ticket, the Public Ownership League.

And today Thompson, while continuing as secretary of his league, is on the Federal pay roll of the Bonneville Administration at $466 per month as a so-called power consultant, actively speaking and campaigning in public ownership elections for that organization. The Hatch Act specifically forbids Federal employees from participating in or attempting to influence elections. But the news about the Hatch Act hasn't reached the Bonneville Administration, apparently.

The league is really a sort of super-sales organization for a tight little group of electrical engineering firms, municipal bond houses, and Diesel-engine manufacturers. It publishes a small magazine which carries heavy advertising lineage from these business concerns, but the space rates of the magazine are not known to me, despite diligent inquiry. The chairman of the finance committee of the league is also the head of the biggest engineering firm in the country specializing in municipal electric plants.

But a laborer must be worth his hire. Thompson, the front man, has delivered the goods.

While he was still in the Nation's capital he agreed to campaign for a state-wide public ownership revenue bond election in Oklahoma which was secretly being financed by a large Diesel engine manufacturer. This fact was brought out when one of the company's subagents, working for an Oklahoma attorney, sued the latter for fees past due.

I fear that this revelation may prove embarrassing to some of my colleagues of both Houses inasmuch as this league has distributed hundreds of thousands of pieces of public ownership propaganda under the free mailing privileges of Members of Congress.

This is not an isolated case. The record is rotten with proved charges of corruption and bribery of city officials. I have not the time to develop this story at length tonight but I intend to discuss it fully in the Senate at some early appropriate occasion.

I have in my possession information as to how a leading engineering firm and principal supporter of the Public Ownership League padded its fees to a midwest city in order to pay off a political henchman who had arranged a rate survey job for them from that city.

I have in my possession information as to how a Diesel company attempted to buy up a city council at a thousand dollars a head—like so many cattle.

I have said that municipal ownership is usually inefficient but please understand that I do not say that it necessarily follows that public ownership is always a failure. There are plenty of examples of good management that rival anything private enterprise can match. It is a pleasure to cite the city of Eugene, Oreg., as a model municipal plant where frugal management, the early amortization of investments, strict bookkeeping, and—note this—complete elimination of politics, have given to the people of that community fine service and low rates.

Moreover, I am personally familiar with several successfully operated municipal plants which time does not permit me to enumerate, but among them is a plant operated by the town of Wolfeboro in my own State.

In every such instance, however, the key to success is that they have kept the light plant strictly out of politics and run it on a business basis. The fact that so many publicly owned plants have failed is almost solely due to mismanagement and inefficiency by political officeholders. Instant dismissal is the price of inefficiency under private management but is rather expected from political officeholders.

Nor should my observations regarding the character of greedy money interests and politicians supporting public ownership be taken as reflecting in the slightest upon the right of any community to vote at any time on this question. That right is always a useful, if seldom needed, escape from high rates. It should always be preserved.

There is much that I have left unsaid tonight for lack of time. On another occasion I hope to present the truth behind the claims of T. V. A. and other Federal agencies that the power they are selling to a privileged few is actually the most expensive power being generated in the United States tonight and that you and I are paying for it. Until that occasion I shall leave to my colleagues the development of other phases of this discussion.

Assaying the New Deal

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

EDITORIAL FROM THE WASHINGTON DAILY NEWS

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial appearing in today's Washington Daily News under the heading "Assaying the New Deal."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Daily News of August 19, 1940]

ASSAYING THE NEW DEAL

We've been hearing and reading much Democratic comment on Wendell Willkie's acceptance speech, and the substance of most of it seems to be about this:

That Mr. Willkie agreed with Mr. Roosevelt on foreign policy, approved most of the New Deal's domestic reforms, and did not prove that he could do a better job in either field than the President has done.

Congressman T. V. SMITH of Illinois, one of the fairest and most intelligent of all new dealers, paid high tribute to the speech. He called it magnificent. But, Mr. SMITH went on to say, what Mr. Willkie offers is inexperienced leadership for the same tasks to which Mr. Roosevelt can apply experienced leadership.

It is true that both candidates endorse selective service training for defense man power. It is true that their general attitudes toward foreign policy have much in common. For these agreements the country may be thankful, since they offer hope that partisan differences may stop at the water's edge. Yet Mr. Willkie sought—successfully, we think—to make it clear that there is a fundamental difference. He would consider it his first duty as President to keep America out of war unless it were attacked, whereas he charged that Mr. Roosevelt, by some of his utterances and acts, "has courted a war for which the country is hopelessly unprepared—and which it emphatically does not want."

It is true that Mr. Willkie endorsed the principle of most of the reforms undertaken by the New Deal.

These are reforms which real liberals have always favored. By proclaiming his belief in them, we think Mr. Willkie revealed his essential liberalism as contrasted to the essential reactionism of Old Guard Republicans who have damned all the works of the New Deal.

But there are two Roosevelt policies which Mr. Willkie condemned emphatically, and these are the two which bear the seeds of destruction for all of the New Deal's desirable reforms:

1. The policy of trying to spend the country rich.
2. The policy of stirring hatred and class division.

Most of us have never ceased to believe that Mr. Roosevelt proclaimed in 1932—that a government or a family which lives beyond its income every year is headed for sure disaster. But this Government is living beyond its income every year, with outgo gaining constantly. And the people—even those who have benefited directly by New Deal spending—know instinctively that this is leading to disaster.

The Government, then, is not secure, and a government that is not secure cannot give security to its people. It cannot guarantee that internal security against poverty and greed which is the objective of the New Deal's reforms. It cannot guarantee security against external dangers.

And a people split by hatreds can neither cure their own ills nor effectively resist aggression from without.

So what Mr. Willkie proposes is not merely to do better what Mr. Roosevelt has attempted to do, but something much more. He proposes to rescue the Government from its drift toward disaster and to save the reforms instituted by the New Deal; to stop spending for the sake of spending, and to spend only for the sake of results; to stop merely trying to divide what wealth we have, and to start creating more wealth; to stop making the country weak by setting its people against each other, and to start making it strong by uniting the people for production.

The Democrats have better grounds for saying that Mr. Willkie did not explain Saturday precisely how he intends to do these things. But this was only the first of many speeches he will make.

What he presented at Elwood was a diagnosis. We believe it was an accurate diagnosis. The people will judge Mr. Willkie not by the clever phrases with which his opponents are trying to dismiss him, but by the logic and force with which he offers his remedies.

EDITORIAL FROM THE WASHINGTON POST

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial which appeared in the Washington Post on the subject of the Export-Import Bank legislation now pending before the Senate.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post]

ECONOMIC DEFENSE

In reporting out the bill authorizing a $500,000,000 increase in the lending authority of the Export-Import Bank the House Banking Committee has cleared the decks for action on the measure.

In addition to its present functions the bank would be empowered to "assist in the development of the resources, the stabilization of the economies and the orderly marketing of products of the countries of the Western Hemisphere." The present international situation makes it essential to carry out such a program in the interests of American defense.

The principal danger which the nations of Latin America face today arises out of the dislocating effects of the war and its possible aftermath. Cut off from a large part of their European markets for surplus products, these nations are plagued by economic difficulties which may make them a prey to "fifth column" elements. And should the war end in a German victory, each of these Latin American republics would, by itself alone, be in no position to withstand Nazi economic penetration that might undermine their independence.

The interest of the United States in the independence and stability of the 20 other republics of this hemisphere does not rest on a sentimental basis. The establishment anywhere in this hemisphere of a government ready to take orders from the totalitarian dictators would be a menace to our own safety. It is, therefore, scarcely less important for us to safeguard those nations against economic bludgeoning by a triumphant Third Reich than to build a navy capable of warding off any invasion of this hemisphere.

To argue, as does Congressman WOLCOTT, that the measure "will be interpreted [presumably by Germany] as an unfriendly act" is to argue that our current rearmament program is also an unfriendly act.

It is, on the contrary, a measure of defense. That point was made emphatic in the majority report of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee:

"The bill places this Government in a better position to meet an emergency which might otherwise eventuate in irreparable economic chaos and further totalitarian infiltration in Latin America. A situation of political, social, and economic instability in the Latin American republics renders them helpless to defend against future domination and control by totalitarian forces. Such a situation demands and justifies anticipatory steps to prevent a disastrous economic and political future."

Neither the United States nor the Latin American nations contemplate severance of economic relations between this hemisphere and a German-dominated Europe. That would be disastrous. But machinery must be created to protect those nations from duress by any non-American regime which may seek to employ its trading power to achieve political aims.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BENNETT CHAMP CLARK

OF MISSOURI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 19 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

STATEMENT BY FORMER REPRESENTATIVE PETTENGILL

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a release from the pen of former Representative Samuel B. Pettengill, of Indiana, entitled "Meddlesome Matte—Chapter 2."

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEDDLESOME MATTIE—CHAPTER 2

According to Senator WHEELER the country would be shocked if it knew the war plank which our President desired written into the Democratic platform. It undertook to say that we would not only give aid to the Allies, short of war, but that we would continue to do so until all democracies everywhere were restored to their former estate.

This plank created a sensation in the resolutions committee. It was so truculent in tone, so far reaching in its commitments that it was recognized by the political minds on the committee as campaign dynamite. As it came from the hands of Harry Hopkins' messenger it was torn into tiny bits that it might no more be seen of men. No copies were permitted to reach the press.

Assuming, as I do, that Senator WHEELER'S report is correct, as he was present in the room when it was first read, it is apparent that Mr. Roosevelt, if reelected, has an ambitious program laid out for us. We have a sacred duty to perform in China, Manchuria, Ethiopia, Albania, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Finland, Norway, Latvia, Estonia, Lithuania, Holland, Belgium, France. Probably we will not be called on to make democracy safe in India. We will leave that to Great Britain. But Somaliland, Algeria, Tunisia, Changching, Pungchow—we have business there. There is much to do and the night cometh. We must make Djibuti safe for democracy.

It is hard to believe that any American statesman in his right mind would propose such folly. However, it exactly ties in with the practical repudiation of the milder peace plank by Mr. Roosevelt in his acceptance speech, and with the repeated statements of the administration that the United States will refuse to recognize any government anywhere that has been established by military force.

Only last week Hon. Sumner Welles, Assistant Secretary of State, took time off to "lash" Soviet Russia for its absorption of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania. "Deliberate annihilation," "predatory activities" and "devious processes" were some of the choice Harvard adjectives hurled at the bear who walks like a man.

The big papa bear says, "And then what?" With this good deed done we next propose to embargo oil to Japan. Tokio says her reaction to this "will be very great." And so we have to order more battleships. But Mr. Stimson is back on the glory seat. He once tried to get Hoover to meddle in every corner of the universe and failed.

If the higher ethics require that no government established by force is to be recognized I trust no one will embarrass us by asking by what authority our flag flies in the Philippines. As I recall, a gentleman named Gridley at Manila once fired when ready. We took the little brown men by force, first from Spain, and then by the water cure. "Civilize 'em with a Krag" was the way it was done.

And then there was our conquest of Mexico in 1846. But all this was before the new morality made obsolete the heathen rule of minding our own business.

This is not to condone ruthless aggression, even when practiced by ourselves. Still the question remains, What are we going to do about it? It is very beautiful to get virtuous about the new morality versus international anarchy. Nevertheless, what are we going to do about it, if we are not to fight abroad? Or are we? Perhaps we will know, after the election.

The next step is universal compulsory service to the State without pay by all our youth, male and female. Every boy, every girl, must be indoctrinated with the fascist dogma, "Believe, Obey, Fight"—American plan. "Hitler's first victory in the United States," some Senator called it.

And taxes. You have seen but the beginning. Wait until the election is behind us.

And the mobilization of the National Guard under Federal authority. And by October a declaration of acute emergency.

It is my profound conviction that our policy of International Scold is worse than folly; that no good and only danger can come of it; that a large fraction of our preparedness billions would be unnecessary if we had men in the Nation's capital in the tradition of Washington, Jefferson, and Monroe. But I have just read Shakespeare's remark that "war makes virtue of ambition."

SAMUEL B. PETTENGILL.

Willkie Notification Ceremonies

OF

HON. CHARLES L. McNARY

OF OREGON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 19 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ACCEPTANCE ADDRESS BY WENDELL WILLKIE AND ADDRESSES BY HON. JOSEPH W. MARTIN, OF MASSACHUSETTS, AND HON. CHARLES A. HALLECK, OF INDIANA, AT ELWOOD, IND.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the introductory address delivered by Representative CHARLES A. HALLECK, the address delivered by Hon. JOSEPH W. MARTIN, leader of the Republican minority in the House of Representatives, notifying Hon. Wendell L. Willkie of his nomination for President of the United States, and the address of acceptance delivered by Mr. Willkie at Elwood, Ind., on Saturday, August 17, 1940.

There being no objection, the addresses were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS BY HON. CHARLES A. HALLECK, OF INDIANA

Indiana is proud of the place destiny has given to her today—proud that there has been called to lead this mighty nation to safety, happiness, and prosperity a son of Indiana—Wendell Willkie.

Eighty-five years ago, the Republican Party was organized to rescue America from a tragic crisis. Today the party is again called to service to save a Nation of 130,000,000 resourceful, energetic, and courageous people from the ravages of continuing depression within and the threat of aggression from without.

The torch of liberty, freedom, and opportunity has been handed to a native son of Indiana. He will hold it high, leading this new crusade for American principles in government and for the reestablishment of law as the ultimate guaranty of both individual and national security.

America wants to resume the march of progress. The Republican Party is the instrument through which the American people have determined to work for the reestablishment of enlightened patriotism in the administration of national affairs. Beneath our banners are rallied members of all parties. They are determined that this country shall prosper and progress according to the skill and resources with which it is blessed.

Some weeks ago it was my high honor to present the name of Wendell Willkie to the Republican convention at Philadelphia. I nominated him with heartfelt enthusiasm because I know him to be a great American who understands the problems of all of our people—because he is a capable administrator of clear vision and great ability, and a citizen of unlimited patriotic devotion.

LAUDS MARTIN

After the Philadelphia convention had named Wendell Willkie for the Presidency and CHARLES MCNARY for the Vice Presidency, it passed unanimously a resolution of thanks to Congressman JOSEPH W. MARTIN, Jr., for his able and fair direction of the convention as its chairman. A week later JOE was named by Wendell Willkie to direct the Republican National Committee.

This appointment and high responsibility comes to JOE MARTIN after almost 30 years of continuous service to the Republican Party. He began as a precinct worker in his native town of North Attleboro, Mass. He served in the State legislature and was in the State senate with Calvin Coolidge. He was for a time secretary of the Republican State Committee of Massachusetts. He next advanced to Congress where he is now serving his sixteenth year.

Throughout the New Deal years JOE MARTIN has been a stalwart American. He served on the Rules Committee in those trying days when a New Deal majority lost all sense of responsibility and allowed the Congress to become a mere rubber stamp. But Joe never gave up the fight for constitutional principles and orderly procedures.

In 1937 he was elected chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee, and in that capacity directed the 1938 campaign, which resulted in doubling the number of Republican Members in the House of Representatives and marked the turning of the tide which already signalizes a national triumph next November.

When the Seventy-sixth Congress assembled in January 1939, JOE MARTIN was unanimously elected minority leader. In that capacity he has done more to restore balanced constitutional government than any other individual in the United States. To work with him and for him has been a real privilege.

ASSAILS NEW DEAL WASTE

To JOE MARTIN now has been given the direction of this campaign to restore American Government to the American people—to turn out an administration which has wasted billions during the last 7 years, while neglecting the urgent problem of national defense—to place in the White House a man who has worked with his hands, who has won success by his own efforts, and whose heart and spirit are in tune with the aspirations of the American people for progress, security, and real recovery.

I present to you the man who will direct our victorious campaign—the Honorable JOSEPH W. MARTIN, Jr., of Massachusetts, Republican leader in the House of Representatives and chairman of the Republican National Committee.

ADDRESS BY HON. JOSEPH W. MARTIN, JR., OF MASSACHUSETTS

Mr. Willkie, we are here to carry out an old American custom—to notify you officially that you were chosen by the Republican Party in its national convention at Philadelphia on June 28 as its candidate for the Presidency of the United States. I hope it will not come as too great a surprise.

This custom originated in the time when men had to travel long distances on horseback actually to carry the first tidings of a nomination to the candidate. It may seem to some in these headlong days that custom of this kind is outmoded, but others believe it is well for the Nation to continue to cling to some of its traditions.

As chairman of the committee of notification, it is my honor and pleasure to bring you the enthusiastic greetings of the great Republican Party.

Your nomination at Philadelphia did not come from any scheming clique of political bosses. It did not come from any group of conspirators anxious to retain their control of the Government for selfish purposes. Your nomination was the result of a Nation-wide demand of a great people anxious about their own future and that of their Government.

They had seen this country drifting toward bankruptcy, inflation, and perhaps war. They had seen experiment after experiment fail. All called for huge appropriations, but none brought the security or the happiness which were promised.

PEOPLE SEEK A NEW LEADER

Ten millions of men and women begged for a chance to earn their livelihood in the American way. Millions of young men and young women pleaded for a chance for a regular job, for the opportunities which their fathers and their mothers had been blessed with. Year after year passed without those opportunities being presented. Little hope for the future was held forth; indeed, those who presumed to speak for the administration frankly stated that unemployment and distress had come to stay.

This philosophy of despair and defeat was not welcomed by the American people. It was not the spirit of the real American tamely to accept defeat. The people turned to seek a new leader—one with capacity to do big things; one who knew the many interests involved and the different problems confronting the Nation at home and abroad, one who could rise above narrow partisanship and petty prejudices and who could put the welfare of this country first.

They saw in you such a man. Born in humble circumstances. you have risen through your own efforts to a commanding position because of your ability to do things well; you have proved yourself an able man, a sincere man; one who is broad and liberal enough to give every man and every woman sheltered under the American flag equal justice and equal opportunity.

Thus you have been selected to save America and lead our country back along the road to recovery and better days. Out of the hearts of these patriotic Americans came the chant, "We want Willkie." Louder and louder came the call. An unbossed convention listened. A deliberative group of delegates acted. You became the nominee of a convention which selected you in the traditional American way.

FUNDAMENTAL ISSUES AT STAKE

No one can say you do not represent a free choice by the people.

This campaign of 1940 is vastly more significant and important than an ordinary election contest between two political parties. It is a contest between the forces of constitutional government and liberty and those influences which are moving steadily toward government by men instead of by laws in the United States of America.

We need not remind you that great fundamental issues are at stake in this contest. The fate of the free Republic established by the founding fathers at Philadelphia when they wrote the Constitution hangs in the balance.

The revered tradition that no President shall seek a third term has been assailed by men burning with an insatiable lust for power. It is our grave responsibility to see that the effort is defeated. We must not take a dangerous step, a step which may well lead to dictatorship.

The Republican Party rejoices that in you in has provided the Nation with a man who is preeminently qualified to meet the requirements of this critical period. It rejoices that your nomination has been enthusiastically acclaimed by independent Jeffersonian Democrats, progressives, liberals, and Republicans alike.

You are not the hope of one political party; you are the hope of a majority of the American people. They want you boldly to lead this great fight, this battle to perpetuate free government in this land of liberty, to restore equal justice, opportunities, and jobs to the American people; to keep this country safe and secure from attacks from within and without our boundaries.

May God bless you and strengthen you for the heavy tasks which lie ahead.

ADDRESS BY WENDELL L. WILLKIE

The ceremony of an acceptance speech is a tradition of our pioneer past—before the days of rapid communication. You all know that I accepted at Philadelphia the nomination of the Republican Party for President of the United States. But I take pride in the traditions and not in change for the mere sake of overthrowing precedents.

An acceptance speech is a candidate's keynote, a declaration of his broad principles. It cannot possibly review the issues in detail. I shall, however, cover each of them frankly during this campaign. Here I give you an outline of the political philosophy that is in my heart. We are here today to represent a sacred cause—The preservation of American democracy.

Obviously, I cannot lead this cause alone. I need the help of every American—Republican, Democrat, or Independent—Jew, Catholic, or Protestant—people of every color, creed, and race. Party lines are drawn. Nothing could make that clearer than the nomination by the Republicans of a liberal Democrat who changed his party affiliation because he found democracy in the Republican Party and not in the New Deal party.

And as the leader of the Republican Party let me say this: We go into our campaign as into a crusade. Revitalized and reunited, and joined by millions who share in our cause, we dedicate ourselves to the principles of American liberty, and we shall fight this campaign on the basis of those principles, not on the basis of hate, jealousy, or personalities. The leaders of the Republican Party, in Congress and in the party organization, have made me that pledge. I have given that pledge to them. And I extend it to all who will join in this cause. What we need in this country is a new leadership that believes in the destiny of America. I represent here today the forces that will bring that leadership to you.

There is a special reason why I have come back to Elwood, Ind., to make this acceptance speech. I have an engagement to keep in this town. It was made a long time ago with a young man I knew well.

SKETCHES EARLY IDEALS

This young man was born and raised in Elwood. He attended the Elwood public schools. He worked in your factories and stores. He started the practice of law in your courts. As I look back upon him, I realize that he had plenty of faults. But he had also three steadfast convictions. He was devoted to the ideal of individual liberty. He hated all special privileges and forms of oppression. And he knew without any doubt that the greatest country on earth was the United States of America.

That boy was myself 30 or 35 years ago. I still adhere to those convictions. To him, to his generation, to his elders, and to the youth of today I pledge my word that I shall never let them down.

In former days America was described as a country in which any young man might become President. It is still that kind of country. The thousands of my fellow townsmen standing hereabout know how distant seemed that opportunity to me 30 years ago. We must fight to preserve America as a country in which every girl and boy has every opportunity for any achievement.

To the millions of our young men and women who have been deliberately disillusioned by the political influences I now oppose; to the millions who no longer believe in the future of their land—to them I want to say in all humility—this boy I knew started like you, without money or position; but America gave him the opportunity for a career. I want to assure a similar opportunity to every boy and girl of today who is willing to stand on his own feet and work and fight.

I have more reason than most of you to feel strongly about this because the United States gave to my family their first chance for a free life. The ancestors of both my father and my mother, like the ancestors of millions of Americans, lived in central Europe. They were humble people—not members of the ruling or wealthy classes. Their opportunities were restricted by discriminatory laws and class distinctions. One was exiled because of his religion; another was persecuted because he believed in the principles of the French Revolution, and still another was jailed for insisting on the right of free speech.

As their descendant, I have fought from boyhood against all those restrictions, discriminations, and tyrannies. And I am still fighting.

PLEDGES TOLERANCE, FREEDOM

My grandparents lived in Germany. They were supporters of the democratic revolutions in that country, and when the revolutions failed they fled to the United States. How familiar that sounds. Today, also, people are being oppressed in Europe. The story of the barbarous and worse than medieval persecution of the Jews—a race that has done so much to improve the culture of these countries and our own—is the most tragic in human history. Today there are millions of refugees who desire sanctuary and opportunity in America, just as in my grandparents' time. The protection of our own labor and agriculture prevents us from admitting more than a few of them. But their misery and suffering make us resolve to preserve our country as a land free of hate and bitterness, of racial and class distinction. I pledge you that kind of America.

My mother was born in this country. My father was 3 or 4 years old when his parents settled in northern Indiana. It was then a trackless forest. As a young man he helped to clear that forest. He worked his way through the Fort Wayne Methodist College, taught school, and became superintendent of schools here in Elwood. My mother was also a school teacher. Whenever they had time they both studied law, and eventually both took up the practice of law. I doubt if any two people ever appreciated or loved this country more than they.

As you who live here with them well know, they were fiercely democratic. They hated oppression, autocracy, or arbitrary control of any kind. They believed in the qualities that have made America great—an independent spirit, an inquiring mind, a courageous heart. At school they taught those virtues to many of you who are here today. At home they taught them to their children. It is a tribute to their teaching that when the United States entered the World War in 1917, three of their four boys were volunteers, in the uniform of the American forces, within 1 month after war was declared. They withheld no sacrifices for the preservation of the America of 1917. In an even more dangerous world, we must not withhold any sacrifice necessary for the preservation of the America of 1940.

UNITED STATES NOT ISOLATED

Today we meet in a typical American town. The quiet streets, the pleasant fields that lie outside, the people going casually about their business, seem far removed from the shattered cities, the gutted buildings, and the stricken people of Europe. It is hard for us to realize that the war in Europe can affect our daily lives. Instinctively we turn aside from the recurring conflicts over there, the diplomatic intrigue, the shifts of power that the last war failed to end.

Yet—instinctively also—we know that we are not isolated from those suffering people. We live in the same world as they, and we are created in the same image. In all the democracies that have recently fallen, the people were living the same peaceful lives that we live. They had similar ideals of human freedom. Their methods of trade and exchange were similar to ours. Try as we will, we cannot brush the pitiless picture of their destruction from our vision or escape the profound effects of it upon the world in which we live.

No man is so wise as to foresee what the future holds or to lay out a plan for it. No man can guarantee to maintain peace. Peace is not something that a nation can achieve by itself. It also depends on what some other country does. It is neither practical, nor desirable, to adopt a foreign program committing the United States to future action under unknown circumstances.

The best that we can do is to decide what principle shall guide us.

For me, that principle can be simply defined:

In the foreign policy of the United States, as in its domestic policy, I would do everything to defend American democracy and I would refrain from doing anything that would injure it.

We must not permit our emotions—our sympathies or hatreds—to move us from that fixed principle.

For instance, we must not shirk the necessity of preparing our sons to take care of themselves in case the defense of America leads to war. I shall not undertake to analyze the legislation on this subject that is now before Congress, or to examine the intentions of the administration with regard to it. I concur with many members of my party that these intentions must be closely watched. Nevertheless, in spite of these considerations, I cannot ask the American people to put their faith in me without recording my conviction that some form of selective service is the only democratic way in which to secure the trained and competent manpower we need for national defense.

Also, in the light of my principle, we must honestly face our relationship with Great Britain. We must admit that the loss of the British Fleet would greatly weaken our defense. This is because the British Fleet has for years controlled the Atlantic, leaving us free to concentrate in the Pacific.

If the British Fleet were lost or captured, the Atlantic might be dominated by Germany, a power hostile to our way of life, controlling in that event most of the ships and shipbuilding facilities of Europe.

This would be calamity for us. We might be exposed to attack on the Atlantic. Our defense would be weakened until we could build a Navy and air force strong enough to defend both coasts. Also, our foreign trade would be profoundly affected. That trade is vital to our prosperity. But if we had to trade with a Europe dominated by the present German trade policies, we might have to change our methods to some tolalitarian form. This is a prospect that any lover of democracy must view with consternation.

The objective of America is in the opposite direction. We must, in the long run, rebuild a world in which we can live and move and do business in the democratic way.

The President of the United States recently said: "We will extend to the opponents of force the material resources of this Nation, and at the same time we will harness the use of those resources in order that we ourselves, in the Americas, may have equipment and training equal to the task of any emergency and every defense."

I should like to state that I am in agreement with these two principles, as I understand them—and I don't understand them as implying military involvement in the present hostilities. As an American citizen I am glad to pledge my wholehearted support to the President in whatever action he may take in accordance with these principles.

SAYS ROOSEVELT "INFLAMMATORY"

But I cannot follow the President in his conduct of foreign affairs in this critical time. There have been occasions when many of us have wondered if he is deliberately inciting us to war. I trust that I have made it plain that in the defense of America, and of our liberties, I should not hesitate to stand for war. But like a great many other Americans I saw what war was like at first hand in 1917. I know what war can do to demoralize civil liberties at home. And I believe it to be the first duty of a President to try to maintain peace.

But Mr. Roosevelt has not done this. He has dabbled in inflammatory statements and manufactured panics. Of course, we in America like to speak our minds freely, but this does not mean that at a critical period in history our President should cause bitterness and confusion for the sake of a little political oratory. The President's attacks on foreign powers have been useless and dangerous. He has courted a war for which the country is hopelessly unprepared—and which it emphatically does not want. He has secretly meddled in the affairs of Europe, and he has even unscrupulously encouraged other countries to hope for more help than we are able to give.

"Walk softly and carry a big stick" was the motto of Theodore Roosevelt. It is still good American doctrine for 1940. Under the present administration the country has been placed in the false position of shouting insults and not even beginning to prepare to take the consequences.

But while he has thus been quick to tell other nations what they ought to do, Mr. Roosevelt has been slow to take the American people into his confidence. He has hesitated to report facts, to explain situations, or to define realistic objectives. The confusion in the Nation's mind has been largely due to this lack of information from the White House.

As President, I plan to reverse both of these policies. I should threaten foreign governments only when our country was threatened by them and when I was ready to act, and I should consider our diplomacy as part of the people's business concerning which they were entitled to prompt and frank reports to the limit of practicability.

CANDOR DEMOCRACY'S HOPE

Candor in these times is the hope of democracy. We must not kid ourselves any longer. We must begin to tell ourselves the truth—right here and right now.

We have been sitting as spectators of a great tragedy. The action on the stage of history has been relentless.

For instance, the French people were just as brave and intelligent as the Germans. Their armies were considered the best in the world. France and her Allies won the last war. They possessed all the material resources they needed. They had wealth and reserves of credit all over the earth. Yet the Germans crushed France like an eggshell.

The reason is now clear. The fault lay with France herself.

France believed in the forms of democracy and in the idea of freedom. But she failed to put them to use. She forgot that freedom must be dynamic, that it is forever in the process of creating a new world. This was the lesson that we of America had taught to all countries.

When the European democracies lost that vision, they opened the way to Hitler. While Germany was building a great new productive plant, France became absorbed in unfruitful political adventures and flimsy economy theories. Her government was trying desperately to cover the people's nakedness with a garment that was not big enough.

The free men of France should have been weaving themselves a bigger garment. For in trying to pull the small one around themselves they tore it to pieces.

And in this tragedy let us find our lesson. The foreign policy of the United States begins right here in our own land. The first task of our country in its international affairs is to become strong at home. We must regain prosperity, restore the independence of our people, and protect our defensive forces. If that is not done promptly we are in constant danger. If that is done no enemy on earth dare attack us. I propose to do it.

SEES UNITED STATES-NAZI CLASH

We must face a brutal, perhaps a terrible fact. Our way of life is in competition with Hitler's way of life.

This competition is not merely one of armaments. It is a competition of energy against energy, production against production, brains against brains, salesmanship against salesmanship.

In facing it we should have no fear. History shows that our way of life is the strong way. From it has come more wealth, more industry, more happiness, more human enlightenment, than from any other way. Free men are the strongest men.

But we cannot just take this historical fact for granted. We must make it live. If we are to outdistance the totalitarian powers, we must arise to a new life of adventure and discovery. We must make a wider horizon for the human race. It is to that new life that I pledge myself.

I promise, by returning to those same American principles that overcame German autocracy once before, both in business and in war, to outdistance Hitler in any contest he chooses in 1940 or after. And I promise that when we beat him, we shall beat him on our own terms, in our own American way.

The promises of the present administration cannot lead you to victory against Hitler, or against anyone else. This administration stands for principles exactly opposite to mine. It does not preach the doctrine of growth. It preaches the doctrine of division. We are not asked to make more for ourselves. We are asked to divide among ourselves that which we already have. The New Deal doctrine does not seek risk, it seeks safety. Let us call it the "I pass" doctrine. The New Deal dealt it, and refused to make any more bets on the American future.

NEW DEAL ATTACKED

Why that is exactly the course France followed to her destruction! Like the Blum government in France, so has our Government become entangled in unfruitful adventures. As in France, so here, we have heard talk of class distinctions and of economic groups preying upon other groups. We are told that capital hates labor and labor capital. We are told that the different kinds of men whose task it is to build America are enemies of one another. And I am ashamed to say that some Americans have made political capital of that supposed enmity.

As for me, I want to say here and now that there is no hate in my heart, and that there will be none in my campaign. It is my belief that there is no hate in the hearts of any group of Americans for any other American group—except as the new dealers seek to put it there for political purposes. I stand for a new companionship in an industrial society.

Of course, if you start like the New Deal with the idea that we shall never have many more automobiles or radios, that we cannot develop many new inventions of importance, that our standard of living must remain what it is, the rest of the argument is easy. Since a few people have more than they need and millions have less than they need, it is necessary to redivide the wealth and turn it back from the few to the many.

But this can only make the poor poorer and the rich less rich. It does not really distribute wealth. It distributes poverty.

ASSERTS LIBERALISM

Because I am a businessman, formerly connected with a large company, the doctrinaires of the opposition have attacked me as an opponent of liberalism. But I was a liberal before many of these men had heard the word and I fought for many of the reforms of the elder La Follette, Theodore Roosevelt, and Woodrow Wilson before another Roosevelt adopted—and distorted—liberalism.

I learned my liberalism right here at home. From the factories that came into this town many years ago large fortunes were made by a few individuals, who thereby acquired too much power over our community. Those same forces were at work throughout the rest of the Nation. By 1929 the concentration of private power had gone further than it should ever go in a democracy.

We all know that such concentration of power must be checked. Thomas Jefferson disliked regulation, yet he said that the prime purpose of government in a democracy is to keep men from injuring each other. We know from our own experience that the less fortunate or less skillful among us must be protected from encroachment. That is why we support what is known as the liberal point of view. That is why we believe in reform.

OPPOSES MONOPOLIES

I believe that the forces of free enterprise must be regulated. I am opposed to business monopolies. I believe in collective bargaining by representatives of labor's own free choice, without any interference and in full protection of those obvious rights. I believe in the maintenance of minimum standards for wages and of maximum standards for hours. I believe that such standards should constantly improve. I believe in the Federal regulation of interstate utilities, of securities markets and of banking. I believe in Federal pensions, in adequate old-age benefits, and in unemployment allowances.

I believe that the Federal Government has a responsibility to equalize the lot of the farmer with that of the manufacturer. If this cannot be done by parity of prices, other means must be found, with the least possible regimentation of the farmer's affairs. I believe in the encouragement of cooperative buying and selling and in the full extension of rural electrification.

The purpose of all such measures in indeed to obtain a better distribution of the wealth and earning power of this country. But I do not base my claim to liberalism solely on my faith in such reforms. American liberalism does not consist merely in reforming things. It consists also in making things.

The ability to grow, the ability to make things, is the measure of man's welfare on this earth. To be free, man must be creative.

I am a liberal because I believe that in our industrial age there is no limit to the productive capacity of any man. And so I believe that there is no limit to the horizon of the United States.

I say that we must substitute for the philosophy of distributed scarcity the philosophy of unlimited productivity. I stand for the restoration of full production and reemployment by private enterprize in America.

And I say that we must henceforth ask certain questions of every reform and of every law to regulate business or industry. We must ask: Has it encouraged our industries to produce? Has it created new opportunities for our youth? Will it increase our standard of living? Will it encourage us to open up a new and bigger world?

A reform that cannot meet these tests is not a truly liberal reform. It is an "I pass" reform. It does not tend to strengthen our system, but to weaken it. It exposes us to aggressors, whether economic or military. It encourages class distinctions and hatreds. And it will lead us inevitably, as I believe we are now headed, toward a form of government alien to ours, and a way of life contrary to the way that our parents taught us here in Elwood.

ONLY STRONG ARE FREE

It is from weakness that people reach for dictators and concentrated government power. Only the strong can be free.

And only the productive can be strong.

When the present administration came to power in 1933, we heard a lot about the forgotten man. The Government, we were told, must care for those who had no other means of support. With this proposition all of us agreed. And we still hold firmly to the principle that those whom private industry cannot support must be supported by Government agency, whether Federal or State.

But I want to ask anyone in this audience who is, or has been, on relief whether the support that the Government gives him is enough. Is it enough for the free, able-bodied American to be given a few scraps of cash or credit with which to keep himself and his children just this side of starvation and nakedness? Is that what the forgotten man wanted us to remember?

What that man wanted us to remember was his chance—his right—to take part in our great American adventure.

But this administration never remembered that. It launched a vitriolic and well-planned attack against those very industries in which the forgotten man wanted a chance.

It carried on a propaganda campaign to convince the people that businessmen are iniquitous.

NEW DEAL INJURED INDUSTRY

It seized upon taxing power for political purposes. It has levied taxes to punish one man, to force another to do what he did not want to do, to take a crack at a third whom some Government agency disliked, or to promote the experiments of a brain trust. The direct effect of the New Deal taxes has been to inhibit opportunity. It has diverted the money of the rich from productive enterprises to Government bonds, so that the United States Treasury—and no one else—may have plenty to spend. Thus much of the money of the rich is invested in tax-exempt securities.

ABILITY TO PAY

In this connection let me say that, in its plan for tax revision the Republican Party will follow two simple principles. Taxes shall be levied in accordance with each one's ability to pay. And the primary purpose of levying them will be to raise money. We must—and can—raise more money at less relative cost to the people. We must do it without inflicting on the poor the present disproportionate load of hidden taxes.

The New Deal's attack on business has had inevitable results. The investor has been afraid to invest his capital, and therefore billions of dollars now lie idle in the banks. The businessman has been afraid to expand his operations, and therefore millions of men have been turned away from the employment offices. Low incomes in the cities and irresponsible experiments in the country have deprived the farmer of his markets.

For the first time in our history American industry has remained stationary for a decade. It offers no more jobs today than it did 10 years ago—and there are 6,000,000 more persons seeking jobs. As a Nation of producers we have become stagnant. Much of our industrial machinery is obsolete. And the national standard of living has declined.

NEW DEAL HAS FAILED

It is a statement of fact, and no longer a political accusation, that the New Deal has failed in its program of economic rehabilitation. And the victims of its failures are the very persons whose cause it professes to champion.

The little-business men are victims because their chances are more restricted than ever before.

The farmers are victims because many of them are forced to subsist on what is virtually a dole under centralized direction from Washington.

The 9,000,000 or 10,000,000 unemployed are victims because their chances for jobs are fewer.

SIX MILLION FAMILIES ON RELIEF

Approximately 6,000,000 families are victims because they are on relief.

And unless we do something about it soon, 130,000,000 people—an entire Nation—will become victims, because they stand in need of a defense system which this administration has so far proved itself powerless to create anywhere except on paper.

To accomplish these results, the present administration has spent $60,000,000,000.

And I say there must be something wrong with a theory of government or a theory of economics by which, after the expenditure of such a fantastic sum, we have less opportunity than we had before.

WHERE IS THE RECOVERY?

The New Deal believes, as frequently declared, that the spending of vast sums by the Government is a virtue in itself. They tell us that Government spending insures recovery. Where is the recovery?

The New Deal stands for doing what has to be done by spending as much money as possible. I propose to do it by spending as little money as possible. This is one great issue in domestic policy and I propose in this campaign to make it clear.

And I make this grave charge against this administration:

I charge that the course this administration is following will lead us, like France, to the end of the road. I say that this course will lead us to economic disintegration and dictatorship.

PHILOSOPHY OF PRODUCTION

I say that we must substitute for the philosophy of spending the philosophy of production. You cannot buy freedom. You must make freedom.

This is a serious charge. It is not made lightly and it cannot be lightly avoided by the opposition.

I therefore have a proposal to make.

The President stated in his acceptance speech that he does not have either "the time or the inclination to engage in purely political debate." I do not want to engage in purely political debate either. But I believe that the tradition of face-to-face debate is justly honored among our American political traditions. I believe that we should set an example at this time of the workings of American democracy, and I do not think that the issues at stake are "purely political." In my opinion, they concern the life and death of democracy.

JOINT APPEARANCES

I propose that during the next 2½ months the President and I appear together on public platforms in various parts of the country to debate the fundamental issues of this campaign. These are the problems of our great domestic economy, as well as of our national defense—the problem of agriculture, of labor, of industry, of finance, of the Government's relationship to the people, and of our preparations to guard against assault; and also I would like to debate the assumption by this President, in seeking a third term, of a greater public confidence than was accorded to our Presidential giants—Washington, Jefferson, Jackson, Lincoln, Cleveland, Theodore Roosevelt, and Woodrow Wilson.

I make this proposal respectfully to a man upon whose shoulders rest the cares of the state. But I make it in dead earnest.

I accept the nomination of the Republican Party for President of the United States.

SPIRIT OF DEDICATION

I accept it in the spirit in which I know it was given at our convention in Philadelphia—the spirit of dedication. I herewith dedicate myself with all my heart, with all my mind, and with all my soul to making this Nation strong.

But I say this, too: In the pursuit of that goal I shall not lead you down the easy road. If I am chosen the leader of this democracy as I am now of the Republican Party, I shall lead you down the road of sacrifice and of service to your country.

What I am saying is a far harsher thing than I should like to say in this speech of acceptance—a far harsher thing than I would have said had the Old World not been swept by war during the past year. I am saying to you that we cannot rebuild our American democracy without hardship, without sacrifice, even without suffering. I am proposing that course to you as a candidate for election by you.

"TOIL AND SWEAT" AHEAD

When Winston Churchill became Prime Minister of England a few months ago, he made no sugarcoated promises. "I have nothing to offer you," he said, "but blood, toil, tears, and sweat." Those are harsh words, brave words; yet if England lives, it will be because her people were told the truth and accepted it. Fortunately, in America, we are not reduced to blood and tears. But we shall not be able to avoid the toil and sweat.

In these months ahead of us, every man who works in this country—whether he works with his hands or with his mind—will have to work a little harder. Every man and woman will feel the burden of taxes. Every housewife will have to plan a little more carefully. I speak plainly because you must not be deceived about the difficulties of the future. You will have to be hard of muscle, clear of head, brave of heart.

Today great institutions of freedom, for which humanity has spilled so much blood, lie in ruins. In Europe those rights of person and property—the civil liberties—which your ancestors fought for and which you still enjoy, are virtually extinct. And it is my profound conviction that even here in this country, the Democratic Party, under its present leadership, will prove incapable of protecting those liberties of yours.

CALLS FOR UNITY

The Democratic Party today stands for division among our people, for the struggle of class against class and faction against faction, for the power of political machines and the exploitation of pressure groups. Liberty does not thrive in such soil.

The only soil in which liberty can grow is that of a united people. We must have faith that the welfare of one is the welfare of all. We must know that the truth can only be reached by the expression of our free opinions, without fear and without rancor. We must acknowledge that all are equal before God and before the law. And we must learn to abhor those disruptive pressures, whether religious, political, or economic that the enemies of liberty employ.

The Republican Party and those associated with it constitute a great political body that stands preeminently for liberty—without commitments, without fear, and without contradictions. This party believes that your happiness must be achieved through liberty rather than in spite of liberty. We ask you to turn your eyes upon the future, where your hope lies. We see written there the same promise that has always been written there—the promise that strong men will perform strong deeds.

With the help of Almighty Providence, with unyielding determination and ceaseless effort we must and we shall make that American promise come true.

OF

HON. ALBEN W. BARKLEY

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 19 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE PHILADELPHIA RECORD

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the Philadelphia Record of August 19 entitled "The Man Who Would Be President," commenting upon the speech delivered last Saturday by Hon. Wendell L. Willkie.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Philadelphia Record of August 19, 1940]

THE MAN WHO WOULD BE PRESIDENT

In 6,000 words of an acceptance speech which left his listeners somewhat bewildered, Wendell L. Willkie on Saturday unveiled the major issue of the 1940 campaign:

Willkie doesn't like Roosevelt. Willkie wants Roosevelt's job.

That is the only completely clear thought in the entire speech. Nearly all the rest of the address was so vague and so full of self-contradictions that even the wobbly G. O. P. platform, by comparison, seems crystal clear.

Saturday morning in this space the Record listed nine of the important issues confronting America in these days of national crisis.

We believed any Presidential candidate ought to express his opinions on (1) conscription, (2) foreign policy, (3) National Guard bill, (4) extension of publicly owned power in the interest of national defense, (5) Wagner Act, (6) Wage and Hour Act, (7) social security, (8) future of W. P. A., (9) Government aid to industry in the national-defense program. We promised to compare the speech itself with our diagram.

It is to Willkie's credit that he discussed two of these issues at some length—conscription and our foreign policy. He briefly referred to three others—Wagner Act, Wage and Hour Act, and social security, and approved "in principle" all three reforms. It is to Willkie's discredit that he carefully skirted any comment whatever on the National Guard bill, extension of publicly owned power in the interest of our defense, Government aid to industry in our defense program, and avoided any reference to W. P. A.

It was quite natural that many Republicans deluged Willkie with questions, immediately after the speech, as to what he really thinks about conscription. He said he favors "some form of selective service." That statement can mean he favors the Burke-Wadsworth bill—an act written by two of his supporters. Or it can mean he favors the Maloney amendment, which also approves conscription but would postpone it for months while we try to raise a volunteer army. Both provide "some form of selective service."

Willkie is for conscription "in principle." But when he avoided discussing the one bill which can give us conscription now he was obviously guilty of a straddle. His colleagues who are in Congress find no leadership here from a man who ought to lead.

On our foreign policy Willkie had the courage to approve, with only a few qualifications, the President's program of helping England "with the material resources of the Nation." He criticized the President for leading us into war by "inflammatory utterances" directed at foreign powers. But when Willkie then issued a virtual challenge to Hitler to "C'mon and fight; I'll lick you," he committed one of the classical political inconsistencies of the age.

We agree with Willkie that the President and his State Department have done too much scolding in their relations with Germany and Japan.

But neither has gone off half-cocked in so blatant and amateurish a fashion as did Willkie at Elwood Saturday afternoon. We are sure the country will still have greater faith in Roosevelt's handling of our affairs abroad than in Willkie's.

Willkie indorsed nearly all of Roosevelt's domestic program. He pledged himself to maintain and enforce collective bargaining by representatives of labor's own choosing without interference; to continue minimum standards for wages and maximum standards for hours; to maintain regulation of securities markets; to continue extension of rural electrification, Federal old-age pensions, unemployment insurance.

These reforms are the heart of the New Deal administration. After endorsing them, Willkie said in almost the same breath: "This administration stands for principles exactly opposite to mine."

No wonder so many listeners were bewildered. Willkie is for the Roosevelt foreign policy. He is for the Roosevelt domestic policy. Yet the Roosevelt policies are exactly opposite to his own. Roosevelt is too inflammatory, yet not one-tenth as inflammatory as Willkie.

Yes, it's all very confusing. The speech defies analysis on logical grounds. But it leaves the issue of the campaign very clear:

Willkie doesn't like Roosevelt. Willkie wants Roosevelt's job.

Continued Inequities of the New Deal

OF

HON. J. ROLAND KINZER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 19, 1940

Mr. KINZER. Mr. Speaker, for more than 7 years this Nation has been ruled by an administration that has had but one solution—one rule of action—to offer for the problems which so gravely threaten the welfare of our country. The New Deal administration's solution has been to tax and tax, to spend and spend, and through that taxing and spending to elect and elect. In other words, in absolute defiance of the American way of government, the New Deal administration has pursued a policy of regimentation, of limitation, and of concentration of control under the Federal Government at Washington. Penalizing thrift, discouraging personal initiative, breaking down individual confidence and independence—the qualities which have made this Nation great—the policy of the Roosevelt administration has been to take from those who have to give to those who have not, without any regard for justice, equity, wisdom, or economic common sense.

And now, on top of that, Mr. Speaker, we have one of the most shameful spectacles ever presented to the world by a political party in the United States of America. The New Deal convention at Chicago—for it cannot be called a Democratic convention—bossed, directed, controlled by the White House, and by the President's own personal and political henchmen, defied more brazenly and more insolently than ever before the American way.

Not only did that convention defy one of our most revered American traditions to nominate Mr. Roosevelt for a third term; that convention and the administration went further, and offered a gratuitous insult to the intelligence of the American people by trying to stage-manage and window-dress the convention in such a way as grossly to deceive the American people into believing that Mr. Roosevelt was being drafted for a third term.

Why, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Roosevelt was drafted—by Mr. Roosevelt—for a third term. No other candidate in the Democratic Party was given a ghost of a chance for the nomination. Up until the very hour of the convention itself—indeed, until the convention was under way—Franklin D. Roosevelt refused to tell his party or his country or his fellow citizens what his intentions were regarding a third term. And then, when it was entirely too late for the convention even to attempt to name anyone but Mr. Roosevelt as the Democratic standard bearer, what happened? Mr. Roosevelt sent an ambiguous message to the chairman of that convention, "Dear ALBEN" BARKLEY, to say to the convention that Mr. Roosevelt wanted the delegates to feel free to vote for whom they chose. What a travesty it was on the American way! Those delegates were no more free to vote for whom they chose than a man in a stockade under the guns of the guard is free to walk where he pleases.

Not content with this sordid exhibition of steam rolling, of dictatorship, the managers of the one-man party submitted to Mr. Roosevelt's further dictation in their choice of the candidate for the Vice Presidency.

In his hasty acceptance speech, Mr. Roosevelt had the effrontery—he displayed a supreme contempt for the public intelligence—to try to tell the convention and the country that all of his friends who knew him well had known for a long time that Mr. Roosevelt had no desire to be renominated; he had no desire for a third term, but had earnestly and sincerely yearned to retire to private life. Why, Mr. Speaker, if there is any man or woman in this country who does not know exactly the contrary, it is because he or she has not read the newspapers in the last 2 years. It has been common knowledge that Mr. Roosevelt was permitting his authorized and official spokesmen to go up and down this Nation calling for a third term.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to raise some very pertinent and grave questions here. Why should the New Deal Party be kept in power and control for another 4 years? They have had 8 years. What have they done? They have plunged this Nation deeper into debt than it has ever been before in its history. They have set class against class and section against section. They have prostituted relief to corrupt political purposes. They have built the greatest, the most expensive, and the most corrupt political bureaucracy that ever cursed this Nation. They have browbeaten, abused, and frightened legitimate business into paralysis; they have driven taxes and the necessity for more taxes to a point where they threaten to become confiscatory; they have, headed by President Roosevelt himself, provoked and assailed and meddled in foreign affairs while for 7 years they have neglected the national defense. They have failed to reduce unemployment; they have failed to solve a single solitary domestic or international problem, and in 8 years their record is one of contradictions, inconsistencies, broken promises, deceit, and ruinous spending.

Why, Mr. Speaker, what can we hope for if we give the New Deal administration 4 years more of power, except 4 years more of the same dangerous and deadly policies that we have endured under the New Deal administration for the last 7 years?

What is there, Mr. Speaker, that the New Deal administration can do in the next 4 years that it hasn't done in the last 7 years? If there were anything of a constructive nature that the New Deal administration could do if it were reelected, then the question stands stark before the people, Why has not the administration done it in the last 7 years?

As a result of these ruinous policies which are now being extended into international affairs, we have, as I have just stated, the greatest Federal debt in all history. This mounting Federal debt—mounting by the billions, mark you—the mounting deficits, the higher taxes, the increasing penalties on the thrift and industry of our people, are all being wrought while encouragement increases for those who are willing to abandon their efforts for self-support and to look to their Government and their fellow citizens for a living.

Understand me, Mr. Speaker, I would not want a single man, woman, or child in this country to starve or to suffer, but it is an inescapable fact that dangerous inequities are being fostered and encouraged, and those inequities are taking root in our whole governmental system. No one can deny that they do penalize thrift and encourage extravagance.

My own State of Pennsylvania has become one of the greatest States in the Union, and one of the greatest governmental units in the world. Why? Because our people have always been courageous; they have always been honest; they have always been industrious; they have always been ambitious; they have always been thrifty. They have not been afraid to deny themselves luxuries so they might save for a rainy day, accumulate a competence for their old age, and leave their children enough to give them a fair start in life.

The struggle in Pennsylvania was never any easier in those pioneer days, nor is it any easier today, than it was or is in Louisiana, or Texas, or Arkansas, or Arizona, or North or South Dakota. In Pennsylvania my people long ago learned that the secret of getting ahead in the world is perspiration and perseverance. It has been by that formula that my constituents have made themselves a prosperous agricultural people.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what has happened in the last 7 years of the New Deal administration? Let me quote some figures to indicate what has happened—some figures, Mr. Speaker, which are illuminating to me, and which I am sure will be illuminating to the country.

According to figures compiled by my distinguished colleague, the Honorable ALBERT J. ENGEL, of Michigan, the amount of taxes paid and benefits received by States from March 4, 1933, to July 1, 1939, shows that Pennsylvania paid over that period $2,054,690,813 in taxes to the Federal Government. It received in benefits from the Government $1,307,569,961. In other words, the total of all benefits received from the Federal Government by my State amounted to $135.76 per capita, while my State paid out in taxes to the Federal Government $213.33 per capita.

Let me note that the State of Alabama, for instance, paid in that period $28.01 per capita in taxes and received back from the Government $114.40 per capita in benefits.

The State of Arkansas paid the United States Government $17.12 per capita in taxes and received from the National Government $147.62 per capita in benefits.

The State of Mississippi paid $12.38 per capita in taxes to the Federal Government and received back $127.23 per capita benefits.

Up in the great Northwest, North Dakota paid $13.24 per capita taxes to the Federal Government and received in per capita Government benefits $302.10. While South Dakota paid $14.56 per capita in taxes and got back from the Government $312.85 per capita benefits.

Turning to the Southwest, Arizona in the same period paid into the Federal Government $39.25 per capita taxes and received $232.64 per capita benefits from the Government. New Mexico paid into the Federal Government in taxes $23.09 per capita and received back from the Government in benefits $281.21 per capita.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I could go on mentioning many other States in the Union which have received far more money per capita than they have paid in taxes, while my own State of Pennsylvania and some other States received much less per capita benefits than they paid in taxes.

Figures are easily manipulated, and statisticians—particularly statisticians with a personal interest at stake—can do strange things with them. These figures I have given, Mr. Speaker, from the standpoint of per capita taxes paid and per capita relief received, are simple figures that everybody can understand, and are figures that are not susceptible of manipulation.

These figures show that not only has the New Deal policy of distributing money resulted in gross inequities to the people of Pennsylvania and the people of my district, but these inequities will continue far into the future as a result of the New Deal policy. This is a case where the evil done by a political administration lives after it.

The people of my district, the people of my State, are perfectly willing to bear their fair share of the difficulties arising from the depression. My people want to be good neighbors—they are good neighbors. We are willing to help feed the hungry and to clothe the ragged and to shelter the homeless. But, Mr. Speaker, we do not believe thrift should be penalized; we do not believe the people of Pennsylvania should be dragged down to a common, lower level of living. What we do believe is that the people of other sections of the United States must be helped to help themselves up to a higher level of living without impoverishing the people of Pennsylvania and other States who have the energy, the courage, and the initiative to drive ahead in spite of handicaps and difficulties brought on by the depression.

There is no reason, Mr. Speaker, why my people should be thus penalized; there is no reason why these inequities should be continued another 4 years; there is no reason why this extravagant and wasteful and inconsistent and contradictory and dangerous policy should continue to be paid for by the taxpayers over a long period of years while we continue on down the road toward national bankruptcy. Already the New Deal administration has fastened a burden upon the backs of the people that will continue to bear down long after the present occupant of the White House and his group of political henchmen have disappeared from the earthly scene.

My people are a people of peace. They do not want to become involved in foreign quarrels and foreign wars. They believe that we should have a defense adequate to defend our country against any nation or any combination of nations who might attempt aggressions against us. But my people do not want their sons sent across the seas to fight in foreign conflicts.

My people, Mr. Speaker, will not be fooled by this political talk on the part of the new dealers that some other party neglected the national defense in the years gone by. My people will remember that whatever threat has arisen to the peace and security of this Nation has arisen in the last 7 years, since Franklin D. Roosevelt took office as President of the United States. My people will not forget, Mr. Speaker, that President Roosevelt has had billions piled upon billions given over to his hands by the Congresses to spend practically as he chose. He did not see fit, until a comparatively short time ago, to begin to agitate for a better national defense. The people had no way of knowing the condition of the national defense. But Mr. Roosevelt and his bureaucrats not only were in position to know, but must have known at all times the dangerous condition of the national defense. It was, therefore, the duty of the New Deal administration to advise the Congress and the people of the dangerous condition of the national defense and to propose measures for remedying that condition.

My people will not forget, Mr. Speaker, that the 1932 Democratic platform expressed vehement criticism of the Republican Party because expenditures for the national defense were approaching a billion dollars a year at that time.

No, Mr. Speaker; there are many facts similar to these I have cited which my people will not forget next November.

We must strive for a constructive program of recovery. We must abandon these policies of penalizing thrift and initiative and of taking from those who have in order to court the favor of those who have not. We must make greater effort to get those who have too little back to work in private industry at decent American wages so they may maintain themselves and their dependents in honor and self-respect.

We must stand fast by the American way. We must turn back this assault being made upon revered American tradition by men consumed with an insatiable lust for continued power. The third-term tradition must not be violated. America must be kept American. We must not be persuaded to abandon a genuine constitutional republic and the Bill of Rights in this country under any pretext whatever.

We must stand fast, Mr. Speaker, to the ideals and the philosophy of the founding fathers. We can do that and still meet, and meet successfully, every demand of the present day.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY R. SHEPPARD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 19, 1940

RESOLUTION BY THE SANTA ANA JUNIOR CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Speaker and Members of the Congress, I am placing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD with your consent a resolution by a group of young men from my congressional district that I think is a splendid expression of loyalty and patriotism, as follows:

Be it resolved by the Santa Ana Junior Chamber of Commerce assembled on this 12th day of August 1940, That our position with reference to the present significant problem of national defense be stated as follows:

1. We believe in the preservation of the democratic form of government which assures to our citizens the liberties and freedom guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States. We believe that the latent dynamics of a democracy, once aroused, are more powerful than the driven dynamics of dictatorships. To obtain that end, we realize that the young men of America have a special responsibility. Hence we pledge our efforts to allay hysteria and not to forget the need for our democratic form of life and to assist in welding together our people through mutual confidence and trust, recognizing that to achieve this end we must reduce unemployment, preserve industrial peace and the rights of labor, assure the fair treatment that encourages capital investment, assure fair treatment for agriculture, and discourage unfair advantage wherever shown.

2. We consider that the most important problem of the day is the immediate establishment of an adequate national defense.

3. We believe that the following are necessary elements of an adequate national defense:

A. A clear definition of the necessary geographical area of defense. As a minimum, such an area must include the United States and its possessions in the Western Hemisphere.

B. Immediate organization of all resources, including industry and manpower, which includes:

1. Compulsory military training.

2. Training of individuals in skills and techniques necessary to the rapid and efficient production of materials and equipment required for defense.

3. Administrative coordination of all agencies involved directly or indirectly in the defense program; appointment by the President of one person charged with this administrative responsibility; and elimination of delays and unnecessary procedural technicalities.

4. Elimination of excessive profits to industry, agriculture, and labor by reason of production incident to the defense program.

5. Development of our own resources with a view to national self-sufficiency through an immediate program of extensive research as to latent resources, chemical substance, mechanical devices, and synthetic products.

C. Recognition and willingness to bear the increased costs of such defense program. Insofar as possible, these costs must be paid currently out of tax revenues. As young men, we will assume our share of this burden.

D. Loyalty to the United States of America. We declare our belief in the loyalty of the great majority of our citizens. However, adequate steps must immediately be taken to eliminate all acts of disloyalty to our democratic form of government. This involves, among other steps, strict enforcement of the immigration laws and mandatory registration of all aliens.

E. Elimination of the use of the cloak of diplomatic privilege as a device to conceal unfriendly propaganda and subversive activity.

F. Public knowledge of all pertinent facts relative to problems of national defense and our relationship to foreign conflicts. We insist that our governmental leaders are under an obligation to keep us promptly and fully informed on these matters. We recognize the reciprocal obligation on the part of every citizen to keep himself fully informed.

G. Also, as an element of defense the step may be justified of making available for purchase supplies and equipment to those nations important to our plan of national defense, provided that the requirements of our own defenses shall in no event be prejudiced by such sale.

4. We oppose sending an armed force outside the Western Hemisphere.

5. No armed force shall be sent beyond our geographical area of defense.

Let's Keep the Record Straight

OF

HON. GEORGE H. BENDER

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 13, 1940

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, everything good is New Deal originated. Everything bad stems back to the Republicans. This is one of the endless theme songs of official Washington. Fortunately, we have the record to verify the many claims heard from official circles, and we have men and women fearless enough to cite that record.

The gentleman from Michigan, Representative JESSE P. WOLCOTT, ranking Republican Member of the House Banking and Currency Committee, reading Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt's "My Day" column found it inaccurate, to say the least. And here is what Congressman WOLCOTT tells us:

Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt in her current newspaper column sought to explain to her readers the operations of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act, claiming that the insurance of bank deposits "was initiated by the present administration in Washington."

Mrs. Roosevelt is as badly misinformed as was the President when he sought to justify Secretary Wallace's continuance in office while a nominee for the Vice Presidency on the grounds that Mr. Hoover had remained as Secretary of Commerce after having been nominated for the Presidency, when the facts are that Mr. Hoover promptly resigned from the Cabinet.

The record shows that the father of Federal insurance of bank deposits was Republican Senator ARTHUR VANDENBERG, of Michigan, and that when the proposal was made by him it was bitterly opposed both by President Roosevelt and his then Secretary of the Treasury, William H. Woodin. This was the testimony of Senator CARTER GLASS, addressing the Senate in 1935, when he said:

"When it was first proposed to establish the insurance-of-deposits fund, the President of the United States and his then Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Woodin, were very emphatically and bitterly opposed to it. They said they would not stand for it."

When the 1933 Banking Act was before the Senate, Senator VANDENBERG introduced his amendment to create immediate Federal bank-deposit insurance, effective July 1, 1933, for all deposits up to $2,500 in all national banks.

The act was quickly passed by the Senate and was sent to conference, where the effective date of the amendment was changed from July 1, 1933, to January 1, 1934.

On June 2, 1933, while the bill was still in conference, the President wrote a letter to Senator GLASS in which he said:

"I must therefore again express to you my definite feeling that the Vandenberg amendment must be rejected in toto, even as revised, and again repeat that no modification of this amendment proposed so far will avoid a serious situation."

After the Banking Act of 1933 was passed, containing the Vandenberg amendment for Federal deposit insurance, the President delayed more than 60 days the appointment of members of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation and the organization of the bank-deposit system, which became effective January 1, 1934.

Leo T. Crowley, appointed by the President as Chairman of the F. D. I. C., wrote to Senator VANDENBERG on February 15, 1934:

"I consider you to be the father of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act."

Mr. Speaker, this is the true story. The record is open for all to read.

Selective Service

OF

HON. HARRY R. SHEPPARD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 19, 1940

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Speaker and Members of the Congress, there has been considerable discussion pertaining to a selective draft bill in order that our Nation can and will be adequately prepared to defend its national integrity.

I recently received a comment on this subject from one of the outstanding editors of a newspaper within my district which I think is most indicative of the attitude of our thinking public. I wish to express my appreciation as a legislative Representative of the Nineteenth District of California for the following comments written by Mr. Mason Yould, editor of the Santa Ana Register at Santa Ana, Calif.:

SELECTIVE SERVICE

(By Mason Yould)

I am the father of two boys. Both are single. Both are between the ages of 21 and 31. They are red-blooded patriotic sons of America.

God knows I don't want them to go to war. They don't want to go to war.

But I believe, and they believe, and their mother believes, that this Nation should be ready for any emergency. They believe in preparedness. My wife and I believe in preparedness.

These boys are fun-loving youths. One is employed gainfully. The other, the younger, goes to school and in the summer months works to help defray his expenses at school. They are typical American boys. They like to play and they play hard. They like to work and they work equally hard. They don't want to give up their play and they don't want to give up their work.

I don't want to change either one of them, or their mode of living, one whit.

They are ready to defend their country against invasion. But they oppose going to some other man's country and fighting his battle.

My boys want to help preserve this Nation for other boys, your boys, and I want them to help preserve this Nation for themselves.

Therefore both my boys, my wife, and myself are in favor of selective service—conscription draft, or call it what you like. Let's not stop at the 31-year-age limit though. Let's register every man.

We, as a family, are not militarists. Individually we are not militaristically inclined. Far from it. Naturally we would rather gather around the breakfast nook and joke, discuss problems of the day, and make plans for the future. We picture America as an ideal place to rear and educate children. A place to live and let live—in peace.

I can conceive of no greater love than that which my wife bears for her two sons. She has cared for them as only a mother can. She has been their counselor, their pal, their balm in times of trouble and their disciplinarian when discipline was necessary. The world would crumble about her shoulders should anything happen to one of her boys.

But, in spite of all this, my wife believes this Nation should be prepared. She has talked about conscription with her boys. I have, too. They are ready to give up the pleasures of the now and learn to drill, learn to be defenders, learn military discipline, learn to be of service to the country that has given them a score of years of freedom—the freedom that their mother and father and their grandparents enjoyed.

No; my boys are not militarists. And they are ready to serve that the boys of America in coming generations will not of necessity be militarists. They don't want to knock chips off the other fellow's shoulders and they aren't going around with chips on their own shoulders for someone else to knock off. As I say, they're not militarists, but they are not going to see Hitler or anyone else come over and try to break up our little home without doing something about it.

And that's what selective conscription means to me. It means being ready when our services are needed. We may never have to use these services, but there can be no danger in preparing. An old adage says: "In time of peace prepare for war." Conscription means the same thing. We won't get adequate defense against overseas attack if we don't get selective service.

We are spending billions for airplanes, tanks, new ships, and other instruments of defense. But to what avail unless we have the manpower to handle them? A tank without a driver, a plane without a pilot, or an antiaircraft gun without a gunner is just so much junk. These same pieces of defense are likewise useless without trained men to operate them.

So my wife and myself are reluctantly willing to give up our boys for a few months as insurance against destruction of our home, their home, and your home; and my boys are willing to give up a few months' play, a few months' work, and a few months of education so that maybe within a short time they can return to their normal life with the feeling deep in their hearts that their mother and their father and all other mothers and fathers are reasonably safe from attack by outside forces.

It's not easy for a mother to give up her sons. It's not easy for sons to give up their mother.

But it's infinitely easier to do that than to decorate graves.

RESOLUTIONS BY SOUTH BOSTON AND WORCESTER YOUTH CIRCLES

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution adopted by an organization in my district protesting against the absorption of Lithuania by the Soviet Union, and also an editorial published recently in the Boston Post:

At the outing of the South Boston and Worcester Youth Circles, which took place on August 4, 1940, at Westboro, Mass., it was unanimously voted to register the following resolution of protest against the occupant of Lithuania—Soviet Union:

Whereas the Soviet Union had made a treaty with Lithuania in 1920, fully acknowledging the territorial boundaries of Lithuania, with its permanent Capital in Vilna;

Whereas, on October 10, 1939, the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics compelled Lithuania to enter into a treaty for their common defense purportedly, and guaranteed nonintervention in the internal affairs of Lithuania;

Whereas, relying on the guaranties of the U. S. S. R. in said treaty, Lithuania permitted the U. S. S. R. to establish military bases in Lithuania; Soviet Russia, however, by unfounded pretexts went into occupation of Lithuania, and thereby broke its treaty, violated the guaranties thereof, and infringed on the sovereignty of Lithuania;

Whereas while thus occupying Lithuania, the U. S. S. R. dissolved the lawful congress of Lithuania, announced elections to be held on July 14 and 15, which elections constituted a falsification of national will, and were in contravention of the constitution of Lithuania;

Whereas this illegally elected communistic congress on July 21 voted for union with the U. S. S. R.;

Whereas by ordainment of the U. S. S. R., the established organizations of Lithuania were rendered extinct, communistic organizations were established and membership therein was made compulsory; singing the Lithuanian national anthem was forbidden; Lithuanian leaders by the thousands were arrested and ruthlessly persecuted; and of the active and of the workers, some were incarcerated in local prisons, others were deported to remote parts of Russia: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we the organized youth of South Boston and Worcester, Mass., stanch and loyal citizens of the United States, protest and deprecate these purely imperialistic and arbitrary measures of Soviet Russia against small, blameless, and peaceful Lithuania; and be it further

Resolved, That we demand lawful, democratic, and constitutional elections, and that the Russian forces be withdrawn from Lithuania; that the innocent citizens of Lithuania be released from prisons; and that their persecution cease; and be it further

Resolved, That we repudiate said communistic congress and its traitorous vote to join Lithuania to the Soviet Union and adopt Stalin's proffered constitution; and be it further

Resolved, That in the interest of law and order we respectfully request that the United States Government through President Roosevelt protest against the lawless and ruthless occupation of Lithuania by the U. S. S. R. and that the U. S. S. R. fulfill its promises; and treaties of 1920 and 1939, and abstain from intervention in the internal affairs of Lithuania, and permit Lithuania local autonomy and independence; and be it further

Resolved, That all true Lithuanians, irrespective of where they may be, unite courageously, solidly, and self-sacrificingly, to regain liberty and independence for Lithuania; and be it further

Resolved, That we, the American-Lithuanian youth, assure our brethren in Lithuania assistance in every possible form, to the end that they and Lithuania forever be free and independent; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, to the representatives of the Governments of Lithuania, Russia, and of other governments in Washington, and to the press.

LITHUANIA

The majority of Lithuanians in the old country are very religious people, not unlike their neighbors, the Poles. The churches are integral parts of every community. The faith of churchgoers is impressive to tourists. One of the great cornerstones of Lithuanian religious life is the church marriage.

Now Russia has banned these marriages and they will henceforth be performed by commissars. This will be a bitter pill for the people to swallow, on the heels of conquest. It adds another reason for myriad millions to wish for change in the godless government of the Soviets.

The Defense Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DANIEL A. REED

OF NEW YORK

Monday, August 19, 1940

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, the people of this country are deeply concerned because of the delay in the defense program. They know that after the appropriation of billions of dollars for defense the Nation is unprepared to equip even its peacetime army with guns, planes, tanks, rifles, uniforms. The people realize that in modern warfare men without mechanized equipment are as helpless to defend themselves as they would be to hurl themselves into the jaws of some gigantic meat grinder.

I do not believe that men should be drafted to drill with broomsticks as substitutes for rifles; stovepipes for artillery, and farm trucks for tanks. The air is saturated with war talk from official sources, which prompts the citizens to ask: "Why all this delay?" The record is clear on this point. On August 9, 1940, Secretary of War Henry L. Stimson testified before the Ways and Means Committee that—

Congress made available to the Army during the month of June approximately $400,000,000 for airplanes, engines, and accessories. Yet today, almost 7 weeks later, we have been able to sign contracts for the construction of but 33 planes of the over 4,000 for which these appropriations that I have mentioned were made.

In discussing this delay, Secretary Stimson further testified:

Now, gentlemen, the fault is not with the Army. So far as I am aware, there has been no undue delay in the preparation of Army specifications and designs for the contracts. The fault has certainly not been with the Defense Advisory Commission. The members of that body have brought to bear on the solution of this problem their great experience, good judgment, and wholehearted efforts. Nor has it been the fault of industry. The representatives of industry have been earnest; they have shown every desire to cooperate with the Army and with the Defense Commission in the difficult negotiations which have been carried on during these 7 weeks. So far as I have been informed, there has been no evidence that at any time there has been any tendency on the part of industry to hold back on the Army in these negotiations.

Secretary Stimson proceeded to explain the reasons for the reluctance of businessmen to enter into war contracts in these words:

The fact is that we have all been facing a difficult problem, and we have been facing it with earnest efforts to cooperate. That problem arises in a large part from the fact that the entire program of airplane construction is so large that it necessarily involves a great expansion of existing plant facilities and the construction of new plants to meet the requirements of our Army in the present emergency.

Risks are inherent in any business enterprise. Industry may be expected to undertake normal risks. But the risk to industry of undertaking at the request of the Government to expand plant capacity at industry's own expense and of then being left, upon a sudden cessation of the emergency, with these expanded facilities useless, is one that is entitled, in my opinion, to special consideration. Under those circumstances, the uncertainty of future taxation as affected by this expanded construction not only, it seems to me, fails to give the special consideration which I have just mentioned, but it rather tends to penalize the situation which the manufacturers confront. It is this element of uncertainty in respect to the industry's right quickly to amortize its investments in an expanded construction program, and also the uncertainty, or I may say the delay, as to the amount and character of taxation which will be levied during the period of the contract, which according to our observations chiefly have prevented the execution of these contracts.

In the light of the inference to be drawn from Secretary Stimson's testimony as to the bottleneck situation retarding the defense program, I wish my colleagues and the country to know the facts. The blame for the present defense strangulation should be placed squarely where it belongs.

The first part of last June, when the defense tax bill was under consideration in the Ways and Means Committee, an amendment was proposed by one of the Republican members providing for a 5-year amortization plan for such facilities. The Treasury Department opposed the enactment of the plan at that time, saying that it should be incorporated with an excess-profits tax. However, the Treasury then stated that it would be unable to propose a plan of excess-profits taxation to the Congress in less than 2 months' time. Hence the responsibility for the continued uncertainty regarding the question of taxation in connection with plants and equipment used for defense purposes is that of the executive department alone. Congress has been waiting for 2 months to enact an excess-profits tax with amortization features included, and the fact that it has not been able to do so is no fault of its own, but instead rests entirely with the position taken by the executive branch of the Government.

Pity the Poor Besieged Congressman

LETTER FROM HENRY L. McCLINTOCK

Mr. HANCOCK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter published recently in the Syracuse Post-Standard:

[From the Syracuse (N. Y.) Post-Standard]

TO THE EDITOR OF THE POST-STANDARD:

How would you like to vote on conscription? Think of the responsibility upon a Congressman. Think of the letters from the people whom he serves—bushels of letters favoring conscription, more bushels against it—weeks and weeks of hearings with experts testifying for it, experts testifying against it, military experts, naval experts, business experts, Legionnaires, and pacifists—letters from people who fear that a German victory will be an immediate threat to our security and that we must be prepared to meet it—letters from boys who have gotten their first jobs after hopeless years of search and waiting and who are worried at the thought of giving them up—letters from mothers who write, "If anything happens to my son, his blood will be upon your head"—letters from people who write hysterically—letters from people who write with calm conviction.

It is a curious thing that almost everyone who writes to his Congressman is absolutely sure that he is right. No doubts whatever in his mind. And yet the writers disagree with each other completely. The Congressman reads the letters, listens to the experts; he believes that he has heard every possible argument, learned every differing point of view.

Then he must make up his mind how to vote. Which course is fairest to the young man who must bear the brunt of defense? Which course will be best for the country in this world crisis? Or still harder to decide, which will be the least harmful? Every possible course has so many hardships to weigh against its advantages, so many domestic adjustments which must yield to its urgency, that he spends sleepless nights and worried days.

Please have mercy on your Congressman whichever way he votes on conscription because he must have reached his decision through travail of mind and heart.

Aid Britain or Face Attack

REMARKS

HON. STEPHEN PACE

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 19, 1940

ADDRESS OF AMBASSADOR BULLITT

Mr. PACE. Mr. Speaker, I hope every Member of the Congress and every man and woman in the Nation will read the speech of Ambassador William C. Bullittt, delivered at Independence Square in Philadelphia last night. The position he has held and the experiences he has had not only justify but require that we give special heed to his timely warning.

For my part, I am not satisfied with the progress being made in the defense of this Nation, particularly the time being taken in the consideration of necessary defense measures by the Congress. It is time for politics to adjourn. It is time for those who treasure their liberties to prepare to defend them.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and include therein the address of Mr. Bullitt.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

Fellow citizens of my country, men and women, Americans, there are times, rare and infrequent, when a man feels he has a right to ask his fellow citizens to hear him. Here tonight, in my own city, in this square where our Republic was created, I feel I have that right.

For nearly 4 years I have served as ambassador of our Republic to the French Republic. That Republic, like our own, followed the gleam of liberty, equality and fraternity for all men and all races. That Republic, like our own, strove for peace.

I have seen the French Republic destroyed.

As your emissary, as the representative of American democracy, I have witnessed the acts which destroyed the French democracy. I know of my own knowledge what blows were struck, what devices of intrigue and treachery and force employed. I know who are the enemies of freedom because I have seen them at their work. I know how dangerous they are and by what means they are dangerous.

PERIL TO LIBERTY

Because I have seen these things and know them of my own knowledge, I know that dangers beset free institutions everywhere. And I know what those dangers are. The strategy of destruction by which the free nation of France was overthrown is the strategy of destruction by which the enemies of freedom hope to overthrow liberty in this, the greatest of the nations that freedom has created. Because I have seen these things with my own eyes, heard them with my own ears, and felt them in my own body, I ask you, my fellow free Americans, to hear what I feel it my duty to say.

American is in danger.

It is my conviction, drawn from my own experience and from the information in the hands of our Government in Washington, that the United States is in as great peril today as was France a year ago. And I believe that unless we act now, decisively, to meet the threat we shall be too late.

The dictators are convinced that all democracies will always be too late. You remember Hitler's statement, "Each country will imagine that it alone will escape. I shall not even need to destroy them one by one. Selfishness and lack of foresight will prevent each one fighting until it is too late."

PROBLEMS COMPLEX

Control of government by public opinion is the essence of democracy. And it has always been our belief that free speech and a free press and free education would enable us to form and express our opinions sufficiently swiftly not only to permit but to compel our Government to act quickly and effectively. But the problems of world affairs have become so complex in this day of volcanic change that the average citizen has the greatest difficulty in understanding them and judging what is best for his country before it is too late.

The dictators have developed a strategy of attack that is based on this difficulty. To prepare the way for military attack on a democracy they employ every possible variety of agent and propaganda to befuddle the public so that the democracy will not prepare in time. They succeeded in befuddling public opinion in France and England to such an extent that they were able to conquer France in a few days and are now striving to conquer an England which awakened late.

They are not yet in a position to attack America by military means; but their campaign of befuddlement, their preparatory assault, is following the same lines in America that it followed in France. Do not imagine that the French citizen was less intelligent or cared less about his country than the American citizen. The honest French patriot did his best, but he just could not see through the smoke screens of bribery, propaganda, lies, and threats which the dictators spread in his country. For every Frenchman who acted as the conscious agent of a foreign dictator, there were a thousand who, with good intentions and high patriotism, unwittingly played the dictators' game.

HOW MANY IN UNITED STATES?

How many Americans today are playing the dictator's game without knowing it?

In France, as in the United States today, there were many honest pacifists. There were many because after 1918 every Frenchman became in one sense a pacifist. The French wanted no more war. And when the German propagandists told the French that they could buy peace with Germany by making one concession after another, the French believed them.

The French, who were much stronger at the time than were the Germans, let the Germans reconstruct an army, a navy, and an air force, let them reoccupy the Rhineland, and the Saar, then Austria, then the Sudeten areas of Czechoslovakia, then the whole of Czechoslovakia. After that the Germans said that the price of peace was Danzig and Poland's outlet to the sea. By that time the French had learned that the lie, the solemn pledge given and broken, had become Germany's normal weapon in international affairs. Yet today there are Americans who argue that we should believe the dictators when they say they have no intention of extending their conquests to the Western Hemisphere and certainly not to the United States. France believed. Where now is France?

There are also Americans who argue that if Hitler should conquer Great Britain he would be content to stop there, and that the United States would be able to cooperate happily with the Hitler empire of Europe. To believe this is to misunderstand the entire nature of the Nazi system. It is not organized to develop an empire in peace. It is organized as a dynamic military machine. The ruthless hold of the Nazi leaders on the German people is based on the gearing of all energies for the sacrifices necessary to wage war. The continued sacrifices by the great mass of the people which the Nazi system demands cannot be obtained except by maintaining a supercharged war temperature. The German nation has been made a preparatory army of assault. Its organization is military. Its military operations have enormous momentum. It cannot stop in its tracks. It can only be stopped.

HIERARCHY CAN'T STOP

Were Germany to try to resume the ways of peace the military discipline which is the very foundation of the Nazi hierarchy would crumble. In order to continue in power that hierarchy must continue to lead Germany on new predatory adventures. The Third Reich cannot change its objectives and methods without changing its entire organization and leadership.

The Americans who believe that the Nazis will not have to be stopped but will stop of their own accord are indulging in the fatal vice of wishful thinking. They want to believe this. Therefore they believe it. There is no other basis than they wish for their conclusion that the Nazis suddenly will become peace-loving men.

The men and women who tell you that the dictators will not attack the Western Hemisphere may be honest, wishful thinkers, or they may be agents of the dictators, but in either case, by lulling you into a false feeling of security and retarding your preparations for defense, they are keeping the way clear for an assault on America by the dictators. They are enemies, consciously or unconsciously, of our country and our liberties.

In France there were high-placed and influential German agents who circulated in what was called society, and argued, because Hitler had said he loved France, that Germany would never so much wish to invade France as to attack the Maginot line, which was estimated to be such a tremendous obstacle. Today we hear Americans of the same stripe arguing that the dictators will never so wish to invade the Americas as to cross the Atlantic, which is regarded as such a tremendous obstacle. They ask us to ignore the fact that the Atlantic is an obstacle only so long as the European exits to the Atlantic are controlled by a nation which is genuinely friendly to us. We can remember, however, that in the past, when those exits have been in the hands of a power unfriendly to us, the Atlantic has become a broad highway for the invasion of the Americas. By way of the Atlantic our own land was invaded twice—during our Revolution and the War of 1812—and that with sailing ships. By way of the Atlantic, Mexico was invaded during our Civil War.

The truth is that the destruction of the British Navy would be the turning of our Atlantic Maginot line. Without the British Navy, the Atlantic would give us no more protection than the Maginot line gave France after the German troops had marched through Belgium. The soothing words "Maginot line" were the refrain of a lullaby of death for France. The soothing words "Atlantice Ocean" are being used now by the propagandists of the dictators in the hope that they may become a lullaby of death for the United States.

The French knew that they were outnumbered 2 to 1 by the Germans, and that all Germans—men, women, and children—had been mobilized for war. They knew that Great Britain was unprepared for war and that little help could come to France from England. When they thought hard, therefore, they knew that every French man, woman, and child ought to be working for the national defense. The French had, of course, universal military training for the army. Even the French priests were trained to fight, and they fought at the front like other good soldiers and would not have been respected if they had not.

But when the question arose of mobilizing the whole nation for national defense by compulsory national service, even as a temporary measure to save the liberties of France, the French found it more comfortable to listen to the voices, some sincere, some bought by the dictators, which told them that their individual liberties were sacred and must not be sacrificed for a moment, even to save the liberties of the nation; that it was more important for the individual to work only 40 hours a week than for his country to have enough airplanes; that the voluntary acceptance of national service as a temporary measure would be an imitation of the dictatorships. Thus, in the name of the preservation of individual liberty, the national liberty of France was condemned in advance to destruction.

PLAYING DICTATORS' GAME

Recently, in this country, we have heard men and women arguing that we ourselves would be imitating the dictatorships if we should create through conscription an army adequate to defend our country. They, too, are playing the dictators' game.

Then there were many in France, some honest, some agents of the dictators, who argued that since airplane design was changing rapidly, France should have good models but should not manufacture planes in great quantity until after the outbreak of war. They were prominent and powerful. As a result, at one time French plane production was allowed to sink to 37 a month, while Germany was producing 1,000 a month.

Have we been wiser the past years? Have we built the planes or trained the aviators to man them? Have we prepared the tanks or the men to drive them? Have we trained and equipped even infantry for our national defense? Are there not among us many who think and talk as did the Frenchmen who opposed adequate preparations?

Recently I heard a Senator who is as good an American as any of us state that while he would favor conscription the moment we should be attacked, he would oppose conscription until after we should have been attacked. The ruined homes of France, the women and children starving on the roads, cry out to him and to every one of us that wars are won or lost by the preparations made or not made before they begin; that untrained soldiers are not opponents but merely victims for trained men with tanks and planes. The dictators, who are confident that all democracies will always be too late, count not only on their agents to befuddle American opinion but also on honorable men like that Senator.

BRITISH NAVY OUR DEFENSE

What stands today between the Americas and the unleashed dictatorships? The British Fleet and the courage of the British people. How long will the British Fleet be able to hold the exits from Europe to the Atlantic? I cannot answer that question nor can any man.

You have heard the appeal of General Pershing for aid to the British Fleet. You have heard the appeal of Admiral Standley. You have heard the appeal of William Allen White and his associates. If you let these appeals go unanswered and the British Fleet goes under, do you realize what that would mean to you, to all of the people of this country?

Great Britain and Ireland, along with the whole continent of Europe, would be organized into one economic unit directed from Berlin; a unit which would be far stronger in productive capacity than the United States; which would have five times our capacity to produce warships; a unit whose trade would be controlled by one trading trust directed from Berlin. No country of North or South America would be able to trade with Europe except on such terms as might be pleasing to the dictators. Those conditions for many of the countries of South America would be the acceptance of a greater or less measure of Nazi control.

For us, since we would not accept Nazi control, they would mean the cutting off of our markets for cotton, tobacco, and other export products. That would be so fatal to the economy of certain sections of our country that we should face the gravest economic crisis in our history; a crisis which it would be the task of Nazi and Communist agents to exploit.

JAPANESE PERIL

In the Pacific would be the Japanese Navy, cooperating with the dictators, which would be able to cut us off from our supplies of rubber and tin and would compel us to leave a large part of our fleet in the Pacific to defend Hawaii and the west coast. In the Atlantic would be combined fleets of the dictators which would be so close to our own fleet in strength that they would be able to cut us off from all commerce, not only with Europe but also with Africa, and would endanger even our communications with the southern portion of this hemisphere.

Are you sure that under those circumstances the powerful Nazi and Communist movements which already exist in various countries of South America would not be able to seize power and would not invite the European dictators to organize air forces on their territories, and that those air forces would not move northward with dive bombers to the Panama Canal and then move against this country? Are you sure that our existing fleet and air force would be able to defend even the northern route to the United States by way of Greenland, Newfoundland, and Canada?

It is as clear as anything on this earth that the United States will not go to war, but it is equally clear that war is coming toward the Americas.

ARE PREPARING WAY

The agents of the dictators are already here preparing the way for their armies. They are preparing the way in the same manner in which they prepared the way in France.

In France much of the most terrible and traitorous work was done by the Fascists and Communists working together. Many honest French democrats and liberals had been snared by Communist propaganda and argued that, because the Communists called themselves a political party and pretended at the time to be in favor of democracy, it would be undemocratic to deny to the Communists the rights of any other political party. The honest French patriots and democrats who protected the Communists did not discover until too late that the Communists were acting as spies and agents of the dictators, that the Communist Party was merely camouflaged as a political party and was in reality a conspiracy to commit patricide at the direction of a foreign dictator. They discovered too late that the Communists were traitors who were claiming the protection of the state which they intended to destroy only in order the better to prepare for its destruction.

When the German invasion began to sweep into Belgium and France, there were Communist and Nazi agents of Germany in each town and village who produced panic among the civilian populations by spreading fantastic tales of murdering by the German troops of men, women, and children. By this means 10,000,000 civilians were harried in fear from their homes and clogged all the roads, so that the French, British, and Belgian Armies could not maneuver, so that transport of supplies became almost impossible, and a magnificent fighting force became a clotted mass of men and material, a perfect target for bombing and machine-gunning from the air.

STOPPED RAIL TRAFFIC

At the most critical moment of the fighting in Belgium, other German agents, this time Communist railway men, stopped all traffic on the Belgian railways so that there was no transport by train for the French, British, and Belgian Armies.

Throughout France, especially in Paris, there were hundreds of Communist and Nazi agents of the dictators with extremely short-wave portable radio transmitting sets in their hiding places. They kept the Germans fully informed of the movements of the French Army and of the intentions of the French Government. Since they could change their hiding places daily, the French were never able to track down more than one-tenth of these spies.

The French had been more hospitable than are even we Americans to refugees from Germany. More than one-half of the spies captured doing actual military spy work against the French Army were refugees from Germany.

Do you believe that there are no Nazi or Communist agents of this sort in America?

On the 10th day of last May, the people of France were as confident as are the people of the United States today that their country could not be conquered. Three days later on the 13th day of May, the Germans had smashed through the center of the French Army and France was doomed.

SPIES CLEARED WAY

The way had been prepared by spies, agents, and propagandists but it was the strength of the German Army and the skill of its leaders that enabled Germany to strike the fatal blow. The blow was struck just where the French did not expect it. The attack was made by a new method that the French had never imagined. Waves of bombing planes preceded waves of tanks with perfect coordination maintained by radio. The tanks cut through the French lines, then wheeled and lopped off piece after piece of the French Army.

The French soldier fought as courageously and magnificently as any soldier has ever fought. Division after division, cut off from supplies of all sorts, fought on until there were no more shells for the cannons or cartridges for the guns, then charged with the bayonet. The courage of the French was magnificent but of no avail against the tanks and planes of the Germans. And, make no mistake, the German infantrymen were as brave as the French.

The entire western world had been lulled by stories of the inferiority of German equipment. I have seen myself hundreds of thousands of German soldiers with all their motorized and mechanized equipment. I have never seen one piece of that equipment broken down.

The German military machine today is without question the most powerful that has ever been created. It has been used with consummate skill. And you may be sure that if the Nazis have an opportunity to turn it against us, it will be as strong or stronger than it is today and will be used in the most unexpected manner.

CERTAIN WE ARE NEXT

I cannot tell you where and when the attack will come, any more than the French general staff could have told you that the German attack would be made at Sedan on the 13th of May; but I am certain that if Great Britain is defeated the attack will come, and that all the strength of this Nation will be needed—mobilized, organized, equipped, and ready—if we are to parry it and save the independence of our country.

Why are we sleeping, Americans? When are we going to wake up? When are we going to tell our Government that we want to defend our homes and our children and our liberties, whatever the cost in money or blood? When are we going to give the lie to those who say that the people of the United States no longer care about their liberties; that they look upon the United States just as a trough into which to get their snouts, and not as the greatest adventure in human freedom that this earth has known?

When are we going to let the world know that in spite of all the efforts of all the propagandists who call their propaganda "debunking" and try to teach us to fear even truth, we still know that when anyone tries to debunk the Ten Commandments and the Sermon on the Mount, he prepares for himself hell in this world and in the next?

When are we going to let legislators in Washington know that we don't want any more politicians who are afraid of the next election and scared to ask us to make the sacrifices that we know are necessary to preserve our liberties and our Declaration of Independence and our Constitution? When are we going to tell them that we want to know what are our duties, not what are our privileges? When are we going to say to them that we don't want to hear any longer about what we can get from our country, but we do want to hear what we can give to our country. When are we going to stand before God and say that we know a human being is worthy of freedom only when he serves the ideal in which he believes?

JOIN IN FIGHT

Do we want to see Hitler in Independence Hall making fun of the Liberty Bell? No!

Then here, in this square, where Washington walked with Jefferson, where our independence was declared, where our Constitution was framed, I ask you and all other Americans who hear my voice tonight to join in the fight to keep our country free.

Write and telegraph to your Senators and Representatives. Write to your newspapers. Demand the privilege of being called into the service of the Nation. Tell them that we want conscription. Tell them that we back up General Pershing.

If you belong to great patriotic organizations, make them act. If you want to make your will felt but do not know how to make it felt, write to me and I shall try personally to put you in touch with the men and women who know how you can help most effectively in your own home towns and villages.

Our defense against the enemies who are already within our country has still to be organized. Nearly all our defense against the enemies that are still outside our country has still to be organized. If we won't act, our Government can't. It is up to us.

The fighting line of the war for the enslavement of the human spirit is nearing our shores. For every American "there is no discharge in that war." An American is a free man or he is nothing. Our fate and the fate of our children depends on what each one of us does—now.

Speaking of Dictators: Where Shall We Rank John L. Lewis?

HON. JOHN Z. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 19, 1940

Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand a copy of a letter which I understand was addressed to every Member of the Congress by the "fuehrer" of the C. I. O., Mr. John L. Lewis. It deals with conscription, which subject I shall not debate this morning, but I should like to refer to a couple of passages in his letter. Mr. Lewis speaks about conscription being the first step toward the breakdown of those free institutions which we seek to protect. He also speaks about a free democracy as distinguished from a totalitarian state.

Is this the same Mr. Lewis who introduced the sit-down strike technique into American labor relations? Is this the same Mr. Lewis who maintains Harry Bridges as one of his chiefs on the Pacific coast? Is he the same Mr. Lewis who is attempting to set up a one-man dictatorship over American labor? If he is, and he wants to appeal to the Congress, I, for one, think it is high time he started in practicing what he preaches. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the letter from Mr. Lewis to which I referred, together with my reply to him, which follow:

CONGRESS OF INDUSTRIAL ORGANIZATIONS,
Washington, D. C., August 14, 1940.

Hon. JOHN Z. ANDERSON,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN ANDERSON: The Congress of Industrial Organizations has already indicated to the Military Affairs Committees of the Senate and the House of Representatives its opposition to the pending measures (S. 4164 and H. R. 10132) which provide for peacetime military conscription. This statement was based upon a canvass made of the members of the executive board of the C. I. O. The consensus of their opinions was in fundamental opposition to the pending measures.

Attached is a brief memorandum which sets forth the major reasons for our opposition to measures for peacetime military conscription. I urge your most careful examination of these arguments.

I am certain that the millions of members of the C. I. O. and their families join with me in calling upon you to oppose measures providing for military conscription in peacetime.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN L. LEWIS.

MEMORANDUM IN OPPOSITION TO PEACETIME MILITARY CONSCRIPTION

The Congress of Industrial Organizations stands second to no one in its desire for effective national defense. It has, therefore, pledged itself to the fullest cooperation with proper defense measures.

In the establishment of adequate national defense, however, it is just as essential that unsound and unwise proposals be defeated, as it is that proper measures be taken. In the excitement of a period of crisis, measures are sometimes advanced so fundamentally in opposition to our national democratic traditions that their proponents would not dare propose them at any other time. It is our belief that peacetime military conscription is just such a measure.

The very genesis of the measure for peacetime conscription is open to serious question.

(1) The proposed bill was drawn up under unofficial auspices by private citizens, although no measure could be more affected with the public interest.

(2) The bill was launched by a group of prominent New York corporation lawyers and other wealthy persons. Neither these persons nor the congressional sponsors of the bill have been notable in their support of legislation for the welfare of the common people of this country.

(3) The measure has not been formally requested of Congress by the President of the United States, the responsible head of preparation for national defense.

(4) At their recent national conventions, both of the major political parties gave the proposal for conscription consideration, but neither saw fit to give endorsement to the proposal.

Briefly these are the reasons which have impelled the C. I. O. to oppose the pending measures:

(1) There is a better way to recruit a proper army for defense than conscription. Voluntary enlistment under terms which have a real concern for the needs of the individual would quickly provide a suitable army. The period of enlistment should be shortened to 1 year. The pay should be raised at least to compare with that of the self-respecting workman. The right to return to private employment should be protected. Provision should be made for the continuation of social security protection during the period of such enlistment. Private debts should be either assumed or suspended. Officers' commissions should be more freely open to enlisted men so that an army career is open to men from the ranks. Under such circumstances the most effective and loyal kind of an army could be raised with much less cost to the Nation than the enormous expenditures necessary for conscription.

(2) Military conscription now would establish the principle in this Nation that the lives of our young men are less privileged than the profit rights of dollars. Today the Nation is watching the shameful spectacle of our Government yielding to the imperious demands of corporate industry for vast tax concessions and enormous loans as a precondition to manufacturing arms. The same interests who thus strangle our national defense call loudly for the forcible conscription of our young men. They claim in one breath that no dollar will be turned to the defense of our Nation without a fat and untaxed profit being assured, while almost at the same moment they call upon our young men, most of them workers, to cast aside their liberty and sacrifice their ambitions, or suffer punishment as a felon. It would be a terrible day in American history should our young men be forced to the draft while industry is free to lay down its ultimatums to the Government.

(3) Forced military service in peace time would be an alarming departure from the basic principles of our democracy. It is the first step toward the breakdown of those free institutions which we seek to protect.

Citizens who become subject to conscription lose a substantial part of those civil rights and liberties which distinguish a free democracy from a totalitarian state.

Such conscription would further establish in the minds of the young people of the Nation the idea that voluntary loyalty to the Nation is no longer a necessary virtue. It would introduce them to the principle of compulsion, a principle native to the fascist state and alien to our own.

(4) The production of equipment for an army has lagged far behind the enlistments into the military service. Already there are more men available to the Army and the National Guard than can be equipped for some time to come. The present speed of enlistments is far more rapid than the provision of equipment. From the point of effective defense, an efficient, loyal, and highly trained army, highly mechanized, is many times more efficient than a sullen, ill-equipped, poorly trained, conscript army of three times the size. Conscription now would be an enormous waste of money and manpower.

(5) The entire fabric of the Nation, both industrial and social, would be torn by conscription. The dislocations in industrial production and in community life caused by conscription would take years to heal.

Therefore, the C. I. O. is opposed to provision for peacetime conscription as a measure inimical to the most effective kind of national defense and alien to the democratic way of life.

Furthermore, effective national defense in a democracy must not be restricted to the creation of armed forces. Democratic national defense must include the full utilization of our industrial capacity and our available manpower. It must include those measures which create faith and loyalty in citizens, such as, security for the aged, health provision for the lower income groups, a place in the sun for young people and the aggressive maintenance of civil liberties.

AUGUST 19, 1940.

Mr. JOHN L. LEWIS,
President, Congress of Industrial Organizations,
1106 Connecticut Avenue NW., Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: This will acknowledge receipt of your letter dated August 14 and the enclosed memorandum on the subject of peacetime military conscription. At your request, I have carefully examined the arguments set forth and now hasten to reply.

On page 3 of your memorandum I find the following statement: "(3) Forced military service in peacetime would be an alarming departure from the basic principles of our democracy." I shall not argue that point with you, as the compulsory military training bill has not yet been reported to the House of Representatives for action. It is my firm opinion that such important subjects as this should receive the most careful consideration of the Congress before being passed on.

Reading further in your memorandum, however, I find the following statement: "It is the first step toward the breakdown of those free institutions which we seek to protect. Citizens who become subject to conscription lose a substantial part of those civil rights and liberties which distinguish a free democracy from a totalitarian state." On the last page of your memorandum this observation appears: "The C. I. O. is opposed to provision for peacetime conscription as a measure inimical to the most effective kind of national defense and alien to the democratic way of life."

It is reassuring to know that you still have faith in our free institutions, our civil rights, and liberties, and that you are opposed to any measure that you feel is alien to the democratic way of life. Frankly, I am not the only Member of Congress who has been somewhat concerned over your attitude toward our American ideals and traditions during the past few years. Also, very frankly, I am not the only Member who is very much inclined to doubt the sincerity of your high-sounding phrases at this particular time.

If I am mistaken I should like to be corrected, but it occurs to me that you are the same Mr. Lewis who introduced the sit-down strike technique into our democratic way of life. We had an opportunity to observe the uplifting effect of this particular innovation when the French Republic crumbled before the onslaught of Hitler's army. I believe France tried the sit-down strike first, under the Blum regime, and then you tried it here. It would be interesting to have your comments on just whose civil rights and liberties are saved by sit-down strikes and just how such strikes contribute to the basic principles of our democracy.

Among other things you manage to keep in your organization men whose avowed policies are violently opposed to traditional American doctrines, men with responsible positions who preach class distinction and foment strife between labor and management, while the general public foots the bill. Chief among these, of course, is Harry Bridges, the notorious alien labor racketeer on the Pacific coast, who should have been deported long ago.

You talk about the totalitarian state on the one hand, while at the same time you attempt to assume complete control over the destinies of 4,000,000 American laborers and their families. I am personally acquainted with men who are members of the C. I. O., not because they want to be, but because they are obliged to join in order to follow their chosen profession. They are free American citizens forced into a state of labor bondage through your peculiar but effective methods of conscription.

I noticed with particular interest your reference to the necessity of protecting our civil rights and liberties. Perhaps you will recall that it was a struggle for these fundamental principles that brought this great democracy into being. For over 150 years the American people have been striving to protect their constitutional privileges, and yet you would deny to the worker the most precious right of all—the right to work.

With the foregoing observations in mind and with the hope that at some future date your policies will conform more closely to your public statements, I beg to remain,

Yours very truly,

J. Z. ANDERSON.

Mr. Speaker, I also desire to insert the following pertinent editorial from a recent issue of the Monterey Peninsula Herald, published in Monterey, Calif.

Generalissimo John L. Lewis, who commands 4,000,000 in his far-flung army in strategic centers in this country, apparently is convinced that George C. Marshall, who is just a plain general, doesn't know his business or is a subversive interest undertaking to promote conscription to undermine the American system that the generalissimo has defended with immense contributions to political funds, sit-down strikes, and his own infallible wisdom that is always on tap on all subjects.

It is true, of course, that General Marshall at this writing commands only some 300,000 men, all of them volunteers.

That makes the general of inconsequential importance compared with the generalissimo. On the other hand, the generalissimo commands a considerable number of men who were indeed drafted, since they had to join the C. I. O. or else.

General Marshall's professional advice, Secretary Hull's solemn warnings, Secretary Stimson's urgent pleas—all are so much camouflage to the gentleman who knows better behind his eyebrows about how to defend America. It is sufficient, says the generalissimo of 4,000,000, to promote 1-year service in the Regular Army and pay the boys more money. That would make a good enough Army to suit him, because the only reason why this country is in danger is because there are millions of unemployed, too many hours of work, too small pay checks, insufficient pensions, and, therefore, the necessity to engage in war in order to avoid these troublesome failures.

That is what the villains behind the scenes are conniving at, with the assistance of the President, his Secretaries, and the always-to-be-distrusted generals. If anyone is in doubt about that, he doesn't have to take John L. Lewis as his authority. Earl Browder will do just as well, as he speaks the same language on this subject.

Repetition of 1896

OF

HON. ROBERT A. GRANT

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 15, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE SOUTH BEND TRIBUNE

Mr. GRANT of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the South Bend (Ind.) Tribune of August 12, 1940:

[From the South Bend (Ind.) Tribune of August 12, 1940]

The year 1940 in some respects resembles the year 1896 in political aspects. In 1896 the Republican nominee was William McKinley; the Democratic nominee, William J. Bryan. Both were Christian gentlemen, both were loyal American citizens. McKinley represented sound money, a gold standard. Bryan stood for free silver, the free coinage of silver at 16 to 1. Interest in the campaign was intense. Some Democrats willed to follow Bryan's lead but many were gold-standard, sound-money advocates and could not accept the theories of the man from Nebraska who had won the Democratic nomination by stampeding the convention with what went into history as his "crown of gold" speech.

Following the Democratic convention and the nomination of Mr. Bryan with his free-silver theories sound, far-visioned Democrats found themselves in the same position that has come to thoughtful, far-seeing Democrats of today following the recent Chicago convention. The Nation-loving Democrats of 1896 loved their country first, the party afterward. They could not stomach Bryan's silver theories. While admitting that he was a great speaker, that he could make his theories appear logical, sound, and attractive they realized that to adopt those theories would bring depression and suffering to the country. What did they do?

They saw the light. They knew it was better that McKinley and the sound-money ideas of himself and the Republican Party should prevail rather than the disaster that would come from making Bryan president. With genuine common sense, with loyalty to their country, and with keep appreciation of the future they became gold Democrats and when election day came thousands upon thousands voted for McKinley and helped to save their country. They were men who had the courage of their convictions. They did not desert the Democratic Party; it actually had been taken from them. They could not bear to see their party be the instrument of a lot of theorists and be held responsible for national disaster.

Will this year be a repetition of 1896? Will the genuine, sound-minded, nationally loyal Democrats produce that same type of courage? We believe many of them will. Already it is apparent they do not propose that the great Democratic Party will be destroyed by the new deal whose purposes are selfish and whose objectives do not conform to the best interests of the American people whether rich or poor, whether employed or unemployed. These Democrats appreciate that their attitude is not desertion of the Democratic Party but loyalty to a great country that exists under the God-given rights of a constitution that has protected and advanced the Nation and that must be upheld at all costs.

The First Attack on Religion

OF

HON. JOHN C. SCHAFER

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

EDITORIAL FROM THE CATHOLIC HERALD CITIZEN

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, under permission unanimously granted by the House, I incorporate in the RECORD at this point a copy of my August 14, 1940, letter to the Most Reverend Moses E. Kiley, S. T. D., president of the Catholic Herald Citizen, and a copy of the editorial, entitled "The First Attack on Religion," mentioned therein.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., August 14, 1940.

The Most Reverend MOSES E. KILEY, S. T. D.,
President, Catholic Herald Citizen, 793 North Jackson Street, Milwaukee, Wis.

MY DEAR FATHER KILEY: I have your letter of August 8 and thank you most cordially for sending me the clipping from the August 10, 1940, issue of your publication, which contains the exceptionally fine editorial entitled "The First Attack on Religion."

While I favor an adequate national defense under a voluntary system of military service, I am opposed to compulsory military service in time of peace, which is a part of the New Deal plan to establish a dictatorship in the United States. Compulsory military service in a democracy in time of peace is indefensible, particularly when it has not been demonstrated that the voluntary system of military service has failed.

Although I shall oppose the enactment of the pending compulsory military service bill when it is brought to the floor of Congress, I shall follow your recommendation and do everything that I can to incorporate the religious exemptions which you have called to my attention.

I enclose herewith pages 4973, 4974, and 4975 of the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, which contain my extension of remarks in which I incorporated the statement of Rt. Rev. Msgr. Michael J. Ready, general secretary of the National Catholic Welfare Conference.

Please be assured that I am always glad to hear from you with reference to pending or proposed legislation or if I can be of service.

With kind personal regards, I am,

Sincerely yours,

JOHN C. SCHAFER.

[From the Catholic Herald Citizen of August 10, 1940]

THE FIRST ATTACK ON RELIGION

No American citizen should fail properly to evaluate some of the prosposals for national defense that certain well-meaning individuals are sponsoring. Such, for instance, is the Burke-Wadsworth conscription bill as now drawn, which, to a certain degree, undermines one of the pillars of our democratic form of government—freedom of religion.

The enactment of such a law would deprive citizens of the United States of a right guaranteed them by the Constitution. The Constitution in guaranteeing this right, likewise necessarily guaranteed the means necessary effectively to exercise this right, namely, that there be available at all times ministers of religion to care for their spiritual needs. Depriving persons of the means necessary to exercise a right that is theirs is equivalent to depriving them of that right, since a right without the means to exercise it is valueless.

In 1917 the Congress of the United States recognized this right and exempted all ministers of religion and divinity students from military service. The present proposed law is a leaf out of the book of the dictators and is alien to the spirit of a democratic nation. No one denies the necessity of training men for the defense of the Nation, but it is likewise necessary to train students for the ministry and the priesthood in order that the citizens of the nations may have ministers of religion available to care for their spiritual needs, which right the Constitution guarantees them. The citizens in the land and naval forces of the United States like all others need the spiritual care that ministers of religion alone can give them. At no time in the history of the Nation have the various religious denominations failed to provide chaplains for the men in the service of the Nation. Seeing that the Constitution of the United States is nowise changed in this respect, the right that was recognized in 1917 should be recognized in 1940.

The Selective Draft Act of 1917 also exempted all Brothers who had taken solemn vows to dedicate their lives to the service of God. This, too, was in perfect accord with the spirit and intention of the founders of the Nation, as manifested in the Declaration of Independence. These brave, noble men, whose thoughts scanned the whole fabric of God's creation in the world in which we dwell, studied the laws of nature, and of nature's God; appealed to the Supreme Judge of the world to bear witness to the rectitude of their intentions, and proclaimed their firm reliance on the protection of Divine Providence.

To enact now a law contrary to the principles enunciated in the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution would be to go backward; would be a return to the tyranny of a government that refused to recognize that "all men are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights," which the founders of the Nation declared to be self-evident; would be to jettison all for which these patriots lived, labored, and sacrificed.

In order to preserve for himself and posterity the free exercise of the inalienable rights the patriots who established the Nation secured for him, every religious American should request his Senators and his Congressmen jealously to safeguard the rights of his constituents, by seeing that exemption is granted to all ministers of religion, to all students for the ministry and the priesthood, and likewise to those others, who, by solemn vows, have dedicated their lives to the service of that God, to whom, as the Supreme Judge of the world, the illustrious Father of the Nation appealed to bear witness to the rectitude of their intention, and on the protection of whose providence they proclaimed their reliance. That posterity might never forget all this they caused to be impressed on the currency of the land, "In God we trust."

By doing this you will stop this first subtle attack on religious freedom, the cornerstone of democracy, and without which no democratic nation can endure. Let your Representatives know that on this point you stand with Washington and the other patriots of '76, and not with some of the modern sages, who seem to think that the Nation no longer has any need of the protection of Divine Providence, on which the founders of the Nation relied.

Leave It to Willkie

HON. JAMES F. O'CONNOR

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 19, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE BIG TIMBER PIONEER

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Big Timber Pioneer in Montana:

LEAVE IT TO WILLKIE

Leave it to Willkie to defeat himself before he even gets started in the main campaign. Every day the Associated Press, his best front-page advertiser, quotes him on some unimportant suggestion, something a Presidential candidate, a sound one, should not have in mind.

A week ago he announced that he was going to get Thomas E. Dewey to campaign the Midwest and show up Democratic political machines, "which do not make for good government," and hammer at the Democratic machines in Chicago, Memphis, and Jersey City.

No mention was made of Tammany Hall and Wall Street machines in New York City. It was Wall Street defeated Dewey for the Republican nomination for President due to his prosecution of some of its most prominent members, particularly John J. Hines, president of the New York Stock Exchange.

His next silly announcement is that when he goes to the White House, if he does, he will make an inventory of all his earthly possessions, and when he leaves at the end of 4 years, have a check up of the same, apparently to prove that he is not carrying away any White House china, silverware, etc.

As you know, the order of procedure on inaugural day is for the President-elect to drive to the White House, pick up the retiring President, who will remain with him until he takes the oath of President and delivers his inaugural address. But the retiring one does not return to the White House.

It may be embarrassing for Willkie and Mrs. Willkie to unload their trunks on the White House lawn and have their contents checked while they are at the inaugural ceremonies.

The latest by Willkie is that when he gets into office he will prosecute all who are contributing to a Democratic campaign book, which, he says, is a violation of the Hatch Corrupt Practices Act.

But how about those who are contributing indirectly? Two weeks ago the Sweet Grass News published a statement of the vice chairman of the Republican State Committee that she had named four local Republicans to solicit funds for the Republican campaign, 60 percent of which will go to the National Committee, the balance to State and county committees.

Of course that is not a violation of the Hatch Act. Senator WHEELER may pay 10 percent of his first year's salary for campaign purposes, but Wheeler-for-Senator Clubs may expend a half million over the State without violating the Hatch Act.

This applies to Willkie-for-President clubs now being organized in every part of the country.

In the meantime the exodus from Democratic to Republican ranks continues.

Last week a professor in the State University of Missouri announced he had switched to Willkie.

Mrs. John N. Garner, wife of the Vice President, laughingly pinned a Willkie button on a friend.

Twenty-two beet growers in Nebraska had visited Willkie in his Colorado Springs hotel and liked him. However, the Associated Press did not state how many nonvoting Mexicans they have working in their beet fields.

Now we have Metz, of Wyoming, relieved recently of a good Government job.

And so the story goes. Every Democrat who has been ousted from a Federal job during the past 8 years is after Roosevelt's scalp.

Head of the bolters, as usual, is former Senator Reed, of Missouri, who has been a bolter ever since the Democratic Party of that State bolted him from his senatorial job.

Compulsory Military Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ESTES KEFAUVER

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 19, 1940

ADDRESS BY RICHARD H. KIMBALL

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include a speech recently made by Col. Richard H. Kimball, of Chattanooga, as reported in the News-Free Press of August 13. Colonel Kimball sets forth very logically and forcefully the need for and equality of the conscription plan for securing necessary manpower for defense. He, as colonel in the World War, and as a man who has studied and kept in close touch with military affairs of today, can speak with authority on this subject. His remarks are well considered and deserve your study.

[From the Chattanooga News-Free Press of August 13, 1940]

VOLUNTEER SYSTEM CAN'T BE RISKED IN THIS HOUR OF PERIL, SAYS COLONEL KIMBALL IN ADDRESS—TELLS KIWANIS CLUB CONSCRIPTION VITAL TO FUTURE—SECURITY OF THIS NATION THREATENED FOR FIRST TIME

"We could suffer the old volunteer system in the Spanish-American War, but we simply can't risk it now," said Col. Richard Kimball, retired United States Army officer and local business leader, in an address before the Kiwanis Club today, during which he advocated compulsory military training.

"In the past," said Colonel Kimball, "we were able to indulge the traditional preference of our people for the volunteer system because the security of our Nation was not seriously threatened, not even in the World War. Now the situation is different. The protection hitherto afforded by certain combinations of governments which, solely in their own interest, have stood between us and attack by other combinations of nations has been broken down.

"Great Britain, the one other powerful democracy that remains, is fighting for its life. If the British Empire goes, it is certain that we will have to face, alone, the combined totalitarian or dictator governments of the world. Already they have expressed in numerous ways their hostility toward us. Already they have taken aggressive measures against us; some openly, some through subversive activities. They may not trust each other. They may fight among themselves over the spoils, but it is certain that they are united against us, primarily for two reasons: The first is that we, in our conception of individual liberty, freedom, and justice, are the direct negation of, and a living challenge to, the slave-like state in which they hold their own and all conquered people. Second, we are rich and we stand in their way in many fields in which they wish to expand their business.

"The volunteer system of providing enlisted personnel has appeared in the past to meet the needs of the Army in peacetime because its requirements have been comparatively small. We are preparing now against the possibility of war with some one or more of the great world powers, which will have profited undoubtedly, by all military lessons to be learned in 1940 in Europe, Asia, and Africa. That calls for an expansion of our training program to an extent never before undertaken in peacetime in this country.

VOLUNTEER SYSTEM WASTEFUL

"In every other war with a foreign power, except the World War, we have depended upon the volunteer system, and it has proven wasteful, costly, and undependable from every standpoint.

"One of the things which we must keep clearly in mind is that our development of an adequate defense program is not for its own sake, but to afford us security behind which we shall be free to work out our own way of life. The war which we are waging now—the war we shall continue to wage with or without foreign aggression—is the war to make our form of government work. That calls for clearer thinking, more discipline, tougher fiber, and no little sacrifice on the part of our whole people. We must be so strong that no foreign power will venture to take a hand in that entirely private war of ours.

HITLER DEALS ON OWN TERMS

"No sane man who looks at the world today can fail to appreciate that if we are to survive we must be sufficiently strong to demand those things that are essential to maintain an economic structure which will make possible our economic and political stability and independence. Some of our isolationists say we must now appease in order to do business with a victorious Hitler. They ignore, or do they not wish to remember that Hitler does business entirely on his own terms with people who are not in a position to resist his military threats. If we do business with any foreign power we don't want to be in the position of having to trade at the point of a gun.

"Something else that we should not forget is that Hitler has been able not only to build up a powerful, highly effective war machine, but that he is also the head of a sect. Not only his own people, but groups in other nations, including our own, are being taken in by his fanatical teachings. We must be superior spiritually as well as in military power, in order to defeat such an enemy.

"Colonel Lindbergh's admiration of the efficiency of the German war machine is understandable. That his admiration should not be tempered by its use to machine-gun and crush with tanks fleeing women and children is not understandable.

"If we are realistic, there must be some question in our minds as to whether or not certain foreign governments are now at war with us—surely many of their acts are acts of war by the old standards. We must prepare quickly and adequately to face the world alone.

"While there is a chance that we may not have to meet total war, that chance is greatly improved if we are prepared to meet it. I would not be surprised if, when finally enacted by Congress, as I confidently believe it will be, the Compulsory Training Act will place a comparatively small limit on the quotas that are called into service during the next 12 months, but it will afford a basis of large, rapid military expansion at the will of Congress.

REORGANIZE NATIONAL LIFE

"Preparation for total modern war means the reorganization of our whole national life. It requires 25 men in the Army and in civil life to maintain 1 man in the line in time of war.

"The greatest value at this time of an adequate Compulsory Service Act is that it will make millions of men available for military service; they will be registered and classified so that a dependable military program can be planned.

"During the World War, the selective-service draft, which is the wartime complement of compulsory military training in peacetime, or semipeacetime, proved to be economical in time, men, and money. It is scientific, dependable, fair, and democratic. The modern army is highly technical. If you need a group of radio experts, you lose valuable time if you have to try to make them out of a group of raw youths. Registration and classification will make it possible to find the right man for the right job. Compulsory military service is fair because it takes men uniformly in proportion to population and makes every proper and reasonable exemption for prior family and Government needs. That is intelligent, for it reduces economic and social dislocation to a minimum.

"Certain political leaders have said it is undemocratic. I think it is more democratic, for an impartial, deliberate, scientific, fairly administered system to select men to receive training in the Army, than to high-pressure them into a state of temporary excitement by the use of bands and rallies under which they enlist. I also think whether or not government action is democratic depends on whether or not it is in the interest of a majority of the people—is determined by representatives of a majority of the people and can in this same manner be undone if it does not work. We can compel school children to go to school, but we cannot compel men to learn to defend themselves and their country. It doesn't make sense.

"Recently publicity was given to the fact that all the eligible boys in one community in Tennessee had enlisted except one. That probably is good for the boys on account of the training they will receive, but it is also probable that a more even distribution of enlistments throughout the country would be better for the Nation.

TENNESSEE LOYAL

"On August 10 a Washington news item stated that the first 11 States in the number of men enlisted during the first 6 months of 1940 were Tennessee, Texas, Georgia, Kentucky, North Carolina, Oklahoma, New York, Pennsylvania, Illinois, California, and Virginia. Virginia ranks eleventh with 2,169. No New England State had as many as 2,000. It is quite apparent that, generally speaking, the Southern States, although averaging much smaller populations, are producing a relatively larger number of recruits to the Army than many thickly populated Northern States in which there are large groups of citizens of foreign origin. This speaks well for the patriotism of the 7 Southern and Southwestern States, but does it make our Army as representative as it should be, or bear equitably on the country as a whole. This would be adjusted by compulsory military training.

"The important thing for each father and mother to remember is that not only does training make a better and more effective army, but it makes one in which their sons in every respect have a better chance. We know from past experience that if certain things come to pass and the security of our Nation is in danger, we will go to war. When we do, your son or grandson or neighbor's son will go as their fathers and grandfathers went before. If your boy is handling a machine gun in the turret of a tank or in the tail of a bomber you will want his pilot to be all that good training can give him. If he is in the Infantry and the Artillery is laying down a supporting barrage, you will want those artillerymen as well as his comrades to know their stuff. You will want his officers to be as expert as possible in how to supply, march, and fight with every form of modern war machinery.

"When a mechanized division moves 60 miles a day in 1940, where an infantry division moved only 12 miles in 1918, the entire Army, including the War Department, not merely the units of that mechanized division, must be synchronized to that speed.

"Training, intensive training, is now necessary to bring an entire army to that point. Remember the Germans had in France, not only tanks, planes, machine guns, but also supertrained manpower.

APPEASERS WORTHLESS

"If through complacency and consequent lack of preparation we should ever have an American Flanders or Dunkirk, the appeasers, the isolationists, and the political opportunists will be of no more avail than were those discredited leaders in England who waited too long to prepare for war.

"Finally, I would say that it is incumbent upon the men, women, and youth of this country to study and be alert to the true meaning of the problems with which this Nation is today confronted. We cannot expect our statesmen to be in their action many steps ahead of the thinking of a substantial majority of our people.

"France was lost and Great Britain is in deadly peril not because all of their political leaders did not foresee the danger (some of them did foresee it and gave warning), but because the wishful thinking of a majority of the people made them unrealistic and deaf to their warnings.

"Tell your Senators and your Representatives in Congress how you feel about compulsory military training—that is only being fair to them."

Answering Mr. Frothingham

OF

HON. WALTER M. PIERCE

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 19, 1940

LETTER FROM EDWARD E. CLARK

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter written by Edward E. Clark answering Mr. Frothingham's attack on the Securities and Exchange Commission:

ANSWERING MR. FROTHINGHAM

At the June 19, 1940, annual dinner of the Harvard class of '94, Francis E. Frothingham delivered a talk or speech which was somewhat unusual for such gatherings.

Starting with the assertion that he wanted "to speak about the dangers that confront our United States as I see them," he devoted some five-sixths of his time to the situation abroad and the threat to this country which must necessarily follow, emphasizing the perils of totalitarianism which exist both to the east and the west; and then climaxed the speech with as bitter an attack upon the present administration and the New Deal as the writer has ever heard. Later, at the suggestion of friends, the address was printed and distributed to the members of the class; and as this numbers more than 260, that means pretty wide circulation—for who can tell how many beyond the recipients were able to read it?

Most social organizations forbid political discussions at their gatherings. Whether this custom is a salutary and proper one need not be argued. For at least it must be admitted by all that common fairness demands that if one member of a meeting of individuals, coming together for social purposes alone, takes it upon himself to launch into a partisan or political speech, opportunity should be given to someone not in accord with the speaker to present a little of the other side of the picture. There was no such opportunity on that occasion as the speech was the last of the evening. I, for one, should not want to have it thought that approval of the tone, the substance, or the implications of the speech was unanimous; so I am undertaking a brief answer, at the earliest possible moment.

Here, perhaps, the writer ought to inject a personal note by stating that he is, and for many years has been, a registered Republican, and has served in many party organizations and committees, including 10 years' service on the Republican State committee of Massachusetts—facts which may warrant the suggestion that what he may have to say has no foundation of narrow partisanship such as might be true in the case of one in the position of a political opponent.

What Frothingham stated, after leaving the subject of world conditions in general, evidently as a part of "the dangers that confront our United States," to which he had referred, began as follows:

"And what do we find in this country? A New Deal that, under the guise of a more abundant life, has at a reckless rate been exhausting the credit of this country, has demoralized and intimidated business, has arraigned class against class, has taught ease and slothfulness so that Government is looked to for universal support, and has shockingly degraded the morality of a great people Our Government has broken all its promises and does not know the truth"; and more following—all as general and none with more specification or reference to evidence than that which is quoted.

Strong language, indeed! "Shockingly degraded the morality of a great people" would stand in a class by itself were it not followed by the statements that "our Government has broken all its promises" and "does not know the truth."

Such extravagance of statement, such bitterness of spirit, one might think, must have their root in some awful situation, some great injustice bringing, at the very least, untold misery upon him who utters the words. No such situation, no such injustice appear; but it does appear that Frothingham is a recent president of the Investment Bankers' Association of America; and it also appears that this organization has been put into politics, that is to say so far as its leaders can do so. All of which brings me to the main subject and purpose of this reply.

For those of us who lived during the period between 1920 and 1930 it is difficult to realize that our newest voters of 1940 were but infants and children in those years, that even many of those about to vote at their second and third Presidential elections were then generally of too tender years to understand about and be interested in affairs of public importance; and that there are some other hundreds of thousands whose interest was casual or who have forgotten outstanding features of that eventful period. For that matter, even those of us who lived through that time might find a little memory-jogging useful, in giving consideration to the things that happened, and the results that followed.

Who was it who described it as "the lush years of the twenties," or words to that effect? "Lush" years they were; when a situation of real and growing prosperity was soon succeeded by one of largely artificial prosperity, shortly to be followed by one of overcapitalization, speculation, and rampant securities dealing, some honest but injudicious, and some either just above or below the line which defines thievery, but all of a magnitude and complexity never previously approached in this world of ours.

Among the agencies which took a part and whose sponsors benefited by that financial spree was the "investment company" or "investment trust." In former years confined to rather modest proportions and simple aims, these institutions were then presented with the opportunity not only to expand and to collect, from investors and from those who fancied they were investing, amounts of capital the magnitude of which had never before been dreamed of but to perform feats of financial jugglery which would have utterly bewildered the promoters and financiers of former years.

Many of those concerns were and continue to be soundly organized and ably and properly conducted; but many others were far from being in that class. Let us consider, although it may be only briefly and partially, in a statement of this character, a few of the activities of some of the latter—yes; and perhaps even a few of the slips and shortcomings of some of the managers of those which were not strictly in that class. For there are very potent reasons why they should not be forgotten.

First, however, let us look at the magnitude to which these institutions, good, bad, and indifferent, grew in the orgy of spending, investing, and speculating, in those "lush years of the twenties," and for several years thereafter. The governmental agency which now has supervision of them—and about which a word or two will be stated later—has ascertained that, from 1927 through 1936, there existed at one time or another 1,272 investment companies of all types; and that the number known to be still active at the end of 1936 had dwindled, through numerous liquidations and reorganizations, to only 559. By the same authority it appears that "the total assets of investment companies increased sharply from a relatively small amount in 1924 to a market value of over $7,000,000,000 as of the year 1929"; and that during the first 3 years of the depression, "namely, 1930 through 1932, these companies sustained a severe shrinkage in assets, the market value thereof being approximately $2,800,000,000 as of the year end 1932."

By the same authority it is estimated that, as of the end of 1935, there were approximately 2,100,000 securities holders of all types of investment companies; and that in the two following years, sales of such securities reached about $2,500,000,000, or about one-sixth of all corporate issues sold during that time.

Far be it from me to try to indicate how many of the promoters and managers in that tremendous enterprise were good and how many were bad and how many were a little of each. But one thing is quite certain. That is that there were a very plenty who were dishonest or overreaching and that the public was mulcted many hundreds of millions of dollars by them and should be protected against any repetition of the experience.

No attempt can be made in a brief statement to classify the defects and to set out completely the faults of a system which made such events possible. They ran somewhat further than from alpha to omega—for the real artists in the business began to profit, in some instances even before the corporation which was to be the vehicle for the collection of the funds of the investing public was formed; and in other cases, even after bankruptcy and reorganization proceedings, some of them (and this includes not a few whose position has been very high in the financial world) added to the profit they had made by the original sale of their securities by the repurchase of them, at a fraction of cost and at less than asset value, from the original investor at his our of need. Reference to a few instances, however, ought to be made, for the purpose of shedding real light on the situation.

Some of the investment trusts and companies, brought into being by capable and conscientious men, operated at first largely or entirely with the funds and at the risk only of the promoters themselves, but others were started with the proverbial "shoe string" and were managed with risk only to the investors who had contributed savings; and there was only one certainly about these—that their promoters would assure a handsome profit to themselves at the very earliest moment.

It was quite natural that some investment bankers, securities distributors, brokers, and others linked with investment matters should drift into the business; but others soon perceived the possibilities of profit; and, according to the authority already referred to, "salesmen of securities and merchandise, market traders, commercial bankers, utility financiers, financial promoters, industrialists, professors, economists, lawyers, accountants, and persons engaged primarily in numerous other industries or professions sponsored investment companies and actively promoted public interest in these organizations by the use of general publicity, elaborate advertising, and a variety of other means."

Do you recall the case of the United Founders group of investment trusts? This was started in 1922 with a cash investment of only $500. Seven years later it had publicly contributed capital of more than $500,000,000, of which the investors subsequently lost $370,000,000 or more; but its promoters and managers did not permit the conditions which brought this about to interfere with their plans; and there is evidence that one of them alone amassed profits of over $30,000,000 while these things were going on. Do you remember the fiscal management group which devised a plan for obtaining control of various investment companies without the expenditure of any of their own funds—how they contracted to buy controlling blocks of stock, paying for them with funds borrowed upon the portfolio securities of the very investment companies to be acquired—and how they pursued this course of organizing by borrowing upon securities not then owned by them, assuming control, liquidating and transferring, taking in connection with these transactions substantial commissions and profits until the units which had been used in connection with the plan became the subject of bankruptcy and reorganization proceedings or were taken in charge by State authorities?

Have you forgotten the case of General Investment Corporation? The manipulations of the managers of this concern were indeed a work of art. The initial public distribution of stock was started just before the beginning of the depression, when stock selling was easy; and much of that stock was sold even before it was issued. To describe the intricacies of the building up of this stock-selling scheme would be a long, long story; but even in the comparatively early days of the process the sponsors were able to realize a profit of $4,000,000 on deliveries of stock, in addition to $500,000 as a commission for sales. Eventually the corporation raised an aggregate of approximately $78,634,000 by the issuance and resale of its securities; several years later when control was transfered to a new management, it had sustained a loss in operations of approximately $70,604,000, or nearly 90 percent of its paid-up capital.

The reference to commissions suggests the need of a word or two about the manner in which promoters pyramided their fees and other gains. One of the earlier companies, organized in 1924, took $25,000,000 from the public in return for 250,000 shares of first preferred stock and 250,000 shares of common stock. The sponsors contributed about one-fifth as much, or $5,100,000, receiving therefor 50,000 shares of second preferred stock, but three times as much (or 750,000) shares of common stock. The underwriting commissions amounted to $1,000,000, but whether this went to the promoters or to others I do not know. Whoever received it, the sponsors treated themselves very well. For those were the days of rising markets; and 4 years later the market value of the contribution of the sponsors, who still retained three-fourths of the company's voting power, showed a gain of 450 percent, while the public, who contributed 5 times as much capital, profited only about 28 percent.

Would that there were space and time to set out the details of various other beautiful instances of this class. In one particular, the case last cited is modest. For sponsors and promoters of this type were generally not content to take the voting control of a company for a relatively small figure and to wait for accretions in market value in order to realize their profits. Very generally they wanted and took them at once and in cash, if not from that contributed by the public then by more devious and ingenious means such as market manipulation.

Market manipulations. What a field that presents. For this process was not confined to shady promoters looking for an immediate and inordinate profit from their operations. There is most excellent evidence that it was widely engaged in by others, not of that type, and to an extent which will make very fine reading when the whole story is told.

One of the pleasant practices engaged in during those days—probably not generally, but sufficiently often to require notice in passing—was that of those organizations which not only managed their affairs, but made themselves, or their associates or affiliates, the bank of deposit of the funds of the public which they were handling. To cite one instance, disclosed by the investigations of the authority already referred to, let us look at the activities of Seaboard Utility Shares Corporation, sponsored in 1929 by C. P. Parker & Co., Inc., an investment-banking firm of Boston. By June 1934 this corporation had deposited with this sponsor the sum of $1,957,417, consisting of cash deposits in a checking account aggregating $622,491, and the balance in "certificates of deposits" issued by the sponsor and funds reserved for the payments for securities under order.

This firm was sponsor of two other investment companies; and, at the time, the "deposits" of all three companies totaled $3,139,608, of which nearly $2,000,000 was in cash deposits in checking accounts. Such practice is bad enough on general principles; but at that time the Banking Act of 1933, compelling the separation of private and commercial banking from investment banking was going into effect; so the instance serves, at once, as an example of the practice and as an illustration of the necessity of such a law. Needless to say, little of those "deposits" was salvaged for the stockholders of the investment companies.

Doubtless the respectable investment bankers—and that means a very, very large proportion—deplore these things as much as anyone else. Of course, they do. But the attitude and activities of a few of them seem to indicate that they would like to have them forgotten. With that I cannot agree at all. I believe they ought to be remembered.

The activities of the company last named and some of its affiliates present very fine specimens of two courses of conduct, quite commonly pursued by eager promoters with a specific end in view and not confined to those interested in investment companies. One was the possession of a "straw" directorate—so indispensable to promoters who want to do their own manipulating, without interference from any quarter. The Seaboard Utilities had 45 directors of whom 17 were employees or officers of the sponsor and 28 were dealers in and distributors of securities. One would think that such a showing would make any promoter confident that his plans would not go astray; but apparently it was not sufficient; for it appears that the company fell into the habit of giving belated notices of directors' meetings; and that at least one conscientious director voiced his objections because he was not able to attend to his duties; but the records do not show clearly whether the protests brought about any improvement or not.

The other is the habit, upon the part of dishonest management, of employing auditors who will do their bidding and engage in all sorts of improper practices from padding assets and concealing liabilities to submitting two reports—one for the use of the management and the other for the stockholders and the public. This did not originate with investment companies, but some of them were quite ready to follow it. In the case of one of the concerns just referred to, the examination of the accountant is illuminating. It runs as follows:

"Q. As a matter of fact, through the annual reports they—the stockholders—believed that $14,000,000 at cost of portfolio securities was held by the trust and that certain of these portfolio securities were pledged as collateral not only for loans, but also reserved for the purchase of other securities; isn't that so?

"A. That is right.

"Q. In other words, it was doubly misleading; isn't that so?

"A. It seems so from these reports."

My time is expiring; so I cannot go into the detail of various other matters which ought to be set out. They run from such practices as manipulation and the artificial creation and maintenance of markets for securities, and the unloading of securities of little or no value, by promoters or managers, upon their company—witness the case of Iroquois Share Corporation, whose sponsors sold to the company for $313,616 an unfinished and almost unrented office building, subsequently taken by the mortgagees so that the "investment" was a total loss—to various other dealings which transgress violently upon the principles of ethics and honesty which ought to regulate the conduct of those who stand in fiduciary relations. What a book could be written upon this score. But it will have to be reserved for some other occasion.

Judging only from the fact that the men in the investment business whom I happen to know are of the finest characters in the community, it is my belief that the members of the Investment Bankers Association of America—having I understand, a membership of about 740—are all, or nearly all, good, upright citizens. That being so, they would neither take part in nor condone practices such as I have attempted briefly and partially to describe. But I believe that those who now lead and conduct the affairs of the organization are strangely misguided and frightfully short-sighted.

As a matter of fact, if I remember correctly, members of this and other banking organizations were among the first who perceived the perils of the mad development of investment trusts and companies and, as long as 12 years ago, and even longer, pointed out the need of regulatory legislation. Observation, however, leads to the conclusion that present-day leaders have slipped far away from the attitude of those of former times.

My observation, be it remembered, is that of one who looks on from the side lines; but it tells me, whether rightly or wrongly, that the agitation now fathered by the Investment Bankers Association and about to be referred to more particularly is not more than 7 or 8 months old—and that it became articulate about the time that people began to realize that November 1940 was to bring the election of a President and a Congress. If I recall correctly, there were a few mutterings late in 1939, but the movement did not start in earnest until early 1940.

It centered about the Securities and Exchange Commission and the laws which brought that body into existence and those enacted for the purpose of regulating the issue and disposition of securities and allied matters—including the Securities Act of 1933, the Securities Exchange Act of 1934, the Public Utility Holding Company Act of 1935, the Trust Indenture Act of 1939, and the bill for the regulation of investment trusts and investment companies, now before Congress for consideration.

In January and February of 1940 the mutterings of late 1939 became steadily more frequent, more voluble, and more bitter; and on March 18 or 19, Mr. E. F. Connely, president of the Investment Bankers' Association made his open declaration of war. To an outsider it would, considering the occasion which gave it rise, seem like a somewhat remarkable and peculiar move. Considerable controversy had arisen relative to the operation of the so-called arms-length bargaining rule relative to the sale of securities; and the Commission or its agent invited suggestions from the association and others interested as to how it might best be applied. Mr. Connely's reply apparently was a virtual demand upon the Commission that it "immediately recommend to Congress that the laws administered by the Commission be reviewed and amended." Shortly thereafter he is quoted as saying: "We gave them (the Securities and Exchange Commission) an opportunity to work with us, which they declined."

A trifle arrogant? Well, if a court before which I were practicing should suggest a conference relative to a pending matter and I should refuse it and petition the legislature to abolish the court, it would be so.

Since that time, it appears, Mr. Connely and his associates have been touring widely and talking loudly, in what has been termed a drive for amendments to the securities laws. Possibly so; but, judging from some of the activities I have noticed and the things I have heard said, it would appear that it has developed into a drive of a strictly political nature.

The character of the movement and its objects are made evident from many occurrences. One somewhat amusing incident happened only 2 weeks ago, when E. L. Shea, who strangely enough, is also interested in securities, being president of the North American Co., suggested to the Securities and Exchange Commission that it revise its procedure; in effect, he stated the belief that the Commission ought not to make private investigation of questionable practices coming to its notice, but should conduct public hearings thereon. This suggestion is quite as intelligent as would be the enactment of a law forbidding district attorneys to send out investigators and to question prospective witnesses, but obliging them to bring suspected wrongdoers into court at once for public examination. It is useful, however, as showing the trend of mind and intention of some of those who, forgetful of the past, would like to make radical changes in existing securities laws; far be it from me to say that they would like to wipe those laws off the books. But there is plenty of evidence that some would be pleased to extract their teeth, remove the heart, and take out the bowels.

One immediate objective of this war party seems to be an assault upon the Securities and Exchange Commission. Here is an administrative body, created so few years ago that much of its effort must necessarily still be of a pioneering character. It is clothed with authority to interpret and administer a very substantial mass of law, generally yet to be passed upon by any court. The magnitude and importance of its task ought to be apparent to any person. The scope of its work is as great as that of any other governmental agency and its importance might perhaps exceed that of any other if it were not for current international conditions and matters of defense. The investigations it has conducted and the disclosures it has made have added the most important volumes ever written to American financial history. Its readiness to seek the views and to confer with those interested surpasses, in this observer's experience, that of any other administrative board, state or national, although its spirit of cooperation has not permitted it to adopt their views, if they proved contrary to public interest, which, unfortunately, is the only kind of cooperation that some people care about. It does seem as if, with every increase in that body's efficiency and accomplishment, the spleen and venom of those attacking it rises more than proportionately.

My interest in these matters is a long-time one. It started when more than 30 years ago several investment companies came into New England. They were simple and crude as compared with the companies of more recent years, some of which have been referred to; but they were about as unsound and had somewhat similar methods of high-pressure salesmanship, and by the time they had operated for a year or two, they had taken some hundreds of thousands of dollars from unsuspecting New Englanders. It became my duty, with others, to try and save 15 or 20 cents of the dollar of investors' money when the crash came. That experience and others since that time enabled me to see and learn things which I have never forgotten; and which have prevented me from losing interest in the matter of securities, good or bad; that interest and the consequent desire for bona fide protective laws and faithful administration of them have never been influenced by any political consideration.

There is not time for me to discuss Frothingham's all-embracing charges, one by one, much as I should like to; but this I cannot pass: He says that the "New Deal has arrayed class against class." Many people maintain that in a democracy there are no classes; and I wouldn't be so unkind as to ask the speaker to define his classes and to state who compose them. If there is any arraying of class against class today it would seem to me as if the militant investment bankers are the ones who are trying to do it. More than 4 months ago the president of the association announced that a decision had been reached "to inaugurate a Nation-wide program of public information"; it was further designated as a program "to curb the rapidly expanding power of the S. E. C." They are traveling around the country making speeches; and I am waiting to read or hear one which is more specific, more reasonable and reasoning, and more unlike a mere partisan and political appeal to defeat the present administration than is Frothingham's.

They seem likely to array class against class. In one class will be such investment bankers as they are able to convince that they are acting wisely and that their course is justified, together with the friends they may enlist under that banner. The other class will be composed of several groups; one will consist of a few million persons who have beautifully engraved stock certificates at home, with little value except as old paper, and who realize that their loss would have been avoided if at the time of purchase there had been a Securities and Exchange Commission and the laws which it administers; another group will consist of another few million persons who are fortunate enough to have, at home or in their safe-deposit box, certificates which have real value, and who appreciate, as the country's most conservative financial paper pointed out not long ago, that thanks to the Securities and Exchange Commission and its activities they now really know something about their stocks or bonds and the corporations which issued them—which they never did in the old days; a third group will be made up of even more millions, some having, some not having, certificates at home, but all knowing, as consumers, that everyone who eats bread and wears clothes and rides in trains and automobiles is now interested in the matter of securities, because corporate development embraces the production and distribution of necessities of life and their prices depend among other things on matters of corporate capitalization; hence knowing also that a useful and capable Securities and Exchange Commission, which is required to govern such things, should continue, with effective laws for it to enforce.

These groups and others which may be added realize that it required a wait of more than 30 years and the coming of a New Deal to bring about the enactment of really protective securities laws and the creation of an efficient tribunal to administer them. They are intelligent enough to know that those laws may need some correction and amendment, for they are still comparatively new statutes. But they are also wise enough to know that the task should be assigned to real friends—not turned over to a wrecking crew.

OF

HON. USHER L. BURDICK

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 19, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE DETROIT FREE PRESS

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Detroit Free Press:

CONSCRIPTION

The Free Press is in favor of universal military service through selective draft if, as, and when such conscription is deemed necessary to the proper defense of this Nation.

We feel, however, that it should only be enacted when the issues are so clearly presented that there is no question in the public mind as to its advisability. The people should not be stampeded into such a program by hysterical oratory or political claptrap.

If there is any real danger they are entitled to know about it.

They should be told whom they are to fight, for what purpose they are to fight, and where.

They should know the consequences of such action.

They should know that once in the Army, they waive their right to reason and must obey orders.

If we are to declare war against Germany, it should be fully explained to them why that declaration is made.

We declared war against Germany in 1917 because of deliberately overt acts of that nation against this Nation, a series of violations of our neutrality climaxed by the sinking of the Lusitania.

To date the Nazi Government has carefully avoided making any of those Hohenzollern mistakes, as far as the United States is concerned, with the obvious studied purpose to keep us out of it.

If it persists in this technique we have but one means of getting into the European struggle: That is by what military authorities call a "preventive war."

Such wars are fought, not because there is any immediate cause for a break between nations, but because one feels that the policies of another are of such a nature that they are fundamentally hostile to its long-range interests. Such a war is fought to stamp out a danger before it is allowed to grow. Thus the Crimean War was a preventive war on the part of Great Britain. When Russia sought to reach the Straits of the Dardanelles, Great Britain felt that her life line to the East was threatened and so went to war.

In our own case, any war that we might declare in the upholding of the Monroe Doctrine against any foreign country would be a preventive war—a protection against a potential threat.

In this connection, Walter Lippmann, who was very close to Woodrow Wilson, gives a piece of unwritten history in a recent article. He declares that President Wilson reached his determination to declare war against the Kaiser in the belief that the United States could not afford to see Great Britain defeated.

If that was his purpose, as Mr. Lippmann contends, he did not use it as a pretext. He bided his time until, by Germany's overt acts, he had some degree of solidarity of public opinion behind him. Then he used the aggressions as the logical reasons for asking Congress to make a declaration.

The real issue—always avoided—then is: Shall we declare war against Germany for the purpose of helping England as a protective measure for ourselves—in the sincere belief that we as a nation cannot live in the same world with a triumphant Nazi Government?

That is the only question. It is never brought clearly into focus. The talk of measures "short of war" is merely subterfuge. It is an inching process to prepare the public mind for what some sincere and patriotic citizens believe is the inevitable course.

The people, however, must understand that once we have been launched on this program of preventive war, there is no turning back to the doctrine of George Washington of keeping out of European entanglements.

We must take our place as a world power, take a vital part in the affairs of Europe, act as a police force, if needs be, to maintain Great Britain whenever she is threatened. This we did in the last war and this we are asked to do again.

We will be definitely committed to the business of power politics.

That may be a destiny we cannot escape as the greatest creditor Nation the world has ever known.

It may be that we will still be able to keep aloof and look after our own peculiar interests.

Time alone can determine such a tremendous question.

Meanwhile we should not be led blindly through deliberately excited emotions to take a step that will forever change the course of our lives and our children's lives.

We have a right to know where we are being led before we start.

Conscription for national defense; yes.

Conscription for nebulous, half-articulated programs with no clarity of purpose and no coherent outline of principle; no.

The people have a right to know first in which direction this Nation is headed.

EDITORIAL FROM THE MILWAUKEE HERALD-CITIZEN

Mr. BOLLES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include therein an editorial from the Herald-Citizen, Milwaukee, Wis., a Catholic paper of the archdiocese of Milwaukee, as follows:

No American citizen should fail properly to evaluate some of the proposals for national defense that certain well-meaning individuals are sponsoring. Such, for instance, is the Burke-Wadsworth conscription bill as now drawn, which, to a certain degree, undermines one of the pillars of our democratic form of government—freedom of religion.

The enactment of such a law would deprive citizens of the United States of a right guaranteed them by the Constitution. The Constitution in guaranteeing this right, likewise necessarily guaranteed the means necessary effectively to exercise this right, namely, that there be available at all times ministers of religion to care for their spiritual needs. Depriving persons of the means necessary to exercise a right that is theirs is equivalent to depriving them of that right, since a right without the means to exercise it is valueless.

In 1917 the Congress of the United States recognized this right and exempted all ministers of religion and divinity students from military service. The present proposed law is a leaf out of the book of the dictators and is alien to the spirit of a democratic nation. No one denies the necessity of training men for the defense of the Nation, but it is likewise necessary to train students for the ministry and the priesthood in order that the citizens of the Nation may have ministers of religion available to care for their spiritual needs, which right the Constitution guarantees them. The citizens in the land and naval forces of the United States, like all others, need the spiritual care that ministers of religion alone can give them. At no time in the history of the Nation have the various religious denominations failed to provide chaplains for the men in the service of the Nation. Seeing that the Constitution of the United States is nowise changed in this respect, the right that was recognized in 1917 should be recognized in 1940.

The Selective Draft Act of 1917 also exempted all brothers who had taken solemn vows to dedicate their lives to the service of God. This, too, was in perfect accord with the spirit and intention of the founders of the Nation, as manifested in the Declaration of Independence. These brave, noble men, whose thoughts scanned the whole fabric of God's creation in the world in which we dwell, studied the laws of nature, and of nature's God; appealed to the Supreme Judge of the world to bear witness to the rectitude of their intentions, and proclaimed their firm reliance on the protection of Divine Providence.

To enact now a law contrary to the principles enunciated in the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution would be to go backward; would be a return to the tyranny of a government that refused to recognize that "all men are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights," which the founders of the Nation declared "to be self-evident"; would be to jettison all for which these patriots lived, labored, and sacrified.

In order to preserve for himself and posterity the free exercise of the inalienable rights the patriots who established the Nation secured for him, every religious American should request his Senators and his Congressmen jealously to safeguard the rights of his constituents by seeing that exemption is granted to all ministers of religion, to all students for the ministry and the priesthood, and likewise to those others, who by solemn vows have dedicated their lives to the service of that God, to whom, as the Supreme Judge of the world, the illustrious Father of the Nation appealed to bear witness to the "rectitude of their intention," and "on the protection of" whose Providence they proclaimed their "reliance." That posterity might never forget all this they caused to be impressed on the currency of the land "In God we trust."

By doing this you will stop this first subtle attack on religious freedom, the cornerstone of democracy, and without which no democratic nation can endure. Let your Representatives know that on this point you stand with Washington and the other patriots of '76, and not with some of the modern sages, who seem to think that the Nation no longer has any need of the protection of Divine Providence, on which the founders of the Nation relied.

RESOLUTIONS OF SECOND OREGON REUNION ASSOCIATION

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include some resolutions adopted by the Second Oregon Reunion Association, Sunday, August 11, 1940. The resolutions follow:

RESOLUTION NO. 1

Whereas laws which will provide for the conscription of all wealth, labor, and property with proper compensation, as well as the young manpower of the Nation, for the service of the Government of the United States of America in time of war would be eminently just and fair and would result in causing all our citizens serving our country in time of war on a basis of fairness and equality, would prevent profiteering, and would make it impossible for a part of our people to remain at home in safety while the young men of the Nation are compelled to undergo the dangers of battle, the hardships of the march and the trenches for the small pay of the soldier; and

Whereas these proposed laws have been endorsed by the Second Oregon Volunteer Infantry Reunion Association at their annual reunions continuously since 1925; and

Whereas such laws would strengthen the hands of the Government and enable it to prosecute the war with a greatly increased measure of efficiency and would place behind the Government the unanimous moral force of a nation determined to make right prevail by force of arms; and

Whereas laws are now before Congress and will probably be passed providing for a limited conscription of young men for the Army with a degree of selective service; and

Whereas these laws seem necessary for the present emergency and we urge the adoption of some form of selective conscription now and without delay, yet we realize that such laws are only temporary measures and do not reach the heart of the need for universal conscription in time of war: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Second Oregon Volunteer Infantry Reunion Association this 11th day of August 1940 strongly reaffirm our endorsement of the true spirit of these resolutions and urge upon our National Congress and the President of the United States to enact and approve a fair and equitable universal conscription law to go into effect upon the declaration of war which will draft all manpower, wealth, and labor without any reservations whatsoever as to race, color, occupation, wealth, or social position; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be sent to each of the Oregon Senators and Representatives in Congress, to the President of the United States, and to each of our prominent local newspapers for publication.

Col. PERCY WILLIS, President.
RICHARD DEICH, Secretary.

AUGUST 11, 1940.

RESOLUTION NO. II

Whereas a state of great unrest exists throughout the world; and

Whereas certain totalitarian states have repeatedly violated treaty obligations; and

Whereas the leaders of some of these states have, by their actions, proved that their solemn promises are of no value whatsoever and no longer to be trusted; and

Whereas the democratic countries of the world have proved that they are the only countries where truth and honor are observed among nations; and

Whereas the United States of America and the British Commonwealth of nations are the only nations on earth where freedom of speech, the rights of conscience, and liberty of the press remain to the people, and,

Whereas the British Commonwealth is now engaged in a death struggle for freedom; and

Whereas if the British should lose the contest, the United States of America would remain the only champion of liberty on earth: Therefore be it

Resolved by the veterans of the Second Oregon Volunteer Infantry of the Spanish War and Philippine Insurrection, at their annual reunion in Laurelhurst Park, Portland, Oreg., August 11, 1940, That it is our firm conviction that it is the solemn duty of the Congress of the United States to enact the necessary laws and for the Executive authority to see that they are carried out, that will bring to the people of the United States of America armed security on land and sea, in the air and under the sea. To that end, we demand a two-ocean navy with fleets in the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, capable of engaging successfully at the same time the fleets of any other nation with which they might have to engage in combat. We demand the largest and best air force in the world, and we demand a thoroughly trained and disciplined army, fully equipped with the latest and best cannons, rifles, tanks, mechanized transportation and sufficiently large to defend the Western Hemisphere and preserve the Monroe Doctrine.

We commend the present Congress and Executive for what they have done to prepare our Nation for defense and demand that the measures already initiated be prosecuted with the utmost vigor, so that we may become adequately prepared at the earliest practicable date.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress, to the President of the United States, to the Secretaries of War and Navy, and to our local newspapers for publication.

August 11, 1940.

Col. PERCY WILLIS, President.
RICHARD DEICH, Secretary.

RESOLUTION NO. III

Whereas the Congress of the United States, recognizing the justice of the claim of the Spanish American War Veterans of 1898, who served for many months after their own term of enlistment had expired in the Philippine Islands, for travel pay and subsistence promised them at the time for their said services; and

Whereas the rights of these veterans are set forth in the act of May 2, 1940, known as Public No. 505, Seventy-sixth Congress, in which said act it is provided among other things that the General Accounting Office shall verify said claims for travel pay and certify same to Congress for payment; and

Whereas the veterans entitled to this travel pay are rapidly passing away, and it is imperative that said claims should be paid as soon as practicably possible so that as many of those still living might enjoy these benefits in this world: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Second Oregon Volunteers, in reunion assembled, in Laurelhurst Park, Portland Oreg., this 11th day of August, 1940, forty-one years after said claims were due and payable, request our representatives in Congress to expedite in every possible way the payment of these claims by providing funds or seeing that funds are provided for the payment of these claims as rapidly as they have been proven and certified for payment; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded immediately to our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Wanted: Businessmen in a Pinch

OF
HON. KARL M. LECOMPTE
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 19, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE CRESTON (IOWA) NEWS-ADVERTISER

Mr. LECOMPTE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Creston (Iowa) News-Advertiser of August 6, 1940:

[From the Creston (Iowa) News-Advertiser of August 6, 1940]

WANTED: BUSINESSMEN IN A PINCH

Merle Thorp, in Nation's Business, calls attention to the need—fully recognized by the administration—for businessmen when a real job and a real danger confronts the Nation, and he is right. It became necessary to call business out of the dog house when the pinch arrived.

For 8 years our business system and businessmen have been under attack. Bankers were "money changers"; commercial aviation was charged as "unfit to carry the mails"; makers of electricity, a "Power Trust bleeding the people white"; manufacturers, "chiselers and exploiters of labor"; coal and oil, "antisocial"; steel and chemicals, "fomenters of war"; retailers, "gougers"; telephones and insurance, "too big for public safety."

Every hour brought its "emergency." Perpetual motion through muckraking has been the rule.

The era has been one of iconoclasm. Age-old traditions, honored customs, cherished idols, have been smashed with the ruthlessness and hilarity of a frenzied Roman holiday.

Came then, first, the morning after, the feeling of futility coupled with shame. The promises of politics were unfulfilled. The crusade against "selfishness" and "power" simply transferred those vices to the crusaders. Politics was unable to provide jobs except to politicians and their relatives. The abundant life was nowhere in evidence except in the District of Columbia, city halls, and the far-flung Federal agencies. Shame-faced, people were about ready to admit that business processes had been unduly and spitefully penalized.

Came then fear of a foreign invader. The clear mandate of the people was to provide defense, and business leaders were whistled from the dog house and put in charge.

What irony! If fear of physical violence, of parachutes over Omaha, brought confession that only business management can provide production and jobs, why, then, why the other course in fighting the war against depression? If to regain the business activity for which we all prayed, theorists and social engineers were called to the colors, why, in the hours of physical fear, replace these "depression war" leaders of 1933–40 with the discredited captains of industry?

The spirit of iconoclasm marches on. It now directs a war ax at political traditions. Old formulas are swept aside, and at a national convention the people's demand for a doer and practical planner prevailed. Business baiters have turned to baiting politicians. The people chose a man who, almost alone for 7 years, has, in and out of season, fought politics invading the business field. With some sixth sense they realize that the Blums and Ramsay MacDonalds, who promised security and the abundant life by less work and more doles, only brought a terrible insecurity and prospect of miserable slavery. They realize that every country which has fallen in Europe has enjoyed a "liberal" government.

Business management is in better repute today than it has been in a decade. This spirit is reflected in the popular parody:

"Heigh ho, heigh ho,
It's off to work we go."

A policy of plenty will supplant the theory of Wallace scarcity. This spirit will recognize that textbooks on arithmetic contain methods of addition and multiplication as well as subtraction and division. It will abandon revolutionary reform "to make America over" and adopt recovery with its proved social progress. It will raise again the American banner with its insignia "Work." It will remove the obstacles which are preventing workman and manager from joining hands, and in the good old-fashioned way, lick the production record of yesterday.

It is late, but not too late, to give business a chance to do its old time stuff for the American people, and the Nation has its opportunity. Willkie can put it over.

Senator George Norris Is Worried

OF
HON. EARL C. MICHENER
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 19, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE JACKSON (MICH.) CITIZEN-PATRIOT

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, we all realize that Senator GEORGE W. NORRIS is one of the best-known United States Senators in the country. He has had long service in the House and in the Senate. He is and always has been an optimist, and when Senator NORRIS reaches that stage when worry overtakes him concerning anything that President Roosevelt does, then it is time for the country to stop, look, and listen.

Pursuant to the privilege given me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herein an editorial from the Jackson Citizen-Patriot, of Jackson, Mich., which has the largest daily circulation of any newspaper published in the congressional district which I have the honor to represent, in addition to being one of the outstanding smaller town dailies in the country. The editorial is as follows:

GEORGE NORRIS IS WORRIED

When GEORGE NORRIS begins to see possibilities of a dictatorship in the Roosevelt administration, even the most ardent supporter of the New Deal has cause to take stock and hesitate.

During the course of a speech Monday in which he declared emphatic opposition to peacetime conscription, the veteran Nebraska Senator warned that, "We will have here in United States what we are complaining about in other nations, a dictatorship. I can see no escape."

Coming from NORRIS such a statement has profound significance. He is a close personal friend of President Roosevelt. Throughout the two terms of the present administration he has supported the New Deal on every major issue. More than once he has taken the lead in Roosevelt policies.

But now, "his voice shaking with emotion" (quoting a news-service report), NORRIS visualizes the identical menace which critics of the Roosevelt administration warned against in the Supreme Court controversy. It is the same danger which many Democrats as well as Republicans see in Mr. Roosevelt's effort to obtain reelection for a third term.

GEORGE NORRIS knows the President. He admires him. He most frequently enjoys his confidence and fights on his side. He knows the character of Mr. Roosevelt and whether he is dominated by the type of ambition which is the stuff of dictators. If NORRIS perceives the danger of dictatorship in any circumstance under Mr. Roosevelt, the argument against a third term is definitely reinforced.

1936 All Over Again

OF

HON. HENRY B. STEAGALL

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 19, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE MONTGOMERY (ALA.) ADVERTISER

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Montgomery Advertiser:

[From the Montgomery (Ala.) Advertiser of August 18, 1940]

NINETEEN THIRTY-SIX ALL OVER AGAIN

There is one great issue in the coming Presidential campaign, according to Wendell Willkie, the Republican nominee. It is whether the New Deal can be dealt more economically by the Democratic Party or by the Republican Party. As nominee of the Republican Party, Mr. Willkie is convinced that he and his party can deal it best.

"The New Deal stands for doing what has to be done by spending as much money as possible. I propose to do it by spending as little money as possible. This is one great issue in domestic policy and I propose in this campaign to make it clear," said Mr. Willkie.

So much for the issue upon which Mr. Willkie desires to base the coming campaign. The subject of economical operation of government is one of interminable and often fruitless argument not only between the two great political parties of this Nation but even within them. If Mr. Willkie intends to argue about those details of government before the people of the United States for the next 2½ months, he will only succeed in boring them. The first assumption made about the nominee of either of our two major parties is that they are capable and efficient men. That should be the first assumption made by the electorate concerning any candidate for any office who is ultimately granted the privilege of serving. The United States approves President Roosevelt's administration insofar as the details of that administration are concerned. No valid criticism has ever been made of that management of fiscal affairs. However, upon the matter of policy much criticism has been offered, some valid, some not. If Mr. Willkie has no criticism of that policy but only of the administration of it, then he hasn't raised any issue at all.

As for the rest of Mr. Willkie's speech, it was as depressing a disappointment as his attempt to create an issue that could not be brought to life by the best of miracle workers. The speech fell easily into three general classifications.

1. Political fluff that can be found in any mayor's address to an American Legion convention, any struggling lawyer's address to a southern audience at the cemetery on Memorial Day. Considered alone, this political fluff is worthless, but if it is implemented by a significant offering it is the most valuable aspect of democratic action.

2. Demagogic contradiction of which the Advertiser, as well as many another institution, we suspect, did not believe Mr. Willkie capable until yesterday.

3. The definition of issues, which has already been discussed.

Mr. Wilkie is undoubtedly a sincere patriot. He is as convinced of the rightness of the democratic way of life as any other citizen of this democracy from Franklin Roosevelt on down to the lowest devotee of faith. But in that he differs not one whit from the whole range of adherents of the democratic faith.

Though Mr. Willkie denied that he would allow personalities to enter into his campaign, he made this pointed charge against President Roosevelt: "There have been occasions when many of us have wondered if he is deliberately inciting us to war. * * * And I believe it to be the first duty of a President to try to maintain peace. But Mr. Roosevelt has not done this. He has dabbled in inflammatory statements and manufactured panics. Of course, we in America like to speak our minds freely, but this does not mean that at a critical period in history our President should cause bitterness and confusion for the sake of a little political oratory."

With that charge firmly in mind, it is illuminating to review again these other statements by Mr. Willkie.

"We must admit that the loss of the British Fleet would greatly weaken our defense."

"We must face a brutal, perhaps, a terrible fact. Our way of life is in competition with Hitler's way of life."

"I promise, by returning to those same American principles that overcame German autocracy once before, both in business and in war, to outdistance Hitler in any contest he chooses in 1940 or after. And I promise that when we beat him we shall beat him on our own terms, in our own American way."

Thus Mr. Willkie places himself in the strangely contradictory position of indicting President Roosevelt for making inflammatory statements (about which Mr. Willkie is politically vague as to date and time of utterance) and then he tries to go President Roosevelt one better in acknowledging the danger which faces the United States, in excoriating the author of that danger, Adolf Hitler as leader of the German people. Mr. Willkie even promises to "beat" Germany in 1940 if given a chance, but condemns President Roosevelt for creating a "manufactured panic" about the dangers facing the Nation. By implication, Mr. Willkie charges that President Roosevelt would lead us into war for his own political designs, but Mr. Willkie would "beat" Hitler on our "own terms" in 1940 if the electorate of the United States will only discard their present warmongering President and elect Mr. Willkie.

Mr. Willkie was the Advertiser's candidate for the Republican nomination. In assuming that position, the Advertiser was not acting in a shrewdly partisan manner. Frankly the Advertiser was disappointed yesterday when it discovered that it had picked a dud. But this much must be said in apology for the error. Mr. Willkie was a dud among duds. Every other candidate for the Republican nomination had hung himself upon the public tree of intellectual incompetence. Mr. Willkie presented nothing but hope. He has made a fine record both as a lawyer (for corporations) and a corporation manager. He is still a good and sincere man. As much could be said for his disappointed rival, Senator ROBERT TAFT. But he is an inadequate political philosopher. He only claims, rather brashly, that he can do what President Roosevelt is doing better than President Roosevelt is doing it.

It looked for a time as if the outcome of the Presidential election would be decided principally upon the development of the situation in Europe. Now that Mr. Willkie's keynote address has been delivered, it is apparent that it will be decided on the same issues which were presented to the electorate in 1936. Perhaps this time Maine and Vermont will see the light, too.

As One Democrat to Another

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 19, 1940

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, many will recall that eminent Democrat, John O'Connor, of New York, who, until "purged" at the last election by President Roosevelt and his Communist allies, was chairman of the Rules Committee of the House of Representatives and one of the outstanding Democratic Members of that body.

Because Congressman O'Connor of New York had opinions of his own and refused to be a messenger boy for the President, the President enlisted the aid of the Communists in O'Connor's district in New York and so caused his defeat.

O'Connor is again a candidate, and the issue in his district seems to be squarely drawn as to whether that district prefers a Democrat who believes in constitutional government or whether its voters will once more do the will of the President and of the Communists of New York.

You may recall that Senator CARTER GLASS of Virginia, another lifelong Democrat, once said that the New Deal was not only a mistake but that it was a disgrace to the Nation, and that the time would come when we would be ashamed of having wandered so far from the dictates of common sense and common honesty.

Mr. O'Connor, in a recent letter to the Governor of Indiana, expresses a similar thought. I here quote his letter:

AUGUST 15, 1940.

Hon. M. CLIFFORD TOWNSEND,
Executive Department, Indianapolis, Ind.

MY DEAR GOVERNOR: Permit me to thank you for your courteous letter in which you extoll "our beloved President Roosevelt" and state "we do not feel it wise to change farm hands during the harvest." I note that you also refer to the President as "a symbol of democracy."

Few persons who have been close to the President during the past 12 years, at least, will subscribe to the descriptive word "beloved." They feel that he, like Ceasar, broke with his best friends as a matter of principle. The roll is long, headed by Farley and including Al Smith, Garner, Moley, Tugwell, Woodring, General Johnson, Louis Johnson, Douglas, Hanes, Reed, Ely, Senator Johnson of California, all the "purgees," and countless others, not forgetting the long list of distinguished Democrats he promised to make Vice President, viz, Bankhead, Rayburn, Jones, Stark, Lee, Byrnes, Lucas, your own McNutt, etc. His Cabinet does not contain a real Democrat except Hull, who, like Farley, has been treated shamefully.

As to changing farm hands during a harvest, I'll wager your farmers never hesitated to do so if the crop was in danger. Millions of Americans, even if you count the Democrats alone, feel our crop, our country, is in danger if we use the same hands for another 4 years. Our fundamental institutions of government, already undermined, will be lost, never to return. We shall be plunged into a foreign war surely after the election, if not before, which is my guess. Actual acknowledged dictatorship will be with us. We have it now, but it is camouflaged.

I agree with the statement of President Roosevelt as uttered to the Young Democrats on April 21, 1940:

"Whatever may be the platform, whoever may be the nominee of the Democratic Party * * * the basic issue will be the retention of popular government."

Such a "retention" is impossible if the tradition against a third term is successfully violated and we have 4 more years of a political philosophy evidenced by such acts as the recognition of Russia, packing the Supreme Court, the dictatorial reorganization bill of 1938, the "purge," etc.

Note that in his message to Congress on March 4, 1939, President Roosevelt said:

"The safety of the system of representative democracy is, in the last analysis, based on two essentials: First, that at frequent periods the voters must choose a new Congress and a new President; and second, that this choice must be made freely; that is to say, without any undue force against or influence over the voter in the exercise of his personal and sincere opinion."

Shades of Chicago, the W. P. A., etc.

You have hit the nail on the head, however, in your reference to the President being "a symbol of democracy." But it is the "democracy" of Stalin. The word, like "liberalism," has been brought into common and incorrect usage by the President and the "pinks" who surround him. The Communists here and abroad support that kind of democracy. Our forefathers abhorred it.

The United States never was a democracy in the sense in which that word is used today.

Madison wrote, "a democracy is one where the citizens administer the government in person. A republic is a form of government in which the scheme of representation takes place."

There is no mention of democracy in the Constitution of the United States nor in the constitution of Indiana. The debates prove it was deliberately eliminated from the former.

Our Constitution, article IV, section 4, states:

"The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government."

Again, Madison wrote in volume XIV of the Federalist of the danger of confusing the words "republic" and "democracy."

Our official United States Army Manual refers to democracy as "the rule of the mob."

The Democratic Party, to which I have always belonged, has repeatedly supported our republican form of government.

Mr. Chief Justice Fuller in Duncan v. McCall (139 U. S. 449):

"By the Constitution, a republican form of government is guaranteed to every State in the Union, and the distinguishing feature of that form is the right of the people to choose their own officers for governmenal administration, and pass their own laws in virtue of the legislative power reposed in representative bodies, whose legitimate act may be said to be those of the people themselves; but while the people are thus the source of political power, their governments, National and State, have been limited by written constitutions, and they have themselves thereby set bounds to their own power, as against the sudden impulses of mere majorities."

This must refer even to a majority of 62 percent, as in 1936, which, under the Constitution, was no mandate for the purge. There is no legislature in "democratic" Russia, which has any representative power. If the democracy prated about here, means the same as the democracy of Stalin, our legislative branch will soon be prorogued. There are signs already in the direction that the Executive may adjourn them (the Congress) to such time as he shall think proper, as he has the power to do, in certain circumstances, under article II, section 2, of the Constitution. He would have liked to have done it this summer, when he said there was no need for Congress to stay in session, except to make speeches.

You will surely recall that Plato said:

"The people have always some champion whom they set over them and nurse into greatness. This and no other is the root from which a tyrant springs; when he first appears, he is a protector."

Page Hitler and other "protectors" turned dictators!

The American people have always agreed with the statement of President Roosevelt as to "frequent" elections.

Andrew Jackson could not subscribe to the "indispensability" of any one man—an idea sincerely entertained by President Roosevelt as applied to himself. Jackson said that the duties of public officers "are so plain and simple that men of intelligence may readily qualify themselves for their performance" and that "more is lost by the long continuance of man in office than is generally to be gained by their experience."

For the first time, in 1940, our party platform uses the word "democracy." In our platform of 1936, the reference was to "a representative government."

How did all this change, or confusion of words, come about? Is it because we have officially recognized and dealt with "democratic" Russia? Is it because we have imported from the ex-Communist and now "democratic" Russia, many of its ideologies?

Witness the constant repetition by the President and his entourage that the present European war is one to preserve "democracy."

If "democracy" really means our form of government, when were those European nations—yes, including France—ever "democracies"? Has the British Empire ever been a "democracy"? Is it now really fighting to preserve "democracy," as we are repeatedly told, or rather is it solely concerned with preserving the British Empire intact so it may continue its "democracy" in India, etc., for instance?

Let's get back to the lexicon of our fathers. They builded well because they were not demagogues. They would never have openly accepted the support of the Communists in the elections.

The Democratic Party should continue to stand for the "republican form of government," guaranteed to us and enjoyed by us for 150 years before the New Deal, which, to a great extent, represents the "democracy" of Stalin.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN O'CONNOR.

Because your letter to me was given to the press, I shall feel free to release this reply.

Notification Address of Hon. Joseph W. Martin, Jr.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EARL C. MICHENER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 19, 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. JOSEPH W. MARTIN, JR., OF MASSACHUSETTS

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the privilege heretofore granted, I include in this extension of remarks the splendid notification address delivered by our minority leader, the Honorable JOSEPH W. MARTIN, JR., at Elwood, Ind., August 17, 1940:

Mr. Willkie, we are here to carry out an old American custom—to notify you officially that you were chosen by the Republican Party in its national convention at Philadelphia on June 28 as its candidate for the Presidency of the United States. I hope it will not come as too great a surprise.

This custom originated in the time when men had to travel long distances on horseback actually to carry the first tidings of a nomination to the candidate. It may seem to some in these headlong days that a custom of this kind is outmoded, but others believe it is well for the Nation to continue to cling to some of its traditions.

As chairman of the committee of notification, it is my honor and pleasure to bring you the enthusiastic greetings of the great Republican Party.

Your nomination at Philadelphia did not come from any scheming clique of political bosses. It did not come from any group of conspirators anxious to retain their control of the Government for selfish purposes. Your nomination was the result of a Nation-wide demand of a great people anxious about their own future and that of their Government.

They had seen this country drifting toward bankruptcy, inflation, and perhaps war. They had seen experiment after experiment fail. All called for huge appropriations, but none brought the security or the happiness which were promised.

Ten million men and women begged for a chance to earn their livelihood in the American way. Millions of young men and young women pleaded for a chance for a regular job; for the opportunities which their fathers and their mothers had been blessed with. Year after year passed without those opportunities being presented. Little hope for the future was held forth; indeed, those who presumed to speak for the administration frankly stated that unemployment and distress had come to stay.

This philosophy of despair and defeat was not welcomed by the American people. It was not the spirit of the real American tamely to accept defeat. The people turned to seek a new leader; one with capacity to do big things; one who knew the many interests involved and the different problems confronting the Nation at home and abroad; one who could rise above narrow partisanship and petty prejudices; one who could put the welfare of this country first.

They saw in you such a man. Born in humble circumstances, you have risen through your own efforts to a commanding position because of your ability to do things well; you have proved yourself an able man, a sincere man; one who is broad and liberal enough to give every man and every woman sheltered under the American flag equal justice and equal opportunity.

Thus you have been selected to save America and lead our country back along the road to recovery and better days. Out of the hearts of these patriotic Americans came the chant, "We want Willkie." Louder and louder came the call. An unbossed convention listened. A deliberative group of delegates acted. You became the nominee of a convention which selected you in the traditional American way.

No one can say you do not represent a free choice by the people.

This campaign of 1940 is vastly more significant and important than an ordinary election contest between two political parties. It is a contest between the forces of constitutional government and liberty and those influences which are moving steadily toward government by men instead of by laws in the United States of America.

We need not remind you that great fundamental issues are at stake in this contest. The fate of the free Republic established by the founding fathers at Philadelphia when they wrote the Constitution hangs in the balance.

The revered tradition that no President shall seek a third term has been assailed by men burning with an insatiable lust for power. It is our grave responsibility to see that the effort is defeated. We must not take a dangerous step, a step which may well lead to dictatorship.

The Republican Party rejoices that in you it has provided the Nation with a man who is preeminently qualified to meet the requirements of this critical period. It rejoices that your nomination has been enthusiastically acclaimed by Independents, Jeffersonian Democrats, Progressives, Liberals, and Republicans alike. You are not the hope of one political party; you are the hope of a majority of the American people. They want you boldly to lead this great fight, this battle to perpetuate free government in this land of liberty, to restore equal justice, opportunities, and jobs to the American people; to keep this country safe and secure from attacks within and without our boundaries.

May God bless you and strengthen you for the momentous work that lies ahead.

Elect Mr. Willkie

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1940

EDITORIALS FROM THE BALTIMORE SUN

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, the Baltimore Sun is known throughout the country as a publication devoted to the welfare of the people of the United States. It has always supported the fundamental principles of our Government and is known as an independent Democratic newspaper. It vigorously supported Mr. Roosevelt in 1932 and has as vigorously opposed the President's attempts through packing of the Supreme Court and other acts to destroy our tripartite system of government.

Believing the editorial appearing in the issue of Monday, August 19, 1940, entitled "Elect Mr. Willkie" together with the front-page editorial in the same issue will contribute much to the understanding of the issues involved in this campaign, I offer them for the RECORD. They are as follows:

In this campaign Mr. Roosevelt stands for improvisations which have failed. Mr. Willkie stands for a principle which has produced abundant success over the generations. It is the principle which was embodied in the Democratic platform of 1932—the principle on which Mr. Roosevelt first was elected—the principle which he theatrically abandoned almost immediately after taking office.

Mr. Roosevelt had the misfortune to pass under the influence of pseudo intellectuals who thought that American opportunity was disappearing. For example, in the beginning of his administration in 1933 Washington was filled with people whose favorite patter was that "the frontiers have disappeared." Because the horizontal geographical frontiers of the West had disappeared, they argued that abundant opportunity for men in a new land had disappeared. Government, therefore, had to take charge of the affairs of Americans who had passed into a limited, restricted era; government had to organize the means of living.

In the thinking of these pseudo intellectuals, in the thinking which they imposed upon Mr. Roosevelt, there were no vertical frontiers still to be sought and conquered by bold and strong men. The upward, ever-retreating frontiers of the chemist, the engineer, the mechanic, had no place in the blueprints of these pseudo intellectuals who were favoring government with their supervisory attentions. Inventions and ventures, new industries, new employment, these were given scant thought.

The living symbol of the psuedo intellectuals, dreaming of a new, managed order, was Harry L. Hopkins, a social worker, not another Thomas A. Edison or another Henry Ford. It did not occur to them that one great, competitive, creative mechanic of Ford's type or Edison's does more to reduce human toil and suffering, more to enlarge human horizons, more to enrich human experience, than all the social workers who ever have been born into the world or ever will be born.

To this sterile conception of Mr. Hopkins as the symbol of the future, add Mr. Roosevelt's love of novelty. Add his dislike of men who have been notably successful in their ventures and have accumulated means. The result is hasty, misdirected improvisations that have caused the longest period of stagnation in new enterprises the country has known; the largest pool of permanent unemployment; the heaviest burden of Federal taxes; and a runaway national debt.

If you wish to know what Mr. Willkie offers in substitution for Mr. Roosevelt's failure, go read Mr. Roosevelt's speeches when he was first seeking the Presidency.

Go read the Democratic platform of 1932—a statement of historic liberalism—and the speeches Mr. Roosevelt made before and after his nomination. Go read what Mr. Roosevelt said before he was surrounded by pattering, chattering, pseudo-intellectuals and was pursuaded to turn the great somersault of 1933, his first year in office. Mr. Roosevelt is not a profound thinker, but he is an able speaker and skilled in exposition. In 1932 he made speeches which stand today as unanswerable arguments why he should be turned out of office and Mr. Willkie should be elected President of the United States.

It is not a complicated principle—this principle of historic liberalism. Government keeps order, of course, and acts as an umpire. Government lays down rules for a fair and free game of life and effort, and it adjusts these rules to changing social conditions. Government undertakes certain services which experience has proved that it can perform more adequately than private citizens—for example, public health, public education—and here, too, it adjusts itself to changing conditions.

But, in the historic liberal principle, government is forbidden to place paternalistic restraint upon the energies and enterprises of the people. Historic liberalism assumes that there is no limit to human desires, and no limit to human growth and achievement by which the desires are gratified. It assumes that growth and achievement will not come from precedent-ridden bureaucrats, whether they be recruited from politicians or from college faculties. It assumes that growth and achievement proceed from the imagination and the energy of spirited, ambitious men in every walk of life.

That is the principle which Mr. Willkie offers in place of Mr. Roosevelt's broken-down theory that Americans must be managed in their affairs by the Government. This principle, offered by Mr. Willkie in an hour of domestic failure and of foreign menace, is the principle upon which our fathers erected the greatest material civilization and the freest political civilization ever known on this earth. The Sun, an independent Democratic newspaper, will support Mr. Willkie with all its strength, precisely as it supported Mr. Roosevelt when he stood upon this principle in 1932.

ELECT MR. WILLKIE

The safety of this country requires the defeat of Mr. Roosevelt and the election of Mr. Willkie to the Presidency.

Mr. Rocsevelt stands for failure. His administration is a morass. The affairs of the Government itself are in a condition of confusion, disorder, and grave danger. The business of the country is in a condition of doubt, fear, and stagnation. And Mr. Roosevelt's failure in deeds has proceeded from a greater failure in spirit. He has lacked faith in the great American tradition of self-reliance, venture, and achievement. He has lacked faith that Americans could achieve for themselves in the present and the future as they have achieved in all the generations behind them.

Consequently he has appropriated to the Government an ever-enlarging task of managing the affairs of the people. But even there he has failed. He had no clear conception of a paternalistic system. The result is that, while accumulating the back-breaking load of taxes and debt that is to be expected of a paternalistic government, he has produced few of the compensations in regimented discipline and production that are the fruits of accepted, well-ordered paternalism. And, of course, the historic American system has been undermined and partially paralyzed.

The condition in which the Government and the country find themselves would require a change of administration in any circumstances. In this day of world crisis and of swiftly gathering menace to the very security of the Nation, a change in administration is vital, imperative. Restoration of order and full release of the energies of the American people are necessary now, not only for renewal of sound and advancing prosperity. Order and release of the full energies of the people are necessary if we are to gird ourselves against a possible foreign foe.

Mr. Willkie is everything that Mr. Roosevelt is not. He is a man of faith—of faith in the strength, the courage, the capacity for achievement of the people. Himself the product of American opportunity, himself the demonstration of the reality of that opportunity, himself the symbol of a free man's achievement under the historic American system, Mr. Willkie offers not the scant, illusory security of a debt-supported paternalism. He offers the solid security, at home and abroad, that is to be created by self-reliant men who produce and who pay their bills.

FINANCIAL FAILURE

The condition of the public finances alone compels a change in administration. When Mr. Roosevelt first sought office, Federal taxes stood at $2,005,000,000. In 7 years his administration has lifted them to $5,924,000,000 a year. But so great have been his expenditures that this immense increase in Federal taxes was not nearly enough. He has been forced to borrow immensely. The Federal debt stood at $19,487,000,000 when he first sought office. Today, it stands at $43,842,000,000, which approaches double the peak of the war debt. All of this is apart from the cost of the new armament program, which already calls for $10,000,000,000.

Facing this condition, Mr. Roosevelt has thrown up his hands. He no longer discusses public finance. When he first ran in 1932, he promised a reduction in Federal expenditures of 25 percent and a Budget annually balanced. Instead, he inaugurated his program of vast expenditures. But when he ran the second time in 1936, he again promised a balanced Budget, with reduction of the national debt. Instead, he again enlarged expenditures and increased debt. Now, in 1940, neither his personally dictated platform nor his speech of acceptance has a single word on the subject of the Budget or the debt. He has confessed himself helpless. He no longer dares even to promise.

Failure to correct the condition in the public finances which Mr. Roosevelt has caused, and before which he stands in helpless silence, will lead straight to disaster for the masses of this country.

RUNAWAY DEBT

If this remains a free country, men will retain the power they always have had to place their own valuation upon the Government's bonds. And if they retain this power, the time will come when a runaway Federal debt will result in a sudden slide in the price that will be allowed for these bonds. That is the plain lesson of history. That is the plain lesson of common sense. Free men, men possessed of control over their own money, their own goods, their own labor, will not indefinitely accept at par bonds which are part of a runaway debt. The point at which they suddenly refuse can never be forecast. But it always has been reached. It always will be reached.

Let that point be reached in the runaway debt which Mr. Roosevelt has created, and every bank in this country will be in distress, for every bank is now loaded with the Government's bonds. In that hour, the Government's guaranty of bank deposits will be of scant value. For the strength behind the guaranty is the Government's credit, and that will have been undermined by the collapse in the value of the Government's bonds. In the same way that deposits will have been stricken, insurance policies will have been stricken, for the insurance companies are loaded with the bonds of the Government. Depositors and policyholders will be paid in pieces of paper of swiftly diminishing purchasing power.

The alternative, if the runaway debt is allowed to go its course under the now silent and helpless Mr. Roosevelt, will be some form of dictation of the value of the Government's bonds. In Germany and Italy there is such a system now. The value of a bond of the German or Italian Government is what the Government declares it to be. And there is a policeman available, or a soldier, to see that the citizen delivers his money or his goods or his labor at the value prescribed by the Government for its obligations. That, of course is the end of freedom. It is the end of a man's rights in his property or his toil. It undoes the work of patriots from 1776 to this day.

BEWILDERED POLICY MAKING

But Mr. Roosevelt's calamitous, and now helpless, handling of the public finances is not the beginning nor the end of his errors.

In his entire 7 years in office, he has never had a definite conception of fundamental economic policy. The economy of this country has always been based on free enterprise, on competitive capitalism. Mr. Roosevelt says he believes in free enterprise. And certainly he has never offered the people, boldly and concretely, any other system. Not any of the varied forms of socialism, and not any form of state capitalism. But, professing from time to time his undying allegiance to free enterprise as good in itself and as the economic foundation of political freedom, he has missed few opportunities to baffle free enterprise and to enlarge the Government's control of the people's affairs.

One of his first acts, after being elected in 1932 on a platform dedicated to free enterprise, was to institute N. R. A. And N. R. A. was an attempt to place the entire industry and trade of the United States under a system of monopolies supervised by the Government. The scheme, which broke down, might have been taken from the textbooks of nazi-ism and fascism. Side by side was his assumption of control over agriculture in headlong measures which ignored vitally necessary foreign markets, led to the Government's purchase of vast, accumulating surpluses in price-fixing schemes and fastened on the Nation a gigantic system of cash subsidies to farmers—from all of which we shall not be extricated in a generation.

This is not the whole, or nearly the whole, of the astounding story of Mr. Roosevelt's inability to formulate a basic economic policy and to adhere to it. His impulsive good intentions, his almost adolescent love of novelty and experiment, his distaste for successful lawyers and businessmen against whom he competed for some years in private life with inconspicuous success—these qualities have led him into courses which make unpredictability the only predictable thing, inconsistency the only consistent thing.

ILL-CONSIDERED REFORMS

There is the Wagner labor law. Its purpose is to facilitate and extend, under law, the system of collective bargaining which had been privately evolved over the years between businessmen and their employees. In its very terms it assumes the existence of free enterprise and the social and economic value of continuing the system. In its very terms it assumes that the businessman, the employer, is a useful member of society, and therefore has rights which should be respected as well as obligations which should be fulfilled. But that assumption is at the opposite pole to the practices which have prevailed under Mr. Roosevelt's administration of the act.

The businessman, the employer, the active, initiative force in this system of free enterprise, is presumed to be an antisocial, inhumane creature of greed and greed alone. He cannot so much as discuss unionism or its terms with his employees lest he coerce them. He is not allowed to reason as a friend. He is kept at arm's length as an enemy. And as an enemy he has no right even to demand the orderly naming of those with whom he is to bargain at arm's length. If opposing factions among his employees engage in bitter and demoralizing controversy as to which of them should be received in bargaining, the employer is not recognized as having any right to demand an election and a settlement.

To state these harassing conditions in the administration of the Wagner law is merely to state conditions which have been familiar in all fields. A wages-and-hours law applicable to a continent was enacted in confusion and is enforced in confusion. And a tax law—which collapsed of its own weight—was suddenly jammed upon the books to the end that, in this system based on free enterprise, every board of directors in this vast land should be coerced into increasing its dividend payments and decreasing its allotments of earnings to reserves.

Even in policies which were clearly good, there has been throughout this administration a strange immaturity of fiber. Its best work has been in the social field. But politics in relief was so glaring that a congressional investigation became necessary. And the record is clear that relief rolls were regularly enlarged in election periods. In old-age annuities such sums were taken from employers and employees to provide an imaginary reserve fund—the money actually went into payment of general expenses of the Government—that public outcry forced a halt. The necessary regulation of certain phases of the power industry was converted into a costly and destructive feud against legitimate private interests until at last another public outcry caused restraint.

The result of it all is this: The country has had the most protracted period of stagnation in new enterprise in its entire history; and, consequently, it has had the largest permanent pool of unemployment in its entire history. That is the result of Mr. Roosevelt's administration—that, and public finances completely out of his control.

THE PLEA OF INDISPENSABILITY

With this record behind him, Mr. Roosevelt now presents himself to the country as the indispensable man. Aided by the inner circle in Washington and by such big-city bosses as Kelly and Hague—but not during the primary campaign by any of the men of his party with pretensions to statesmanship—Mr. Roosevelt has undertaken to overthrow the two-term rule which was established by Washington and Jefferson and has hitherto been obeyed by every President at the end of his second term.

In the 150 years of this Republic's life, there has been no time when it was more vital that the two-term rule be enforced. The reason is not far to seek. No other President has amassed such resources to insure indefinite tenure of office. It is not necessary to argue this. Mr. Roosevelt's power to force another nomination has been conceded from the beginning of his maneuvers. His immense advantages after nomination have been conceded from the beginning. He has practically doubled the army of officeholders. He commands unprecedented sums for public works. He commands unprecedented sums with which to make loans to agriculture. He commands unprecedented sums with which to make loans to industry. He commands unprecedented sums from which checks pour out to millions of subsidized farmers and unfortunates on relief. His power to coerce or to beguile is beyond calculation.

By the canons of American democracy, he was under moral compulsion to lay down these vast powers for the safety of democracy. He has refused to do so. He has refused, indeed, to play the rule against a third term—an unwritten part of the American Constitution—the respect of direct discussion. He was as evasive, in his speech to the Chicago convention, of his obligation to candor on the third term as he was in 1936 when he dodged questions about the Court-packing plan which he was to spring immediately after his reelection. In his flouting of the two-term rule, and in his manner of flouting it, Mr. Roosevelt's candidacy has become a menace to the political integrity of this Nation, as his administration is a menace to its economic foundations.

ENTER MR. WILLKIE

Mr. Willkie is a strong refuge in this hour of danger to our political institutions and to our economic foundations.

He has toiled with his hands to gain money with which to advance his education, and he has labored with his brain in the law and in business to gain a substance and a competence for his own and his family's protection. Such a man will not be profligate with the public's money. Nor will he believe that the long-term interests of the masses of Americans will be served by loose and wasteful administration and a runaway debt.

He has fought for historic economic liberalism throughout his career. He supported Mr. Rocsevelt when Mr. Roosevelt stood on his 1932 platform. It was Mr. Roosevelt who left that sound Democratic and liberal position, not Mr. Willkie, who still preserves the faith. And, better than any other, Mr. Willkie has put his finger on the great internal danger of the day, which is "big government," fostered by the novelty-seeking, power-loving, wasteful Mr. Roosevelt.

And in foreign affairs Mr. Willkie shares with Mr. Roosevelt the views of a majority of thoughtful citizens, but expresses them with care and with sobriety. From Mr. Willkie we shall not have speeches at Charlottesville which should have been made to Congress. We shall not have passionate, lavish, out-of-hand offers of aid to the Allies, to be followed almost immediately by necessary denials, as when M. Reynaud desperately called for airplanes.

Mr. Willkie is in the true American tradition—the tradition of industry, or frugality, of dignity, of responsibility, and of orderly growth on these great bases of individual and national character. He will be given the votes of men and women whose eyes are open to the dangers to our political and economic institutions which Mr. Roosevelt has laid in our path.

Asia for the Asiatics—Uncle Sam's Lettergram

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 20 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE NEW YORK DAILY NEWS AND ARTICLE FROM THE AMERICAN VINDICATOR

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be published in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, a very timely editorial from the New York Daily News, and later reprinted on the editorial page of the Times-Herald of Washington, D. C., entitled "Asia for the Asiatics," together with an article from the September 1940 issue of the American Vindicator, published monthly at Washington, D. C., entitled "Uncle Sam's Lettergram," the subject of which deals with the Monroe Doctrine, likewise discussed by the aforementioned editorial.

There being no objection, the editorial and article were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Daily News]

"ASIA FOR THE ASIATICS"

It looks more and more likely that Japan is going to make its "Asia for the Asiatics" doctrine stick in the long run. Maybe in the short run, if the keystone of the British Empire crumbles under the bombs of Goering's "blitzkriegers."

Anyway, the Japanese have now bulldozed the hard-pressed British into pulling their troops out of Shanghai, leaving control of the International Settlement divided between the Japanese and the United States Marines. The marines, incidentally, have been pushed down to a 4-mile strip of waterfront in Shanghai, which might be taken as a symbolic forecast of where the white man's political power in Asia is headed.

For some reason, a lot of Americans have a mental blind spot on this subject of "Asia for the Asiatics."

Ninety-nine percent of us, we estimate, can understand why it is entirely right and proper for the United States to have its Monroe Doctrine, and to back it up with all the necessary ships, soldiers, planes, and guns.

The Monroe Doctrine means "America (both Americas) for the Americans." It means we don't want England, Germany, or any other non-American power planting any new colonies over here. We don't even want their nationals to build up too much political power for themselves under existing North or South American governments.

We're the most powerful nation in the Western Hemisphere, and we'd be foolish not to take every indicated step to stay so.

But when it comes to "Asia for the Asiatics," many of us feel just the other way.

The prevailing American conviction (shared by our Government up to this writing) is that the Japanese have their nerve to suggest any such thing, and are rascals for trying to enforce such a policy.

WATERTIGHT COMPARTMENTS

We dislike as much as anybody else to see Japan rise to the overlordship of Asia. If it makes that grade, it will be more of a menace to world peace than it ever has been before.

But Japan appears to be making that grade rapidly. We think in any event that some nation or combination of nations is sooner or later going to make an "Asia for the Asiatics" policy stick—that the day of Asia for outside exploiters is about done.

When that comes to pass, will Asia shut itself from the rest of the world, and will we do likewise from Asia? Will the Japs, or whoever is running Asia, refuse to sell us the East Indies' rubber, tin, and quinine? Will we righteously refuse to sell them cotton, wool, meat, manufactured goods?

Such watertight compartment stuff will not come to pass; or if it does, it won't last long. Trade is the life blood of nations, and of the world. Tourniquets twisted onto the arteries of trade for political or moral reasons never have held for very long, and we think (and hope) never will.

BETTER ARM IN A HURRY

Our conviction is that we can save ourselves a lot of trouble by becoming realistic about Japan.

We should recognize Japan's power, energy, and ambition; and we should restore friendly trade relations with Japan—something to which we are reliably advised the Japanese would be very agreeable.

However, our official guides and counselors aren't doing anything like that. They go on scolding Japan for every move it makes toward Asiatic domination.

So we'd better rush conscription, and rush also the building of an army of at least 1,000,000 mechanic-sergeants, plus an air force of 50,000 planes and 100,000 pilots. Our present international policies may easily provoke Japan, Germany, Italy, and Russia—all four—into "ganging up" on us some day.

When and if that show-down between alleged international morality and alleged international immorality comes, we'll need every weapon and every trained fighting man we can find.

[From the American Vindicator]

UNCLE SAM'S LETTERGRAM

MY DEAR NIECES AND NEPHEWS: The Congress of the United States, as you know, has authorized and appropriated approximately $17,000,000,000 for the purpose of building up an adequate national defense, or rather such national defense as cannot be penetrated by any potential enemy of the world. As you know, it is always well to be prepared because one naturally can never tell about the future. These millions have been expended for defending ourselves against the enemy from without, if and when that enemy calls, but at the present writing I cannot really see any imminent danger from the enemy from without. Nevertheless, as I have stated, one can never tell, and it is wise to always be prepared, and for that reason we are preparing to build up impregnable barricades that will provide the American people with perfect safety. So much for that.

The real enemy, my dear nieces and nephews, is right here among us in the form of saboteurs, spies, aliens, and, I might add, there are a lot of elements in this country whose hatred is so terrific toward and against Hitler, the German Government, and the German people as a whole, that they are bent upon getting our country into war just to satisfy their lust for revenge. You know who they are, and I know who they are. What we should do, in truth, is to guard against these elements in this country who want to involve us in another bloody war, a war that is raging in Europe, and a war that is not our war. These termites within are the ones we should guard against. They are working night and day and using every available means, principally the propaganda that is rampant, and that propaganda has thrown the American people into hysterical moods. There is propaganda through the mails, over the radio, and everywhere; and unfortunately thousands of Americans have fallen for it. Our danger is in permitting this propaganda to lead us astray. We have no business in Europe. We ought to stay out of Europe. We ought to remember what the Father of our Country told us about years upon years ago. We ought to tend to our own business and let Europe tend to her business. We ought to guard and maintain our interests here in the Western Hemisphere and let Europe look after its interests over there and let the yellow races look after their interests in the Orient. Europe is not in the Western Hemisphere and doesn't come within the meaning of the Monroe Doctrine, and the Orient is not in the Western Hemisphere and doesn't come within the meaning of the Monroe Doctrine. We are telling the Europeans to stay out of here, and at the same time we are telling them how to run their affairs over there. We are telling the Orientals to stay out of here, and at the same time we are telling the Japanese what they can do and what they cannot do. We should heed the warning of George Washington, and that means, in simple words, minding our own business and keeping out of the quarrels of other nations, and to stop telling other nations what kind of governments they should have or what kind of government they shouldn't have. We should have millions for defense, but not one dollar for offense, not one cent for aggression, and we really won't have to take billions from the taxpayers of this country for national defense if we mind our own business, but the more enmity we create against the peoples of other nations of the world, then the more money we are going to have to spend in preparing ourselves against an attack by those whom we have insulted and angered, without cause, from time to time. That stands to reason.

YOUR UNCLE SAM.

What Price Freedom?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 19, 1940

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted, I insert an article by Robert Keith Leavitt, published in This Week magazine, the magazine section of the Los Angeles Times, of the issue of June 30, 1940:

[From This Week for June 30, 1940]

WHAT PRICE FREEDOM?

(By Robert Keith Leavitt)

It is a single sheet of parchment, close written in an antique script, and boldly scrawled upon at the bottom, where 56 men in knee breeches and powdered wigs set down their names on that far-off, troubled summer day. Its glass case is a shrine with golden doors. People walk softly upon the marble floor and stand hushed before it. Copies of it are hung in schoolrooms, transcripts printed in every history book.

We are about to celebrate the anniversary—of what? Is the Declaration of Independence merely an heirloom? A curiosity? A symbol of something far off, remote, having nothing to do with our individual, preoccupied lives?

On the contrary, that Declaration was once a document of flaming personal concern to every man, woman, and child in the country, and its closing words may well be taken today as expression of our people's most urgent need.

Everybody knows how the Declaration begins: "When in the course of human events * * *."

But few people remember how it ends. And the end is the most significant part of all:

"And for the support of this Declaration, with a firm reliance on the protection of divine Providence, we mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor."

These words were no empty rhetoric. The Declaration, for all its tempered tone, was a desperate document. The men who signed it knew only too well when they pledged life, fortune, and honor that they might be called upon to pay that pledge in person—at the end of a hangman's rope.

And the people who had sent them to Philadelphia knew what personal responsibility was their own. They had found out what it felt like to face hard-bitten British troops, at Concord and Bunker Hill. They had learned in camp and on the dusty highways that war was not a matter of shots and shouting alone, but of mud, filth, flies, disease, sweat, cold, exhaustion, hunger and thirst. Congress, making war, had the grim support of men who saw clearly that war was the end of their private prosperity and of the comfort and safety of their families. It had the fervent encouragement of women who knew every day that they might never again see alive the husbands and sons who went out in the freshness of morning. It had the backing of a people who realized, after a year during which their lives grew harder every month, that the struggle would be long and terrible for every one of them.

The people of that America knew these things, but they were determined to endure all of them, with death at the end if need be, rather than let go what they thought was right.

To them, individually and as a people, certain ideals looked bigger than self-interest, safety of life: The right of self-government; the right to be free from intolerable abuses; the privileges they later embodied in the Bill of Rights—of free speech, free assembly, a free press, and a decent respect for individual liberty.

These they knew to be precious beyond all other things—for they had nearly lost them. So, though they differed widely among themselves in lesser matters, their resolve upon the great ideals burned away all other desires.

In the fire of that resolve they went to war. In fire they hammered out the declaration. And it was fire in the hearts of the common people—behind the war and the declaration—that carried them through to win in the end.

Without that blazing resolve, the freedom of the newborn republic would have died as miserably as * * * well, as miserably as the liberties of irresolute peoples in Europe, under the roar of a mechanized might that we have heard with our own ears.

The document is yellow with age. The flaming people lie a century in dust. The grievances that fired them are forgotten. The rights they bought in common sacrifice are all ours—easy, comfortable, permanent—something to enjoy without obligation or risk, or so we thought.

But now, in the glare of what has happened to others, we can see that great wrongs and tyrannies are not things of the past; that the privileges of a free people are not undeniable as air and light, and that the price of holding them may be very high—so high, indeed, that it can be afforded only by a nation in which every individual is resolved that the price is part of his personal obligation.

Brute force is at large in the world—so big, savage, and competent that it makes the mad whims of George III look like a child's willfullness.

We have declared that we will be independent of this force, and have set about arming ourselves to implement that declaration. But declarations and arms can do nothing by themselves. It is resolve behind intent and citizens behind arms that make a declaration good—today as in 1776.

We have seen the impact of quick-striking ferocity upon peoples who were merely wishful not to meet it, and who in consequence were weak, unready, divided in counsel, tolerant of traitors and of fools. We have seen the disastrous folly of peoples who were preoccupied with divergent pettinesses, obsessed with what they could get without giving, beguiled with the notion that nothing could be so bad as to justify the hazard of personal safety.

It is wishful thinking to believe we can always indulge ourselves in similar flabbiness of thought, relying on distance or the satiety of conquerors to let us go our easy way. We should know that in matters of national defense there are burdens to be borne, sacrifices to be made, and parts to be played by every decent citizen.

We need many things today, but none more than the old resolve running in a blaze across the land. We need, each of us, the fire and faith of our ancestors. We must "mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor." The words are old, and as out of style as buff and blue. But today, as then, they are the words of freedom.

My Work in Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. NEWT V. MILLS
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 20, 1940

Mr. MILLS of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, the history of leadership in the Congress indicates that the best policy for the people of any district is to keep a Congressman who is rendering good service on the job. The leaders of Congress are the men who have been here from 20 to 30 years.

There is, of course, no point in keeping a man in Congress unless he is doing a good job. Therefore it is proper to review the events of my service since January 1937, when my term of office started.

FARM LEGISLATION

I introduced H. R. 6339 and H. R. 8135. H. R. 6339 was an act to extend additional years the 3½-percent interest rate on Federal land-bank loans, which was reported out under committee title, and as a result of the House and Senate's action the bill became a law.

H. R. 8135 proposed relief for the American farmers for 1938, thereby directing the Reconstruction Finance Corpo-tion to make available to the Commodity Credit Corporation $450,000,000, which would have guaranteed the cotton farmer a better price for his 1938 cotton crop. However, only $65,000,000 was appropriated for cotton-price adjustment.

Facing a problem of farm tenancy as we do, and 2,000 farms being foreclosed every legal day of the year as a result of our agricultural class not being able to meet their mortgage debts, I helped to provide means whereby thousands of families could purchase homes under the Farm Tenant Act and the Farm Security Administration.

Further I have helped to provide each year funds whereby farmers could secure loans for farming purposes. In addition persuaded the Commodity Credit Corporation to purchase all the surplus commodities in my congressional district in an effort to maintain proper prices. Helped to secure the cancelation of all oat-loan debts, saving $980,810.39 for the farmers of north and northeast Louisiana.

In 1938 I persuaded the Agriculture Committee to accept my amendment giving new-ground farmers equal protection with the old farmers. However, I do not advocate the 1938 Agricultural Adjustment Act as the correct procedure to solve the agricultural question, inasmuch as the farmers of the United States have lost $22,000,000,000 of their normal income in the last 6 years; therefore, the debt load remains virtually the same, so I believe the correct procedure to solve the agricultural question will be found in speeches delivered by me in the House of Representatives entitled "Taxes and Currency Versus Prosperity and Agriculture" under date of November 18, 1937, and "Too Late to Plant Corn After Harvesting," March 21, 1940.

OLD-AGE PENSIONS

One of the most important things I wanted to do when I came to Congress was to set up an old-age pension system. I believed, and still do, that this is a measure of justice to the veterans of civil citizenship. I voted for the Social Security Act, explaining at the time that I did so not because I thought this legislation was adequate but because it did recognize our obligations to the old people, and also it was the best bill that I could vote for that had a chance to pass at the time. Under this act Louisiana, in cooperation with the Federal Government, is now paying old-age assistance to more than half of the persons in the State over 65 years of age. I still do not think that the Social Security Act is doing the job right. I favor a Federal old-age pension, paid direct by the Federal Government by check from Washington, without the machinery that we now have checking up on and harassing the old folks. I also believe that, as a matter of principle and simple justice, the old folks in all States should receive the same amount monthly. I pledge a continuation of my best efforts to this end.

SUPPORT LABOR

Unfortunately, in the land where it is too much for all, favored laws have denied the laboring man protective hours and wages sufficient to sustain a proper livelihood for him and his family; therefore, having been reared a laboring man, I have consistently supported the man and woman who live by daily toil since I entered public life, and as a result of said support I have been endorsed by the American Federation of Labor as being the laboring man's friend.

FLOOD PROTECTION

The delta lands of northeast Louisiana are subject to overflow; therefore, the question of flood control has been a paramount question since the first settlers in northeast Louisiana, so I am exceedingly happy I was successful in having enacted into law H. R. 6600, H. R. 6601, H. R. 6602, H. R. 9435, and H. R. 9326, each introduced by me, dealing with flood protection for my district.

H. R. 9435, a companion bill to S. 3354, which reached a compromise in the Flood Control Committee, provided for the construction of the Morganza floodway, which is held will reduce the backwater area of Tensas, Boeuf, Bayou Macon, and Ouachita Basins. Further, the construction of the Morganza floodway is held by all Army engineers to be a progressive step toward solving the flood-control question that has been the uppermost one for years. Also, the compromise provides the fuse-plug levee south of Yancopin to Van Cluse, Ark., shall be reconstructed to the 1914 grade and 1928 section.

As a result, in part, of the above-enacted legislation, the Office of the Chief of Engineers is presently making a survey and study of the lower Mississippi Valley, and Gen. Thomas M. Robins advised me personally and by letter that a report of said survey would be submitted to the Chief of Engineers' Office by December 1940.

Upon receipt of this report it will be my aim to secure the necessary appropriation of money to carry out the Chief of Engineers' recommendations as to general flood protective improvements.

Secured an appropriation of $615,000 for a ring-levee project each at Columbia and Jonesville, however, the Flood Control Committee accepted my resolution that provides the War Department must make an enlarged survey of the Jonesville levee project also in addition each year have helped to secure the necessary appropriations to carry on levee improvements and project construction cut-offs.

VETERAN'S LEGISLATION

When I came to Congress the Economy Act had been put into effect, cutting off many of the veterans who had been drawing compensation. My ex-service friends were in need and wanted preference on Government relief work. In general they wanted justice from their Government, which they had served, and for which they had suffered. I led in the movement to give veterans definite preference for relief work. I have been trying to wipe out the injustices of the Economy Act.

I favor giving the veterans of the World War the same treatment on pensions that the veterans of the Spanish-American War and other previous wars have received. I also favor the same pension provisions for their widows and orphans that were given widows and orphans of previous wars. I hope that this session of Congress will make a start toward this program.

My ex-service friends of the World War are much aroused over the threat to our safety occasioned by the wars in Europe and Asia, and I have pledged to them that I will do all I can to keep us out of war. I am opposed to again sending our young men to foreign nations to settle local quarrels, and will never vote to do this. I further pledged, and here repeat, that the day that I vote to involve the United States in war for any purpose, that I will resign my seat in Congress, and will enlist in the armed forces.

FARMER COOPERATION

My district is mostly a farming section. Most of my constituents are farmers. A large part of my time in Congress has been, and will continue to be, devoted to work for the farmers.

I favor organization of farmers—just as I favor organization of laboring men into unions. I have advocated cost-of-production for our farmers which will provide at least 20-cent cotton, and corresponding prices on other crops, on that portion of our production consumed in the United States.

I favor farmers cooperation in rural-electrification projects, and am glad that rural-electrification lines are being extended into a number of the parishes of my district. I favor farmers cooperation in any way that they can. I have always made it a practice at the end of each session of Congress, when I got home, to notify the farmers of the different parishes to meet me in the county seat to consult with them about the general situation and receive their advice and reactions and first-hand information about farm practices and results.

Through such cooperation of the farmers in my district, I was able on two occasions when drought and excessive rains struck our country to bring quick relief to them through the agencies of the Federal Government. I pledge myself to continue to cooperate with the farmers by this personal contact which enables me to intelligently bring their problems to the attention of the proper agencies of the Government.

NATIONAL DEFENSE

Voted and supported all appropriations for national defense. These amounts, in conjunction with previous appropriations and contractual authorizations, bring the total available for obligation during the present fiscal year, exclusive of unobligated continuing appropriations and contractual authorizations on June 30 last, to $10,040,225,543, divided between the two defense establishments.

POST-OFFICE SERVICE IMPROVEMENTS

In view of poor post-office quarters in certain sections of my district, I have given particular attention to this subject, and as a result funds were allocated to construct several new post-office buildings, and, in addition, new and larger quarters and additional clerks have been provided for in several other post offices. I consider the mail service has been improved remarkably, inasmuch as a number of rural routes and extensions have been granted and other requested extensions are presently pending awaiting the inspector's report, which I will be able to have granted as soon as the inspector's opinion is submitted.

PROGRAM FOR YOUTH

The work of the Civilian Conservation Corps has been of great value to our young people. I have strongly supported this program; and in 1937, when a reduction of one-third in the number of camps had been decided upon by the administration, helped to organize and led a sufficient group of House Members so that we were able to induce the President to rescind his order, thus saving this drastic reduction and sustaining the C. C. C. camp program at approximately that level until the beginning of this year.

The National Youth Administration has been of much benefit in enabling our young folks to continue their education in school and to obtain training out of school which would fit them for earning a livelihood. I pledge my best efforts to a continuation of this program.

The common school is the greatest institution in American life. It has always been a delight to me to go around and visit the schools and talk to the young people upon patriotic topics. In doing so I learned that many districts had old buildings, not adequate to care for enlarged enrollments, and in many instances condemned as unsafe for future use.

In order to correct this condition, I urged P. W. A. officials to encourage school-building projects and urged school boards to submit such projects. As a result my district is dotted with new school buildings; this has helped the schools and has given work to many men in need. It is interesting to note in almost every community of my district new school buildings have been erected by the P. W. A.

Of course, the principal credit belongs to the fine teachers and the earnest school boards, who had the vision and energy to initiate and push these projects, but it has been a pleasure for me to cooperate in every way possible, to work endless hours in cutting red tape that this work might go forward.

OTHER ACCOMPLISHMENTS

In 1939 the Oil Trust began to purchase cottonseed for $12 to $14 per ton. We called upon the Secretary of Agriculture and the President to have the Commodity Credit Corporation to finance the cotton farmers in marketing of cottonseed, and as a result of the coordinated efforts of the farmers the Commodity Credit Corporation called attention to this low price, and as a result seed immediately advanced to $21 to $24 per ton; however, this was far below cost of production.

Recently I have persuaded certain Federal agencies to assist the needs of my farmers as a result of excessive rains.

I helped to place an amendment to the Hatch Act which provides that no person may work for the Federal Government who is a member of any party, society, or organization which is engaged in attempting to overthrow our democratic form of government. This is in line with the ideas of those people who believe that we, who believe in Americanism, should fight for it and see that those who are not truly American should not bore from within by obtaining Government appointments.

I helped to add an amendment upon a recent civil-service act which provides that eligible applicants from Louisiana and other States which do not have their full quota under the Apportionment Act must be given appointment ahead of other applicants from States which are over their quota.

EXPERIENCE BRINGS ADDED ABILITY

My record stands on my work for measures intended to improve the conditions and opportunities of my people, and my fights against proposals intended to hurt or curtail their existing rights and privileges. I hope it has entitled me to the respect of the thousands who gave me this chance to serve them. I believe I can assure my friends that I enjoy the confidence of my colleagues in Congress and the respect of the governmental agencies before whom I have pleaded the cause of my constituents.

The experience I have gained by the continued support of the voters of my district has ripened my original enthusiasm into a steadier ability to accomplish the proper solution of the many problems of the various elements of our citizenship.

The people of the Fifth Congressional District have enabled me to gain this experience. I have used and will continue to use it for their benefit. Added experience gives me added prestige with those in Washington who have the power to give and withhold, which power was gained by them through ripe experience and long service.

The district gains in accomplishment of its needs and desires as I gain in accumulation of experience and service.

For these past expressions of confidence from my friends and neighbors I promise the continued exertion of my entire ability in their behalf. I promise a veteran's fight for a sturdy, progressive people.

EDITORIAL FROM THE DETROIT FREE PRESS

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, is the President interested in the preservation of our form of government in preparing our country to meet all threatened danger? Or is it his purpose to create fear and hysteria, bring on a war and then fool the people into believing that he is the only man in the country capable of being President?

Why, otherwise, should he run around with a chip on his shoulder, doing so much to involve us in a war for which we are wholly, according to his own statement, unprepared?

Read the following editorial from the Detroit Free Press of August 15, 1940, which cites a few facts tending to throw light on the President's motives and activities:

[From the Detroit Free Press of August 15, 1940]

TRYING TO FOOL THE PEOPLE

Preparedness is the most vital need of this Nation.

Its first requisite is honest speech.

Its biggest handicap is a barrage of half truths, emotional oratory for the manufacture of fear and hysterics, and plain bunk.

The people are not being informed; they are being misled.

Instead of the integrity of true statesmanship, we are witnessing in Washington a display of smart-aleckism that would put to shame a high-school debating team.

This sophomoric cunning stems from the janissaries of the brain trust, who feel that, knowing themselves all there is to know and the people being so dumb, it is much better not to tell them the truth. It is much better to fool them—as though they were little children who were not quite bright.

A shining example of this came during the debate on the neutrality bill. Every time it looked as though the Senate would not let President Roosevelt have his way, the public mind was whipped into a hysteria of fear and excitement by the simple device of having Mr. Roosevelt announce that he had just been informed that the Navy had sighted "foreign" submarines off our shores.

Once he had had his way no more submarines were ever reported and the merry jesters of the throne room now admit, off the record, that it was just a smart hoax to force action from the opposing Senators by pressure of excited public opinion.

We are getting more of the same in Washington today.

Brig. Gen. William E. Shedd, Assistant Chief of the Army Staff in charge of personnel, is an honorable soldier and gentleman. But as a soldier he must obey orders.

So he goes before a committee of the House Tuesday and testifies that because of the debate now waging over conscription, the Army has been "forced" to delay its mobilization plans from October 1 to January 1. The implication is that the administration and the Army Staff under Colonel Stimson, were prepared to place this Nation on a war footing but are now blocked by the demands of the Senate and Congress to get at the facts.

Immediately headlines and radio scream forth innuendo that the preparedness program is being hamstrung by those asking answers on the Burke-Wadsworth bill. The administration is pictured as making a heroic fight to get this country ready against terrific odds.

And all who dare criticize or even voice a doubt of the wisdom of the Stimson proposals are branded as Nazi sympathizers.

Now, let's look at the record.

The Burke-Wadsworth bill was reported out of committee on July 27—15 days ago, not counting Sundays. There was a brief delay in taking it up for discussion because another bill was being given necessary precedence at the request of the Army—the mobilization of the National Guard. This was passed without any serious opposition; about as fast, in fact, as it could be read.

On August 5, debate on the conscription bill started—8 days ago, not counting Sunday.

Where, then, has there been any delay in getting the Army on an efficient footing? Why must its penciled plans be rubbed out as of October 1 and postponed until January 1—3 long months?

Any consideration of chronology, backed by the calendar, makes the testimony of General Shedd in keeping with the usual line of hokum that is being handed out to fool the people.

There has been no delay on the conscription proposal—if we are still a democracy with the representative government of a free people who have a right to know what is being done to them.

There has been delay, if by delay is meant any discussion at all of a law that might forever bind the American people to a totalitarian system of government.

Does the general, and those for whom he speaks, mean that the merits of the bill should not be discussed at all, but rushed through as some more "must" legislation by a "rubber stamp" Congress?

If this is so, then the war-minded gentlemen in power no doubt think it an impertinence that the citizens should even ask about it.

More propaganda comes from Rome, through the Chicago Daily News cable service, to the effect that the totalitarian states—Germany and Italy—are laughing at us because we want to make quite sure we do not get entrapped into the same kind of dictatorial government that the Germans and the Italians are cursed with. Unnamed German and Italian "experts" in these dispatches say that we would be a "push-over."

That ought to scare us into abdicating our representative authority immediately.

But the Chicago Daily News is owned and edited by Col. Frank Knox, who is Mr. Roosevelt's Secretary of the Navy, and an all too militaristic interventionist.

As for the 3-month delay spoken of by General Shedd because the Senate has had the bill 15 days, it might be well to note the fact that President Roosevelt himself has not said one word in favor of the bill now before the Senate, other than, at a press conference, to dictate carefully an ambiguous sentence that he did favor "some form" of universal service.

In the seven and a half years he has been President he has never hesitated to make known to Congress his desires, and often they have been demands under pressure.

He is Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy, and one wonders why he does not speak to Congress and the people in that capacity.

This silence is strangely significant and prompts the natural question: Why does he not desire to go on record?

Desperate efforts of trained legislators such as Senator WHEELER to find out what the purposes are behind this bill have been to no avail. And the mystery grows as more testimony is offered.

General Shedd was asked bluntly by Representative CLASON what the millions of men to be conscripted would be used for. His answer, verbatim, is more illuminating than it at first appears. He said:

"As to the use that they will be put, only time will tell."

Again, protesting against 1-year voluntary enlistments as impractical, he declared:

"Under such enlistments garrisons overseas could not be properly maintained."

Read that over again. Then remember that in his message on preparedness to Congress, President Roosevelt pledged his word that no American soldier would be sent overseas.

Weeks later at Hyde Park, at a press conference, he made an opening—a small crack—in this stone-wall pledge by remarking that the chances of our doughboys being sent over were less than 100 to 1. From a solemnly asserted and impregnable pledge, within 2 weeks it becomes a matter of betting odds.

Again General Shedd held emphatically that debate in Congress for less than 2 weeks had delayed American preparedness by more than 3 months, but admits, under questioning, that there is not equipment for these men to begin training even if they are mobilized.

How then has discussion brought about a delay that he says has been so costly to the program?

The First Army maneuvers in New York opened last week. Soldiers are drilling with broomsticks and pieces of pipe instead of guns. They are putting beaver-board walls on trucks and pretending they are tanks. They are using birds (when they fly) instead of airplanes to aim at.

There is not enough equipment on hand, all Army authorities honestly admit, to mechanize one unit properly. There is not enough personal equipment to take care of over 75,000 men. Cloth for uniforms has not yet been woven.

But General Shedd insists (on orders) that we must have an immediate army of 900,000 men—with the next step 2,000,000 men—and from then on up.

What for?

Nobody in authority will tell.

Senator WHEELER in his speech of Tuesday said something that all the military experts agree with when he declared:

"A small but expert force of Germans seized all of Norway. A small but expert Finnish army held the Russian Goliath at bay for many months. But a large French army was quickly crushed—less by the enemy than by its own incompetent, and in many instances traitorous generals. The years of military training that the French people had undergone, the crushing burdens they had painfully borne for generations all went for naught in the face of the lack of competence of the French General Staff.

"Outside the Army, all the most eminent military authorities of the country agree that a force of 400,000 to 600,000 would be entirely adequate."

Why then does the administration insist on the immediate conscription of 12,000,000 American citizens?

Where are they to be sent and for what purposes?

What foreign wars are they to be ordered to fight?

Are they to go to Europe, to Asia, or to police the South American republics?

Did General Shedd let the cat out of the bag when he said short enlistments interfered with "overseas garrisons"?

Will Mr. Roosevelt forget his thinly veiled inspection tours, for political purposes, and, as the President of the United States and as Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy, speak out and tell the people plainly, frankly, and freely what the whole thing is all about?

The time has passed for the technique of suddenly discovering nonexistent "foreign" submarines.

The people are weary of being "frightened."

They have the unalienable right of a free people to be informed on what their Government is planning to do to them.

The ordered testimony of General Shedd is an insult to their intelligence.

Nazis Use United States Funds in Colombia for Economic War on Democracies

OF

HON. JOHN W. BOEHNE, JR.

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 20, 1940

ARTICLE BY RUSSELL B. PORTER

Mr. BOEHNE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Russell B. Porter, which was published in the New York Times for August 16:

[From the New York Times of August 16, 1940]

NAZIS USE UNITED STATES FUNDS IN COLOMBIA FOR ECONOMIC WAR ON DEMOCRACIES—PROPAGANDA TO WIN MARKETS PARTLY FINANCED BY ADVERTISING OF FIRMS HERE PLACED BY THEIR GERMAN AGENTS

(By Russell B. Porter)

BOGOTA, COLOMBIA, August 15.—Nazis are waging both economic and propaganda warfare against the United States in Colombia. They began the drive to get Colombian trade away from the democracies before the war, using their askimark system. Though they failed to destroy the United State's predominant position, the country's trade actually increasing, the Germans during the barter years succeeded in dealing a severe blow to British sales.

Now the Germans have begun a campaign to convince Colombian business that its interests call for it to play ball with Germany instead of the United States after the war. If they succeed, it will be a serious matter for the United States as it will establish a virtual economic colony of Nazidom as next door neighbor of the Panama Canal, key to the defense of the Western Hemisphere.

The Germans are conducting political and economic propaganda along parallel lines. They are telling Colombians that Germany is bound to win and that the present battle of Britain is the last stand of the democracies. In a few weeks, they say, the war will be over with Chancelor Hitler master of Europe and controlling all its markets, in which they assert Colombia must sell her coffee.

For the last 3 or 4 months they have been spreading propaganda among buyers that they would be able to deliver German goods in September or October at prices substantially lower than United States shippers can quote. They even have offered to pay penalties if they fail to deliver.

THREAT TO COLUMBIA

In cases where contracts have been made it is reported Germans now are buying in the United States through German-American agents to make good on the deliveries. This, however, they are trying to keep secret.

The main object of their commercial propaganda is to build up the psychology that Colombians had better jump on the band wagon. They say that when Germany wins she is going to be very strong economically as well as militarily and can economically help or ruin a small nation like Colombia, with only 9,000,000 population.

Why, they ask, should Colombians pay 25 or 30 percent more, and cash at that, for goods in the United States when they can buy the same articles cheaper on easy credit terms in Germany and when Germany can market Colombian products in every European country?

Although Germany has been unable to ship any goods here for nearly a year, she is keeping her commercial organization intact and working at full speed, forwarding Nazi propaganda against the United States. This organization is headed in the German Legation, where the German Minister and commercial attaché, with consular officials throughout the country, all active Nazis, coordinate the work of the German Chamber of Commerce and important German business houses here.

These firms contribute to Nazi propaganda with money and personnel and also to charitable funds for German clerical and other workers unemployed because of wartime suspension of trading but held here waiting for business resumption after the war.

From the United States viewpoint there is an unfortunate angle in that many Germans are kept going financially only because they are agents or work for agents representing American goods sold here. Worse than that, part of the profits German firms make on sales of United States goods are used to finance anti-United States propaganda.

Nazi agents even have the effrontery to use advertising appropriations made by United States manufacturers and exporters to favor newspapers, magazines, and radio stations that advocate the Nazi cause and attack the United States. They withhold advertising from those supporting the United States or even giving that country an even break. Until now American business apparently has been unaware that this was going on, and little or nothing has been done to stop it.

Pre-war German trade methods were mild compared to what may be expected from a victorious Germany. After several unsuccessful deals, the Germans in 1937 made a barter agreement that became effective September 30, 1938. Its effect was virtually to monopolize the European market for Colombian coffee in German hands.

Before the barter Colombia had a substantial free market for coffee in Europe. Afterward Germany controlled that entire market. The contract gave Germany the right to resell in Scandinavia and the Balkans coffee she bought from Colombia. She induced Colombia to agree to this by paying a premium over prices on the New York coffee exchange.

Then Germany sold coffee in Europe at a discount under Colombian prices to get exchange with which to buy war materials. The Nazis paid with machinery and other merchandise, so Colombia got no foreign exchange and could not buy in the United States with the proceeds of these European sales. Germans even dumped coffee in the New York market in direct competition with Colombian coffee, according to well-founded reports.

COLOMBIAN EXPORTS SHUT OFF

Germany took about 20 percent of Colombia's coffee, her main export crop. The loss of these sales has hit the country hard economically and made it easier for Nazi propaganda, which emphasizes the large United States coffee purchases from Brazil and asserts the United States cannot buy enough here to dispose of the Colombian surplus now piling up. As coffee prices have been going down to approach the point where the bean cannot be produced and sold abroad at a profit, some Colombians are listening to the siren song of Nazi economics with willing ears, hoping for the Germans to return to the market as buyers for all Europe.

Ambassador Spruille Braden and the staff at the United States Embassy here are working hard trying to keep Colombian markets for the United States. They are emphasizing to Colombians that the bilateral trade of totalitarianism is a false economy, as shown by Germans dumping Colombian coffee and breaking prices, which nullified the apparent advantages of the barter system.

In the long run, they say, the only sound and profitable system is that of multilateral trade with free markets and international exchange. Among other measures, they are supporting extension of reciprocal-trade agreements.

UNITED STATES SENATOR FROM NEW MEXICO

Tuesday, August 20 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

STATEMENT BY HON. DENNIS CHAVEZ, OF NEW MEXICO

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, on August 1 I wrote a statement for a newspaper under the heading "Why I'll vote for Roosevelt." I ask unanimous consent that it be inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHY I'LL VOTE FOR ROOSEVELT

(By Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ, Democratic Senator from New Mexico)

WASHINGTON, August 1.—The preamble to the Constitution of the United States is as follows:

"We the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America."

1. "In order to form a more perfect union." A perfect union cannot be effected unless the government or administration thereof takes into consideration all the people of the union. President

2. "Establish justice." What the framers of the Constitution had in mind in the establishment of justice was a justice that would be Roosevelt, like Presidents Washington and Lincoln, has made that his principal concern and has devoted his administrative energies to bring that about.

applicable to all and not to one particular element of society. Roosevelt has done this.

3. "Insure domestic tranquillity." Domestic tranquillity is only insured when you have a satisfied people, by treating them all equal and making it apparent that the Government is for the benefit of all, that duties and responsibilities should be assumed and shared by all, and that privileges and opportunities should inure to all.

4. "Provide for the common defense." Executive and Congressional activities of late prove conclusively to the world that Roosevelt and this administration are doing everything possible for the common defense not only of the United States but also those nations whose ideals and traditions are similar to ours.

5. "Promote the general welfare." When a government interests itself in the welfare of all elements of society and looks to the social, economic, and political welfare of said society, then it promotes the general welfare. Roosevelt has done this.

6. "And secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity." In these times of stress, when the United States may well be described as the last stronghold of liberty and freedom, the protection of the government to the constitutional guaranteed civil liberties becomes of paramount importance.

Can there be any question that Roosevelt has by every means at his disposal sought to secure these blessings of liberty to our generation and to those that are to succeed us? I do not think that a stone has been left unturned to retain the blessings of liberty not for one group but for all the people of this land of democracy.

7. "Do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America." To ordain and establish the Constitution demonstrates the will of the people of the United States. No one class, no one section, but the entire people of this country combined to establish and create the organic law under which this Nation has prospered and grown.

Everything that has been done by the present administration has been done under the Constitution. At no time, in no way, has the organic law expressive of the will of the people been disregarded. That is what makes the democracy. That is the democratic way of life to which Roosevelt has dedicated himself.

To particularize as to the blessings derived from our Federal Union: When our Thirteen Original States first organized the Federal Union, it was the result of necessity, for each realized that it could no longer carry on alone.

My own State, New Mexico, has benefited more from the practical development of this Federal principle during the past 7 years than at any time during its membership in the Union as a State or as a Federal Territory—a period extending over almost a century.

I am emphasizing again that at no time have the people of New Mexico, or the State itself, enjoyed the practical blessings of democracy to the extent that these have been manifested during the past 7 years.

For instance, more public schoolhouses have been built in New Mexico in the last 7 years of Roosevelt than in the 85 years prior thereto. Conservation of natural resources, conservation of water resources, public highways, national parks, actual feeding of the hungry, soil conservation, forest improvements, home loans, improvements in the Indian areas, C. C. C. camps, old-age assistance, bank deposits, railroad retirement, education assistance through N. Y. A., reclamation, and the blessings of social legislation have all been enacted since 1932.

The Destroyer Deal

OF

HON. BENNETT CHAMP CLARK

OF MISSOURI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 20 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

EDITORIALS FROM ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD two brief editorials from the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, one of Saturday, August 17, entitled "Dangers of the Destroyer Deal," and the other of August 15, entitled "Chairman Walsh Against Admiral Stirling."

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of August 17, 1940]

DANGERS OF THE DESTROYER DEAL

Two news stories of grave significance came out of Washington yesterday.

The first of these was President Roosevelt's announcement that he is negotiating with London for transfer of certain British possessions in the Western Hemisphere, for use by this country as air and naval bases.

Acquisition of these strategic territories is a move which we enthusiastically approve. The Post-Dispatch, in fact, has been urging precisely this step for the last 10 years and more. The safety of this hemisphere, and particularly of the highly vulnerable Panama Canal, demands that the United States possess enough Caribbean islands and other territories to build a solid barrier for national defense.

The other dispatch from Washington records persistent reports that the President will act shortly to facilitate transfer to Britain of 50 American destroyers. The idea is said to be for Mr. Roosevelt to authorize the deal himself, rather than submitting it to Congress, where vigorous opposition exists.

Is there any connection between these two items? Are the destroyers to be swapped to England in return for the air and naval bases?

No, says Mr. Roosevelt, there is no connection. He emphasizes that he is not discussing destroyers, that he is trying to acquire bases, and that is all. What, a correspondent asks, will this country offer in return for the bases? The President refuses to be pressed. The Post-Dispatch correspondent reports his statements, and then adds:

"Informed opinion here, in spite of Roosevelt's denial, that the negotiations for the naval bases had any relation to the destroyers, inclined to the view that eventually the vessels would go to Britain in return for the ceded bases."

This country needs and wants those bases. It should have acquired them long ago. But any thought of bartering away part of our Navy for them—and a vital part, authorities assert—should be squelched at once, if anybody is considering it.

Let us take Mr. Roosevelt at his word and assume that he is not contemplating any such deal as that. The fact remains, however, that he is seriously considering the transfer of 50 destroyers to the British. There have been trial balloons and feelers along this line for months. General Pershing's speech was only one part of the campaign. Prointervention columnists have been pounding steadily at the subject. And many of the arguments have been eloquent, persuasive, moving.

To persons who may have been carried away by these pleas we recommend close reading of the radio address by Senator WALSH, reprinted in part in the Mirror of Public Opinion today. Senator WALSH is a Democrat, a sincere patriot, and generally an administration supporter. As chairman of the Senate Naval Affairs Committee he presented to the American people 3 months ago one of the finest, most rational reports on national defense in our history. Now he makes a devastating case against the destroyer deal on the two major grounds that (1) it would dangerously weaken the country's defenses; (2) it would be an act of war.

Yet this is the action Mr. Roosevelt is reported contemplating, and without the consent of Congress. Attorney General Jackson 2 months ago cited a 1917 law that caused abandonment of the proposed transfer of 20 Navy torpedo boats to Britain—a law specifically forbidding sale to any belligerent nation of an American naval vessel. But now a group of lawyers, men not connected with the Government, have evolved a tortured interpretation of the law under which they hold the President can give away or sell these vessels by Executive order.

Under this plan Congress is not to be consulted, because it would probably stop the deal. Is this democratic? Or autocratic? What other term than the latter exists to describe an action by one man to evade the restraints of the people's representatives, to dodge the judgment of the Attorney General, in order to aid England at the expense of our own defense?

Our people sympathize with the British in their fierce battle against nazi-ism. They want every legitimate form of aid sent to England, and with all possible speed. But on an impetuous step which weakens our defenses, a step opposed by high naval authorities, they must draw the line.

CHAIRMAN WALSH AGAINST ADMIRAL STERLING

Another retired admiral has sounded off on the proposed sale of 50 or more American destroyers to England. In an article released by the United Press on Tuesday, Rear Admiral Yates Stirling, Jr., retired, strongly endorses the transfer, and says these ships "will be fighting for America most effectively by being added to the British Navy."

This is typical of the bellicose retired admirals. It echoes the opinions of Admiral Yarnell, retired, and Admiral Standley, retired, which we commented upon Monday. It is particularly typical of Stirling's chronic war-hawk attitude. A few instances: On August 29, 1939, before the European war began, he told a veterans' meeting, "We should, instead of keeping out of foreign disputes that will affect our prosperity and security, go into them with both feet." As far back as last October 19 he urged that the United States join the Allies. Last Memorial Day he called on this country to enter the war "actively."

While the retired admirals are sounding off, the admirals on active service are keeping discreetly silent. One official voice has been heard, however—that of DAVID I. WALSH, chairman of the Senate Naval Affairs Committee, whose report on national defense 3 months ago was a historic document.

WALSH'S view, expressed in a radio broadcast Tuesday, is exactly opposed to that of Admiral Stirling, retired. The destroyer proposal, he said, "makes mockery of our declared policy of neutrality and nonintervention; it is an act of belligerency and war." Then he paid his respects to the retired admirals and other warmongers:

"There is only one group who can honestly favor the transfer of our destroyers. This group has advocated our entrance into the European war from the beginning."

"Why gamble with the United States Fleet?" Senator WALSH asked. Let Admirals Stirling, Standley, and Yarnell, retired, answer that one.

Attitude of Railroad Brotherhoods Toward Conscription

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR CAPPER

OF KANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 20 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

LETTER FROM RAILROAD BROTHERHOODS

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter signed by the chief officers of the five railroad brotherhoods in opposition to the so-called Burke-Wadsworth conscription bill.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEAR SIRS: The undersigned chief executives of the organizations representing engineers, firemen, conductors, trainmen, and yard-men employed on the railroads of the United States have this day given consideration to the provisions of the proposed compulsory peacetime draft or conscription bill which contemplates the inducting into the military and naval service of the United States in the immediate future of some hundreds of thousands of citizens of this country for a period of training.

We refer to the Burke-Wadsworth bill now before Congress for consideration and feel that you should be made acquainted with our views, which we are confident reflect the views of the membership of these organizations employed on American railroads.

BORDER ON DICTATORSHIP

We are in general agreement with the prevailing sentiment in the United States that every support should be given to adequate measures necessary to the protection of our democratic institutions against attack from the force of dictatorship, both within and without our country. However, grave doubt exists in many quarters with respect to the wisdom of enacting a peacetime conscription bill when it is believed other adequate measures are available. Such proposal borders closely on the principle of dictatorship, and we hold the view that regimenting our people is un-American and unnecessary.

NO MONOPOLY OF PATRIOTISM

Patriotism is not the monopoly of those who are feverishly urging this conscription bill. We may rightly assume that all citizens are patriotic and, if given the opportunity and impressed with the necessity for their doing so, they will volunteer their services in defense of our country.

At present there is a vast army of unemployed, thousands of whom would be desirous of enlisting in the military and naval service if given an opportunity to do so, but they are so circumscribed by technical military and naval physical requirements that many of them are precluded from voluntary enlistment. Consideration should be given to assisting them in removing minor physical defects so that they may be acceptable as volunteers.

BLOW AT DEMOCRACY

Compulsory military service in time of peace is the very antithesis of freedom. It involves an infringement on the very principles of democracy which it is invoked to defend.

It imposes upon the individual a mandate to give service which he may not be in position to render without serious sacrifices on the part of himself or his family or both; and this at a time when there are thousands of other individuals who would be glad to avail themselves of the opportunity to serve if such opportunity were not denied by the restrictive rules observed by the recruiting service.

WILL COLOR WHOLE LIFE

The youth of our country who are inducted into the military and naval services under the principle of conscription and who are made to serve will quite naturally acquire the viewpoint that forceful means should be adopted in all the affairs of life as an avenue to achieve desired ends.

While you are giving thought to the Burke-Wadsworth bill, let not the hysteria of the moment sweep you into supporting such a drastic and ill-advised change in the American way of life. Democracy means that the state exists to serve the individual.

CREATES DANGEROUS MACHINE

The program at present contemplated will cause hundreds of thousands of our youth to become war minded and will, if carried out, establish the fabric of a giant war machine which experience teaches us cannot and will not be permitted to rust in peace.

War games inevitably lead to war. The voluntary enlistment principle confines and restricts the dissemination of war mindedness to actual necessities through the longer term of service, and above all, preserves the principle of democracy in its strictest sense.

INFRINGES CIVIL LIBERTIES

These organizations are wholeheartedly in accord with the establishment and maintenance of an adequate national defense and their membership will not be found wanting in any support of such proper measures, but we are convinced that under present conditions the regimenting of our people according to the contemplated military pattern is unnecessary and is an infringement upon the civil liberties which they may reasonably expect to enjoy.

We trust that your committee will not favorably report the Burke-Wadsworth military-conscription bill.

Respectfully yours,

A. JOHNSTON,
Grand Chief Engineer, Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers.

J. A. PHILLIPS,
President, Order of Railway Conductors of America.

D. B. ROBERTSON,
President, Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen.

A. F. WHITNEY,
President, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen.

President, Switchmen's Union of North America.

Deportation of Harry Bridges

OF
HON. LELAND M. FORD
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 20, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE LOS ANGELES TIMES OF AUGUST 15, 1940

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Los Angeles Times of August 15, 1940:

[From the Los Angeles Times of August 15, 1940]

ENOUGH INVESTIGATIONS

The proposal of Senators SCHWELLENBACH and AUSTIN to have another investigation of Harry Bridges instead of ordering his deportation is mere stalling. Bridges has been investigated often and completely and the chance that any new facts would be developed is very slight.

As for an investigation by the Justice Department, to expect that, under a politician like Attorney General Jackson in a campaign year, to result in firing this pernicious alien back where he came from is to expect too much. Whatever Jackson's opinion of Madam Secretary Perkins, which cannot be very high, he would be reluctant to reverse her action in the matter. He would be still more reluctant to reverse his friend, James M. Landis.

While it was undoubtedly the public scandal of the Bridges case that caused the President to transfer deportation out of the hands of the Labor and into the Justice Department, if Jackson had any desire to investigate Bridges, he has already had plenty of opportunity to start and he has done nothing. If Congress ordered him to do so, he would have to make a gesture, but that it would be more than that is unlikely.

Unless Congress itself acts, Bridges will not be deported until there is a change of administration at Washington or unless some he-organization such as the American Legion adopts District Attorney Fitts' San Diego suggestion and removes him by the seat of the pants.

Air Route From Norfolk to Cincinnati

OF
HON. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS
OF NORTH CAROLINA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, August 20 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE ELIZABETH CITY (N. C.) DAILY ADVANCE

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an editorial from the columns of the Daily Advance, published at Elizabeth City, N. C., issue of Saturday, August 10, 1940, entitled "May the Board So See It," which editorial interests itself in an application for a certificate of convenience and necessity to fly the Norfolk, Va., Knoxville, Tenn., and Cincinnati, Ohio, route. I have been greatly interested in this application, for the granting of it would provide North Carolina with an east-to-west air line which is so badly needed in my commonwealth, in particular view of the fact that we are not so fortunate at the present time as to have transportation facilities of that sort, and I am further interested for the reason that it is my opinion that the inauguration of such a route would lend itself to our national-defense program.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Elizabeth City (N. C.) Daily Advance of August 10, 1940]

MAY THE BOARD SO SEE IT

Not available when Pennsylvania-Central filed its application for a certificate of convenience and necessity to fly the Norfolk-Knoxville-Cincinnati route, but interesting and competent notwithstanding, it seems to the Daily Advance, are figures on the business of the Pennsylvania-Central Airlines Co. on the route from Norfolk to Washington.

For the 3 months beginning May 1, 1940, the line has handled a total of 3,806 revenue passengers as compared with a total of around 500 revenue passengers a month when the line was first established.

In the matter of air express, shipments number 1,264 for the first 6 months of this year, which is more than all shipments handled during 1939.

Air mail dispatched from Norfolk over the period the line has been in operation will amount to more than $80,000,000.

These figures provide, as pointed out by the Norfolk Ledger-Dispatch, concrete evidence of the capacity of such a service as that proposed to be established between Norfolk and Cincinnati by way of Elizabeth City, Rocky Mount, Raleigh, Greensboro, Winston-Salem, Asheville, and Knoxville to generate patronage as it goes along.

When, then, it is remembered that North Carolina, through which a great portion of the proposed service would operate, ranks higher in population, industry, and potential traffic than many States or sections now enjoying air services, and when it is remembered that the proposed service would provide the only east-west air line between Washington and Charleston, is not the wisdom of its operation so obvious as to make out a case for the granting of a certificate of convenience and necessity without further ado? The Daily Advance sincerely hopes that the Civil Aeronautics Board, reviewing all the factors in the case, may so see it.

Insurance That Really Insures

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 20, 1940

ARTICLE BY HAROLD PUTNAM

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under the privilege granted to me to extend my remarks, I include therein an interesting article which appeared recently in the Tribune, a newspaper published in my district, written by Harold Putnam and entitled "Insurance That Really Insures."

INSURANCE THAT REALLY INSURES

(By Harold Putnam)

It is so seldom that the State of Massachusetts ever forgets its Puritanical ways long enough to dream up a valuable new twentieth-century program that a very special cheer is in order for our own Division of Savings Bank Life Insurance.

More than 30 years ago a progressive young attorney felt it was time the State or National Government did something to provide low-cost insurance for its citizens. Because he was an Einstein for figures and a Job for patience, he forced the usually complacent legislators of the Commonwealth to make insurance as easily obtainable as a postage stamp and almost as cheap.

He wasn't very popular in some quarters. He still isn't even though the years have been kind to him and even though American history will record Louis Brandeis as the great jurist who carried on the liberalism of Oliver Wendell Holmes in the Supreme Court.

Today saintly Louis Brandeis is an old man. But he's still interested in the record of Savings Bank Life Insurance. He's as tickled as a boy when someone risks a financial neck to say a good word for the savings-bank program. For it's still hazardous to buck the interests who hate low-cost insurance.

Throughout a vigorous and useful life he's fought the antisocial entrenchments of organized financial monopoly. Simply, at his Chatham retreat these summer days, he'll tell you: "If I can save the little fellow a dollar through an honest insurance program, that's just as good as putting a dollar in his pay envelope."

Savings Bank Life Insurance has hoed a tough row. In more than 30 years only one State—New York—has been able to pass enabling legislation to give its people the benefits of the low-cost program. This healthy youngster, savings bank insurance, has had difficulty making itself heard above the din of its sickly big brother, private insurance.

But the story is beginning to make an impression in important places. Judd Dewey, of the Bay State division, went to Washington last spring to testify before the Temporary National Economic Committee. Armed only with a single page of statistics, comparing private and savings bank life insurance, he caused fact-weary Senators to sit up and gape.

And the facts have not been challenged. But a well-organized conspiracy of silence has seen to it that they have not been publicized. Private insurance in many instances costs from almost twice to almost four times as much as savings-bank life insurance. The financial Frankensteins didn't want that to get noised around.

The tabulation that startled the gruff old Senators was prepared by Massachusetts State Actuary Eugene F. Caldwell. It is known as Form N–1–35 and is available at the division of savings bank life insurance at the statehouse.

The report shows that savings-bank life insurance makes available 10 years of $1,000 worth of insurance for a man aged 35 for only $28.90. The total 10-year cost in private companies ranges from $51.95 to $103.20. Senatorial eyes popped.

Fortunately for the fulfillment of the democratic dream an idealist puts over an ideal every now and then. Brandeis was democracy's twentieth-century dreamer. Luckily for the people of our times, he was also one of the great legal minds of his day; clever enough in the cunning ways of the law to force the politicians of the Bay State to do something that was good for all the people and of no financial benefit to them as legislators.

The savings banks of the Commonwealth have been making this low-cost insurance program work. Able administrators in the statehouse have kept the wheels turning. Democrats (with a small d) everywhere have turned their eyes to Massachusetts to see how this idea survives in the face of cruel opposition.

The record today speaks for itself. Form N–1–35 made so much noise that many people began to wonder where they'd been for 30 years and why they hadn't heard more about savings bank life insurance. They're beginning to know.

Louis Brandeis is a soft-spoken man. He had the intellect to devise the program and the legal talents to secure the necessary legislation, but he's lacked the wiles of the propagandist to force his dream to the attention of the whole Nation.

But if you could pull up a chair in his Chatham living room, he'd smile at you and say: "If I can save the little fellow a dollar through an honest insurance program that's just as good as putting a dollar in his pay envelope.

Congestion of War Industries

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WRIGHT PATMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 20, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE TEXARKANA GAZETTE

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Texarkana Gazette of August 18:

[From the Texarkana Gazette of August 18, 1940]

CONGESTION OF WAR INDUSTRIES

While it was planned to scatter war defense industry over a wide area in locations as far distant from seacoasts and international boundaries as possible, in order that there might not be congested areas where attacks could be concentrated, developments thus far show that both war orders and industrial expansion is gravitating toward already well established industrial areas close to the seaboard and the international border on the east and north.

The allocated munitions load, for instance, is centered in the 10 northeastern States of Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, Ohio, Illinois, and Michigan, almost to the exclusion of all other States.

The following figures show where the bulk of the war plants and Government contracts are being placed:

New England	$30,897,617
Middle Atlantic	85,169,009
South Atlantic	7,351,919
East North Central	12,424,284
East South Central	1,832,089
West North Central	5,446,857
West South Central	871,177
Mountain	1,574,181
Pacific	1,585,237
Location unknown	10,778,327

The West South Central group is composed of Arkansas, Louisiana, Oklahoma, and Texas, to which less than one million has been allotted, the division among the four States being as follows:

Arkansas	$20,109
Louisiana	10,964
Oklahoma	76,690
Texas	763,414
Total	871,177

The east-south-central area shared only a little better, as also is the case with the mountain and Pacific areas. New England and Middle Atlantic get the lion's share.

The trend is the same as that which existed just before and during the World War. There was great concentration of industries in areas already congested. This caused migration of both skilled and common labor from other regions, much to their detriment. While these areas suffered because of those facts, the overly built-up industrial areas had their troubles after the war, when war industries were choked off, leaving large numbers of workers stranded far from their original homes.

It is important that there be a minimum of concentration not only for the greater benefit of the most area while municipal munitions and war equipment are being turned out, but for the protection of all regions when demand drops to a minimum after the present emergency has passed.

It is important also that war industries be scattered as a defense measure in itself. It is far easier for Germany to inflict damage upon British war industries than for the British to damage the German industries, because the British industries are congested and the German industries are scattered.

"On Order"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. PARNELL THOMAS

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 19, 1940

LETTER FROM HON. J. PARNELL THOMAS OF NEW JERSEY

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter which I have today addressed to the Secretary of War, and which contains observations made by me in regard to the defenses of Puerto Rico and the Panama Canal on my recent trip to these two United States possessions.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., August 19, 1940.

Hon. HENRY L. STIMSON,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: It is important that you immediately investigate the deplorable state of our military preparedness in both Puerto Rico and in the Panama Canal Zone. I have just returned from a visit to these United States possessions and, frankly, I am deeply shocked at what I observed. Certainly in Panama, which I had visited 3 years ago, I expected to find favorable improvement, but I regret to advise that outside of structural additions and a moderate increase in antiaircraft defense, I found nothing in the way of increased preparedness that would warrant handsprings. The failure of the War Department to bring about marked changes in our Panama Canal defense within the last 3 years is beyond human understanding.

Abraham Lincoln once said: "Let the people know the truth and the country is safe." Perhaps the same thing is true today. At any rate all foreign powers must know the sad state of affairs in Panama and Puerto Rico, so certainly, therefore, there is no sense in keeping it from our own people. I will, accordingly, present to both you and to our people the observations which I recently made with the hope that quick and necessary adjustments will be forthcoming. I am also passing on certain recommendations which I hope will be helpful.

PUERTO RICO

While this island of 100 miles in length is supposed to be the outer guard of the defenses of the Panama Canal it nevertheless is practically totally unequipped to even repel an insurrection, let alone an attack from without, for at present we have some 3,500 troops stationed on an island with some 2,000,000 people. The morale, though, of our small body of troops is excellent; the officers are capable but the equipment is almost totally deficient. There are no heavy coastal guns, only a small amount of field artillery and antiaircraft defense is almost totally lacking.

The Air Corps is so weak—12 planes—it is a crime. The Sixty-fifth Infantry (native troops) is a very well-trained and highly disciplined unit. It is one of the bright spots in the Puerto Rican military establishment. The small-arms equipment for all of the troops is antiquated; old weapons and old methods are used in training; mechanized equipment and mechanized training do not exist.

PANAMA

I visited the Panama Canal Zone 3 years ago and therefore I was much interested to see what changes had taken place in the interim, but outside of an improvement in antiaircraft defense, there has been little in the way of betterment.

Air Corps

The Air Corps, which would ordinarily be the strongest defensive arm for the Canal, is where it was 3 years ago. The number of modern planes on hand is a joke, there being only 23 modern pursuit planes. The small number of other pursuit planes on hand is antiquated and hardly good enough for training purposes. The bombers available are of short range, and then there are 10 observation planes which are nothing more than nineteenth-century hacks.

There have been five accidents since July 22, 1940, in the Panama air corps, three pilots having been killed.

Two new flying fields are under construction, one in the zone and one a number of miles north of the zone. Both of these fields will have large runways and in the case of Howard Field, at least, very modern hangers. It is my opinion, though, that a foolhardy blunder is being made at Howard Field by placing the hangars in the open, for some of these hangars, if not all of them, could be readily constructed in the side of existing large hills. I understand, from a reliable source, that consideration has been given to this plan but that to date it has not received approval. If the new open-field hangars are to be anything like existing hangars in the Panama Canal Zone, they must necessarily afford an excellent target for enemy bombers, so I think it is essential that we discontinue the plan of constructing the open-field hangars in order to place them in the side of hills, as has been so successfully done by European nations.

The men serving in the Air Corps are not equipped with any grounds weapons other than pistols and therefore would be unable to defend themselves and their equipment against enemy parachute troops.

Coast Artillery

This is well situated. The guns are heavy and in good condition but, like everything else, the number is too small. One of the greatest criticisms which I must make of the Coast Artillery is that the guns are not turreted as a protection to the crews against aerial machine-gun fire, nor is there any semblance of camouflage.

The crews are well trained and their morale is good. The officers know their business.

Ammunition is in good supply, but there is no reserve of heavy guns.

Antiaircraft

There has been substantial improvement in antiaircraft defense in the 3-year period. Searchlights are numerous and well placed; range finders are modern and in good condition, but like everything else, there is no reserve supply.

The guns are somewhat antiquated, most of them being of the old 3-inch variety. There are no new 90 mm. guns on hand, and none of the new 37 mm. guns. We are no better than 50 percent equipped in antiaircraft defense in the Canal Zone today.

As in the case of the Coast Artillery, there has been little camouflaging of gun positions. In fact, I saw only one camouflaged battery.

All guns are now being manned with full crews. The morale of the men and officers is excellent and the positions alert for emergencies.

Field artillery

The field artillery is relatively good, but like other arms, lacking in quantity. Pack artillery is excellent; both the officers and men are considerably above the average physically and fit to stand almost any hardship. Pack animals are in good condition. The guns, particularly the 75 mm. howitzers, are modern and in fair supply. Ammunition, though, is not sufficient.

Infantry

The Infantry is totally lacking in modern equipment. There are on the average about 35 gas masks to every 129 men. The gas mask shortage, incidentally, is the rule all over the zone.

The supply of hand grenades is far below natural requirements. In fact, there is about one hand grenade to every soldier in the Panama Canal Zone. There is a small supply of antitank guns on hand, which arrived in May, but there is no ammunition as yet for these guns. No modern automatic rifles—the supply of old automatics is inadequate.

Another criticism which I would make is that there is not enough time devoted to drill, and much too much time spent on matters which add little to the military training of a soldier, such as construction of new barracks.

One whole Infantry regiment does not even have a drill ground and another regiment has spent practically all of its time while in the zone in building houses. Such work should be done by the Engineer Corps. Most of the regiments have to supply sabotage and transit guards; the latter guards are placed on ships going through the Canal, which work should be assumed by either the Navy or the Marine Corps, as both of these services are much more familiar with the operation of ships than are doughboys.

Motor equipment

Almost no prime movers. I understand that on the Pacific side there are three prime movers which, as you know, is the latest model of mechanized transportation. The ordinary truck supply is unable to meet present needs. Available motor equipment is good, but of "the olden days" variety.

General

The soldiers, however, even though meagerly equipped and outside of their lack of knowledge of modern weapons, are probably the best in the world. Their morale is excellent; they are in good health, smart, and well disciplined. The officers, with a few exceptions, are capable and deserving. There is a tendency, however, on the part of the officers to think too much of the way we "used to do things," too much thought about living conditions and not enough on what repels the enemy. This may be, however, the result of instructions from Washington. For instance, all new construction by contract is of the de luxe variety, an open invitation to enemy bombers. Some of the forts and posts look more like summer resorts than they look like centers of defense. I agree that we should afford both the officers and the soldiers recreation and rest centers, but I cannot help but believe that some of the recreation places in the zone, particularly for the officers, are bordering on the luxurious.

I think that a check-up in the attitude of the War Department toward the defense of the Panama Canal is not only timely but urgently necessary. I recommend that some of the higher-ups in the War Department visit Panama, see for themselves, and then upon their return force through the essential requirements. Let's not just determine the need for matériel for our insular possessions from a swivel chair in Washington. The War Department should realize that we cannot defend the Panama Canal with fancy swimming pools, elaborate officers' clubs, and golf courses.

Further, we should without delay complete the Trans-Isthmian Highway running between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans. There remains only 20 miles of this highway to be built, but these same 20 miles remained unfinished when I visited Panama 3 years back. This project has been hanging fire for years. The failure to complete it is both a scandal and a disgrace.

Another important step which we should take is to place all oil tanks and ammunition reserves below gound. At present both are invitations to and targets for airplane bombers and shell fire.

While I fully realize that the War Department is strenuously attempting to solve some of our defense problems, nevertheless many of us are irritated by the delays and by the apparent inefficiency and red tape in high administrative circles. I personally feel that there is no excuse for the lack of progress over the past 3 years in the defense of the Panama Canal, and it is my belief that if all the money that has been appropriated by the Congress for the Army had been used for defense purposes we would be properly equipped today, and yet we are led to believe by persons well up in the present administration that the hundreds of millions of dollars appropriated have been put to good use. I am frankly of the opinion that in the case of the Army, instead of it having been put to good use, it has been forced into nondefense channels, of which Puerto Rico and the Panama Canal Zone are striking examples.

Mr. Secretary, I also have another matter which I intend writing you about in the next few days, and that is the matter of transportation of troops. On my recent trip I was able to make certain observations along these lines, and I think I am in a position to make some recommendations to you.

I am sorry that I had to make this letter as long as it has turned out to be, but in view of its importance I think it necessary to tell as complete a story as possibile.

Thanking you for your patience and hoping that that which I have written will be of interest to you and that you will soon be able to make whatever corrections are necessary, I am,

Sincerely,

———— ————.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. A. F. MACIEJEWSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 20, 1940

Mr. MACIEJEWSKI. Mr. Speaker, the Seventy-sixth Congress may well be one of the most significant in the history of our great Nation. The war in Europe, with its ruthless conquest of the small nations of that hemisphere, has left the rest of the world aghast.

We, as representatives of the people of America, have been called upon to enact into law measures designed to protect our country from invasion, have appropriated moneys to assist in the rehabilitation of those countries which have been destroyed, and many other important measures affecting the well-being of our own country and the world generally. However, in my humble opinion, I do not believe there is a more important or a more humanitarian measure come before a Congress than that proposed in the bill, H. R. 10323, to provide a temporary haven from the dangers or effects of war for European children under the age of 16, which was reported favorably to this body by the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization a few days ago.

The purpose of this bill is to authorize the issuance of visitors' visas for temporary admission into the United States to European refugee children under the age of 16 years, regardless of their nationality. Further, the bill would remove the existing discrimination against children of certain nationalities who cannot get immigration visas because their national quotas are full and who cannot get visitors' visas because they cannot prove a clear ability to leave the United States when the present emergency is over.

Extensive hearings were held by the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, of which I happen to be a member, on various bills and House joint resolutions introduced by Members of this House, namely, the gentleman from Michigan, Hon. JOHN LESINSKI; the gentleman from Illinois, Hon. ANTON F. MACIEJEWSKI; the gentleman from Rhode Island, Hon. HARRY SANDAGER; the gentlewoman from New York,, Hon. CAROLINE O'DAY; the gentleman from California, Hon. FRANCK HAVENNER; and the gentleman from Michigan, RUDOLPH G. TENEROWICZ. At the conclusion of the testimony taken at the hearings the committee voted to report out H. R. 10323, which accomplishes the purposes as specifically proposed by the authors of the several bills and resolutions.

The bill permits visas to be issued to children under 16 years of age who are seeking to enter the United States as temporary visitors to be safe from the dangers or the effects of war, notwithstanding (1) they are under 16 years of age, unaccompanied by, or not coming to one or both of their parents; (2) their tickets or passage are paid for with the money of another, or they are assisted by others to come; or (3) their tickets or passage are paid for by any corporation, association, society, municipality, or foreign government, either directly or indirectly. It further provides, however, that in all cases assurances must be given that are satisfactory to the Attorney General that such children will be properly cared for and will not become public charges. Attention is directed to the fact that this proposed legislation will not entail an additional cost upon our Government and that existing administrative machinery is ample to take care of the additional work incident to the administration of the provisions of this bill.

To prove to the rest of the world that America is still willing to do its share toward rehabilitating the distressed, let me urge that this bill be enacted into law.

The Propaganda for the Draft Is in Full Swing

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARTIN L. SWEENEY

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 20, 1940

ARTICLE BY HUGH RUSSELL FRASER, "INSIDE WASHINGTON"

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a very timely article by the distinguished author, Hugh Russell Fraser, responding to the story Snuff Boxes and Safety, by Ruth Finney, newspaperwoman, which appeared in the Scripps-Howard newspapers in a recent issue. Mr. Fraser, an outstanding American, does credit in exploding this sob story, one of the many we can expect by controlled newspaper writers whose ears are constantly attuned to their master's voice.

INSIDE WASHINGTON

(By Hugh Russell Fraser)

The propaganda for the draft is in full swing.

Most vicious single sample of it was recently headlined in the Scripps-Howard newspapers. Written by Ruth Finney, a specialist in gushy sob stories, it appeared in every newspaper in the chain on August 14, 1940, under the title "Snuff Boxes and Safety."

For pure and unadulterated nonsense and number of half truths it hit a new all-time low. And yet to the uncritical reader, who consults his fears and not the hard realities, it was a masterpiece. Indeed, it was and is exhibit No. 1.

The story opens with a comparison between the debate on conscription now going on in the Senate and a similar debate in the British Parliament a year ago. The inference, of course, is that if Hitler can invade England, 22 miles from the Continent, so also can he as easily invade the United States, 3,000 miles away. She avoids the bald statement but leaves the inference.

All the way through the story the United States is placed in a similar position with Britain. In fact, the names of the two countries are used almost as geographical synonyms. No attempt has been made to be fair.

No suggestion or even so much as a hint is given that perhaps the two countries are not in the same geographical situation. Army and Navy experts testified at length before the Senate Naval Affairs Committee and declared that the enormous technical difficulties in the way of an invasion of the United States by any foreign power were so formidable as to make such an attempt wholly impractical.

To cite the latest careful analysis, Hanson Baldwin, military expert of the New York Times, writing in the August Harpers, says: "Probably the maximum force that could be transported—even if control of the sea were wrested from us—would not be much larger than 50,000 men."

No, no analysis or contrast is made by Ruth Finney. Such an attempt would defeat the purpose of a propagandist. The specialist in sob stories deals in half truths. Hard realities would becloud the issue and lead to a little calm thinking. They must be avoided as so much poison.

True to the title of the story—the title which the Washington News happened to carry—fun is poked at references in the debate to George Washington and Daniel Webster. It seems Webster and Washington are synonymous—again by inference, of course—with snuffboxes in the Senate. And snuffboxes in the Senate—oh, yes, my dear—are out of date. And that if Webster denounced conscription—well, you know, he didn't know about Hitler and how he is going to sail into New York Harbor tomorrow!

In one paragraph, fun is poked at Senator DANAHER, of Connecticut, because he had the effrontery to demand in the Senate just what the grave military and naval emergency was that necessitated a sudden resort to the draft of millions of men when it would take years to even adequately equip the Army we now have. Again references are made to the British Parliament. Again fun is poked at—this time, Senator WHEELER, because he suggests that armed invasion of the United States is a slim possibility. And the writer holds up her hands in holy horror at this statement because, she says, she can read headlines in the newspapers out on the street reading: "Bombers Blast Britain. Zero Hour Near!"

The sob sister has the jitters. One can almost hear her screaming—in fact, running from the Senate gallery with hands plugged firmly to her ears lest she hear these terrible men, WHEELER and NORRIS and LA FOLLETTE and VANDENBERG and TAFT.

The very sight of these men who plead with the Senate to face some practical and hard realities nauseates her. What! These men who say that a Nazi, or any other kind of a bomber, cannot operate more than 750 miles from their bases when, as a matter of fact, they are wiping out Britain 22 miles away! Why, it is incredible! Oh, stop these men! Please! Please! I can't stand it!

But Ruth Finney does not merely scream out her fear. She writes paragraphs that indicate she stands on her tiptoes and fairly shakes with it! She yields herself wholly and completely to it. And it is the kind of fear that thrills! Not every reporter can experience it. It only comes to those who give themselves up to it absolutely and perfectly.

Hitler in New York! Hitler on Atlantic beach heads! And, she says, the American Navy "6,000 miles away from Atlantic beach heads." This last statement is plainly false. The Atlantic Squadron is in the Atlantic, Ruth Finney to the contrary. The truth not only is that the Atlantic Fleet is right at this moment in the Atlantic, but it also happens that Hanson Baldwin, one of the outstanding military and naval experts, who has studied military and naval organizations abroad, says in the August Harpers: "The Atlantic Squadron—contrary to general belief—is not a push-over for any power." And that even without our coastal defense.

The No. 1 sob sister, however, is especially incensed at the Senate galleries which applaud the anticonscription cause. It seems also that they applaud—horror of horrors!—those speakers who suggest that "wealth should be drafted as well as men."

She continues:

"So the debate moves slowly on, safe from interruption today or tomorrow by bombs or the tramp of invading feet. Just as Hitler said it would."

The fact that Hitler never once mentioned the Senate of the United States, or the House, or the debate therein, past or future, does not deter Miss Finney. It is a good phrase to tack on. Besides, it's real scary. Anything to frighten people.

For the truth is simple: Only by concealing the facts or by distorting them beyond recognition can you frighten people. Only by dealing in half-truths can you impair their judgment and warp their reason.

Is it true that the modern bomber has an effective range of 500 miles? Then let's not tell the people that. Pretend the correct figure is six times that amount.

Is invasion of the United States, within the next several years, a practical impossibility? Then let's not tell the people that. Let's talk about what Hitler is doing to Britain 22 miles away—and infer plenty, you know.

It is easy to scare people.

And—oh yes, my dear—it's so exciting. You don't know what a thrill you get. But you must give yourself up wholly and completely to it. Really, it's the grandest feeling. Yes; and pay no attention to those nasty men in the Senate. Just plug up your ears and scream.

Agriculture, the New Deal, and the Third Term

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHESTER H. GROSS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 20, 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. CHESTER H. GROSS OF PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me at the Path Valley Picnic, Franklin County, August 17, 1940:

We are just starting out on a great political campaign that will no doubt be one of the hardest fought and bitterest campaigns in our political history. We have often heard men on the platform say, "This is the most important election we have ever had." Maybe that was so, but I believe that thoughtful men everywhere agree that the election to be held this fall is of greater importance than any we have yet had, barring none. And I as one of the candidates for office in this campaign intend to assume my fair share of responsibility for the success of the ticket.

And so here today I am throwing down the gage of battle to the New Deal and intend to deal with it through this campaign as though it were an armed bandit standing by my barnyard gate or a kidnaper beside the crib of my first-born. I am not coming to you preaching a doctrine of despair, as some politicians of the country are doing today, for I believe faith, courage, and resolute determination will carry us beyond the present frontiers into a new and better day. Time forbids that I discuss any of the issues of this campaign in great detail today. I shall do that from time to time. But here in rich, prosperous Franklin County, known far and wide for the stability of its people, its agriculture, and its industry, I do want to discuss this agricultural problem in some detail.

After all, farm income is the governing factor of our national economy and agriculture is still the basis of our national wealth. A profitable agriculture solves the dual problem of idle acres in the country and idle men in the city. It is well established that a dollar produced from the soil adds $7 to our collective income. Therefore we find that in 1928 and 1932 our agricultural production was the same but due to declining prices we were short in 1932 in our collective income $43,000,000,000.

Agriculture has been the guinea pig for experiments throughout the past 7 years, and the farmer has been the victim of low prices and no markets for his products and at the same time has seen increased costs of the things he has had to purchase, and taxes have grown more burdensome.

The New Deal, upon the recommendation of Secretary Wallace, has been trying to keep the farmers sweet by large appropriations from the Federal Treasury. In spite of these heavy appropriations, the average farmer's income has gone down about $500 per year. Secretary Wallace in trying to fool the farmer has figured these $3,000,000,000 as farm income. This has not fooled the American farmer, because he knows that every dollar the Government ever gave away they took from somebody before they could give it to him, and that these $3,000,000,000 have simply become a mortgage on the real estate of the country.

Have you ever stopped to think who got these farm subsidies? Do you know that a dozen firms, life-insurance companies, and individuals got $508,841 of this money—more than half a million? Do you know that the richest farmer in this congressional district got $2,350 in 1939 to let some of his acres lie idle? I wonder how many of you know that in 1938 this county received $168,000 from the Federal Government for letting their acres lie idle. That money had to be paid out of the taxes collected from the people, and those idle acres in normal times would have produced about eight times that much money's worth of products.

And while these acres were left to lie idle we were importing into this country vast quantities of products the same as you produce here in this county; beef and butter, and potatoes and tomatoes, and corn and practically every other commodity grown here has been brought in from somewhere outside of this country. We can only find the solution to this farm problem in a sound agriculture policy honestly administered. Had some of the money squandered by the New Deal on agriculture in the last 7 years been spent on research work to find new uses for agricultural products we would be farther along the road to recovery today. The biggest help the American farmer can have from the Government is the Government to see that he has the American market.

Secretary Wallace points to the fact that some South American country purchased twice as many automobiles under a recent trade agreement as they had before. We in turn, on checking the record, find that for that 100 percent increased sale of automobiles we received vast quantities of agricultural products in return. And when we check the record as to how many automobiles were included in that 100-percent increase we find that instead of buying 100 automobiles, as they did in 1937, they bought 200 in 1938.

There isn't a farmer under the sound of my voice today that doesn't know that if we had the American market, that if we had dollar wheat, and 80-cent corn and 10-cent hogs—and these are ordinary prices I am mentioning—Franklin County would buy next year a thousand new automobiles, 300 farm tractors, and everything else in proportion. The American farmer is the greatest consumer we have in the country. He is not looking for cheap money. He is not looking for credit. He is not looking for a hand-out, but he is rightfully demanding fair prices for his products so that he will have money to get rid of the credit he has already created. And all the while the New Deal has been trying to regiment and regulate agriculture we find them making it harder for everyone to get along.

How many of you know that under Wallace's new plan the Federal farm-lending agencies have all been huddled together in one organization and that about the only way to get a farm loan now is to sign on the dotted line, and when you do that you sign away every bit of liberty so far as the individual operation of your farm is concerned?

The Farm Credit Administration right now has $100,000,000 of farmer loans overdue. A considerable part of the $1,600,000,000 in Federal land-bank and land bank commissioner loans are now delinquent, and the Farm Credit Administration has foreclosed on farms to the amount of $130,000,000. I am wondering what the Government is going to do with all the farms that it is getting in its hands. Is it any wonder that the farm leaders of this country are declaring that the Wallace ideas are unsound and dangerous?

Many of the farmers now obtaining loans from the Federal Government are handed a budget as to how they shall spend the money they receive from their farm. I am quite sure that no one ever before thought the time would come in the United States when the Federal Government would resort to this sort of regimentation. The Republican Party does not believe that we have to go into war to restore business and agriculture in this country. Nor do we believe that we have to go down in defeat and surrender our liberties under the Constitution to find the answer to our problems. The average man and woman has an abiding faith in the American system of orderly and balanced constitutional government and in our American system of free enterprise. These 7 long years of the New Deal have been a terrible test to men, but I can assure you that the Republican leaders of this country have stood firm and today stand defiant and rededicated to the fundamentals of the American faith.

America has made up her mind to be free again. Free to prosper according to the bounty which a kindly Providence has entrusted to our care. As I look back through the years and think of the part agriculture has played in our national economy I am convinced that the farmers of America are going to stand out this fall as they never have before in the defense of liberty and constitutional government.

THE NEW DEAL

You will remember in 1932 Roosevelt was elected and took over the reins of government. You will recall the platform of '32. We also know that when he took over—which he really did—he ignored the '32 platform. And then came the "must" legislation, blank-check appropriations, the political purges, and the hand-picked Supreme Court, together with a lot of powers unheard of in America granted to the President. Now he refuses to give them back. The platform of '32 pledged a balanced Budget; pledged a 25-percent reduction in all appropriations. But it did not say when. He immediately started out with the "brain trusts." They constituted and incorporated a group of ideas. We have seen them vanish.

Moley was banished to News Week. Tugwell was exiled. General Johnson retreated. Donald Richberg went back to his legal practice. Frankfurter was promoted to the high court and Jim Farley went to the Yankees. Then came the plugged dollar and the double-header Thanksgiving. Then came the splurge, the surge, the purge, and the dirge. Then came the killing of pigs as well as the plowing under of candidates at Chicago. Then came the blue eagle and some alleged "reds" in high places.

I am now thinking of Ma Perkins and Ickes and Hopkins, and Aubrey Williams, and Sidney Hillman, and a score of others in executive positions in the Federal Government whose Americanism is questionable. This is the group that is defending Harry Bridges and many other aliens who should be deported.

Then came the $100-a-plate dinners and the $250-a-copy convention books. We remember the 1937 speech in Chicago and now we have the 1940 Chicago "blitzkrieg" to quarantine all the Democrats. Seven years ago they declared war on unemployment. Since that time we have spent money lavishly and experimented in dozens of ways and still we have as many unemployed as we had 7 years ago. What claims the New Deal has for support from these unemployed people now after 7 years is a mystery to me. The Chicago platform continues to promise relief. If they had the solution to this problem why did they not apply it long ago? If they have no plan why do they ask to be continued for 4 years more? The Federal Reserve report for 1940 tells us that we today have 10,000 fewer banks than we had in 1929 and that still we have $5,000,000,000 more deposits than we had in 1929. So that during the last 7 years we have lost 10,000 banks. Bank loans and investments have gone down $7,000,000,000 and deposits have gone up $5,000,000,000 and unemployment still stands at 10,000,000.

We have done a lot of social legislating and that is a grand thing but why talk so much about a 40-hour week when there is no job? Why spend so much time discussing collective bargaining when there is nothing to bargain about? Since 1932 the Congress has appropriated more than $60,000,000,000. In the last 18 months more than $21,000,000,000 has been appropriated. The new tax bill that will soon go into effect contains 360 pages of new taxes and the New Deal mill grinds on. The House has recently passed legislation that would be beneficial to the country as a whole which the New Deal-controlled Senate refuses to act upon. I am referring to the amendments to the Wagner Labor Relations Act and to the Walter-Logan bill as well as other legislation.

The New Deal theory that the less we produce the more we will have has been proven a farce. The theory that we can spend ourselves rich has likewise been exploded. A man on W. P. A. who received a starvation wage for 7 years realizes that he is just where he started, only that he is 7 years older. Relief by way of the Federal Treasury made possible by the reckless appropriation of billions of dollars has not solved our problems. A dollar of relief money spent has solved no one's problems but when a workingman earns a dollar in private industry and walks into the grocery store and lays that dollar on the counter and says give me a dollar's worth of beef, or milk, or potatoes, that is a sale that registers back on the farm where we are wrestling with low prices and depression, too, and it helps solve the workingman's problem as well as the farmer's.

THE THIRD TERM

The third-term question is at last directly before the people. What they propose to do about it I don't know, but I have great confidence in the final judgment of the people and have my own ideas of what is going to happen on November 5. It was George Washington who first said, "The love of power and the proneness to abuse it which predominates in a man's heart is one of those strange human qualities." Then came Thomas Jefferson, who was unwilling to take a third term. Then came Andrew Jackson, who recognized it as a dangerous procedure. Then came the great Democratic convention of 1896, when the flaming crusader, William Jennings Bryan, was coursing through the land. They denounced the third term and declared it to be an unwritten law that no man should be eligible for a third term. That was the Democratic Party speaking.

Then came the resolution in the United States Senate in February 1928, which was adopted almost unanimously, declaring that it would be unwise and unpatriotic and fraught with peril to our free institutions to allow a third term. When we refer to the record as to who supported that resolution we find dear ALBEN BARKLEY first; then there was Senator PITTMAN and Senators HARRISON, ASHURST, GERRY, GLASS, KING, HAYDEN, MCKELLAR, NEELY, SHEPPARD, SMITH, TYDINGS, and WHEELER. All Democrats voting for the resolution. It is just a bit funny when we check those names against 1940 and find how these tried, true, and trusted statesmen of the United States Senate had changed their minds and now decided that a third term would be a first-class dose of medicine for the country.

The third-term idea is not new with the President and was not caused by recent national and international developments. The foundation for it was laid by the President himself in 1936 when he had the Democrats of the Nation abolish the two-thirds rule. That made him the czar of the Chicago carnival with the power to dictate every move of the convention from the White House over the telephone. The President was not drafted; he simply nominated himself in the same manner in which the dictators of Europe are nominating themselves. Dictator procedure runs like this: Who nominated Hitler? Hitler. Who nominated Stalin? Stalin. Who nominated Mussolini? Mussolini. Who nominated Roosevelt? Roosevelt. Who nominated Wallace? Roosevelt. And yet he had Senator BARKLEY at the Chicago convention state that he had no wish to be a candidate for a third term; that he exerted no influence on the delegates; that he did not seek the opinions of the delegates; that he had no desire to continue in office or to be nominated; and, finally, that the delegates were free to vote for any candidate. Yet for 4 years prior to this time, as good men were rising and becoming Presidential timber, President Roosevelt was doing like Charlie McCarthy says, "I'll mow you down," and Wallace plowed them under.

When Secretary Ickes said there can be no other than Roosevelt in 1940 and started his one-man boom the White House accepted it with good grace. When Ickes published his book on The New Democracy he had in mind the continuation of the New Deal and a changed form of government. When Senator GUFFEY issued his new book on Roosevelt Again the White House was silent. When Secretary Wallace in California in 1939 said that Roosevelt would have to be nominated and elected the White House was pleased.

But I want to call attention today to the fact that of these boosters of a third term in the Cabinet not one of them had the courage to go before the electorate of this country and ask for public support, not one of them ever proved their vote-getting ability. They were brought in by the President and placed in the positions they now hold regardless of their interest or ability to serve. There was only one man in the Cabinet who could commandeer votes and that was Postmaster General Farley, and he has now walked out on them. When Governor McNutt came along and the country began focusing its eyes on him the President turned the income-tax experts on him and for 7 months they dogged his footsteps. When Jim Farley expressed his willingness to be a candidate the President said Mr. Farley would make a good President but could not be elected because he was a Catholic. Yet a few days ago before the convention of Governors the President declared that religious intolerance must not be permitted in America.

In the President's acceptance speech he says, "When in 1936 I was chosen by the voters for a second time as President it was my firm intention to turn over the responsibilities of Government to other hands at the end of the term." Here the President clearly indicates that he felt that it was a matter of personal choice with him as to whether he should or should not continue. But I believe that the good-thinking people of America, those who love liberty, who believe in democracy, who want free enterprise to continue and religious tolerance to hold sway are going to tell him on the 5th of November whether he shall be relieved of these duties. They are going to tell him whether he is indispensable or not. They are going to tell him whether he is the only man in 130,000,000 people in whose hands the Government is safe. If we are to reelect Mr. Roosevelt for a third term, I wonder what argument we will present 4 years hence as to why we should not elect him for a fourth term, and so on. So let us have deep, straight, honest thinking as we go among the people discussing this matter of a third term and the departure from the traditions that have been made sacred by usage and custom over 160 years in the life of this Republic.

I attended the Philadelphia convention, and I want to say to you that there was no one who controlled anyone there. I never saw an assembly that was so wide open and refused to be controlled as that group. I had the privilege of a reserved seat on the platform throughout the convention, but on the last day I went to the gallery at the far end of the auditorium in the upper row just to see what I could see and how it felt to sit up there, and as I looked down upon that great convention of 15,000 people under the strong lights, well dressed, happy, representing every walk of American life, I was thrilled when I thought here in the last country in the world where democracy is still enthroned we have the privilege of assembling in a body like this to select the leaders that we want. I was still more thrilled when finally the man that that convention selected appeared on the platform. A man who was born from poor parents on a little farm in the Middle West, who had worked his way up in the world to where men everywhere were talking about him. He was none other than that charming personality, that dynamic character, and that stalwart American, the next President of the United States, Wendell L. Willkie.

Those "Frozen" Funds

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 20 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE WILMINGTON (N. C.) STAR

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I ask leave to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial under the heading "Those 'Frozen' Funds," appearing in the Wilmington (N. C.) Star of the 10th instant.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Wilmington (N. C.) Star of August 10, 1940]

THOSE "FROZEN" FUNDS

Secretary Morgenthau's announcement that the United States is pondering disposition of funds belonging to conquered nations "frozen" in this country includes a hint that they might be seized as part payment on war debts. The Treasurer does not say that this is definitely considered, but the money is here, the governments it belonged to have fallen, and if we do not step in, the only logical course would be to turn them over to Germany which also owes us $1,300,000 and is not likely to pay as long as Adolf Hitler is in power there.

We are constantly told to accept this as a realistic era. Sentimentality in every form is in the discard. This condition may not be pleasant or agreeable. We may want to cling to the softer dealings with other nations, as in the past. But the powers which have gained the upper hand in Europe won't have it that way. Only realities count. And as long as this is so there is no good reason why the United States should not employ their method as far as the money of defunct governments impounded here is concerned.

There are reported $3,500,000,000 of these funds under padlock in this country, almost one-fifth of the total war debts. Their seizure would be justified, we believe, on the score that we have infinitely more right to them than Germany has. Also, their seizure would place another handicap upon Herr Hitler, who would not be able to use them in war purchases.

A Letter From Benedict Arnold to the Government of Uncle Shylock

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARTIN L. SWEENEY

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 20, 1940

LETTER FROM "BENEDICT ARNOLD"

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a letter from Benedict Arnold, specialist in treason, who evidently keeps informed of the persistent efforts of friends of Britain in governmental circles, who not only request but demand that once more we sacrifice our blood and our treasury in the interest of imperialism.

HELL-ON-THE-STYX, August 19, 1940.

To the Government of Uncle Shylock, and especially to Senators Pepper, Minton, Lee, and Sheppard, and Secretaries Stimson and Knox:

With the express permission and approbation of His Satanic Majesty, the ruler of our present abode, and at the command of my dearly beloved King, George III, who, with myself, is in voluntary retirement here, I address to you, in his behalf, the following commands:

Continue your efforts to raise that army to aid England in holding the territory which I, my predecessors, and my successors added to the glorious Empire. Their acquisition cost us so much in blood that we should not be asked to relinquish them now. It is your bounden duty to assist us in holding them.

You, Senators PEPPER and MINTON, will report immediately to England, where your bursts of "oratory" will greatly strengthen our coast defenses. Your hot air can also be used to inflate our balloons.

You, Senator LEE, are ordered to report immediately to Buckingham Palace. The position of court jester is now open, and your antics can be counted upon to amuse the royal children.

You, Senator SHEPPARD, who made such a success of your last great effort, the prohibition law, persevere in your duty to my successor and namesake, George VI. As chairman of the Military Affairs Committee, I am counting on you to raise that army for our defense.

You, Secretary Stimson, will continue in your laudable efforts to find a war for your country. When I, George III, had a secretary of state for war who could not find one, I fired him. Look at the wonderful record my secretaries made. Go thou, and do likewise.

You, Secretary Knox, will continue to work 24 hours a day to get us those 50 "obsolete" destroyers. After you have succeeded in that, will you then return to Britain, with interest, the $15,000,000 your Government exacted from us for the Alabama claims.

His Gracious Majesty also commands me to thank the following Departments of your Government for their cooperation in various instances, as enumerated below:

Your State Department: For ordering your ships and passenger planes to our ports, so that we can take off your mail without any inconvenience to ourselves, and for not questioning our right to do so.

Your Treasury Department: For so ably assisting us in the purchase of war supplies, and for forgiving us our so-called war debt.

Your Navy Department: For the valiant undercover efforts made to supply us with your newer torpedo boats. (D—n that upstart, WALSH.)

Your War Department: For its effort to supply Britain with an army. Think of the wonderful experience it would get fighting for us. Ask France, or Belgium, or Poland.

Your Justice Department: For investigating all propaganda except ours. Your country, in particular, should realize that we never use such dirty stuff. The New York Times and the Herald Tribune take care of all that.

Your Labor Department: For allowing our English actors to monopolize the movies and the stage in your country. (They are so much more polished, you know!)

GEORGE III,
King of Great Britain and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, Destroyer of Washington, Emperor of India, and All Points North, South, East, and West.
By BENEDICT ARNOLD, Secretary.

On my own behalf I offer you honorable gentlemen this little item to ponder over. I received a paltry amount for attempting to sell West Point. Think how much more you can get for selling a country.

And why do you allow such obstructionists as Senator HOLT, Senator LUNDEEN, Congressman SWEENEY, and all others like them, to set that mangy thing called Americanism above the welfare of our empire? Have them transported to England, where they can all be hanged, drawn, and quartered. If you will take my advice on another subject, you will substitute Rule Brittania for that doggerel The Star-Spangled Banner as your National Anthem. You will also delete from your so-called Declaration of Independence all of the infamous references to His Majesty, George III.

By the way, I have never run across my old cronies, George Washington, John Paul Jones, Thomas Jefferson, Commodore John Barry, Richard Montgomery, or Nathan Hale since my arrival in the realm of His Satanic Majesty. Could any of you supply me with their present addresses?

Promising all of you who will assist Britain now a very hot reception upon your arrival here, I am,

Your obedient servant,

BENEDICT ARNOLD.

Aviation Progress and Problems

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JENNINGS RANDOLPH
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 20, 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. JENNINGS RANDOLPH, OF WEST VIRGINIA

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me yesterday over the blue network of the National Broadcasting Co.:

Civil aviation in this country is today at a peak never before reached in any part of the world. Less than 40 years after the first flight by man in a powered aircraft, the United States, its adjoining oceans and its neighboring continent to the south are criss-crossed with air lines of our own creation. Throughout our States and in our Territories, flying has become a major industry. Pilots are being trained by the thousands, factories are rapidly expanding, and everywhere, on the lips of our men and women, the urgent necessity of this expansion is a matter for anxious discussion.

A NEW TRANSPORTATION MEDIUM

On this national aviation day it is important that we look at the record. There is no greater achievement in our history than that written by the men who have broken the trails in the conquest of a new medium of transportation—the upper air. They faced hardships and dangers more dreadful than those of the earlier pioneers and did it with cheerful courage and intensity of devotion that has wrought incredible results. They worked with the tools of modern science, testing, adventuring, driven by a vision of a new world where human beings will have freer movement, better access to the necessities and comforts of living, closer contact with the far reaches of the earth.

It is a story that inspires unending admiration, that stimulates the imagination.

Take first what has happened in commercial air transport. It is only 12 years since the first coast-to-coast service began. Once a day then a small, single-engine plane took off from Newark for the Pacific, carrying mail and an occasional passenger sitting on the mail sacks, in an open cockpit. By the end of July of this year 1940, there were 20 full-fledged, constantly operating air lines in the United States proper, flying 37,180 route miles, in 322 planes.

On July 31, this year, these air lines had made a safety record that is unequalled; a billion and a quarter miles without injury to passenger or crew. In a period of a year and 5 months, they had carried nearly three and a quarter million people.

Outside this country proper, 44,470 miles of American flag lines cross the Atlantic and the Pacific, penetrate Alaska, and circle Mexico, Central and South America. This magnificent job of building air transport in foreign lands has been done entirely by our own people. Buenos Aires, 7,000 miles south of the tip of Florida, is now only 4½ days' flying time away from the United States, and it will, within the next 2 years, be brought within 48 hours of our coast. Hong Kong, in China; Auckland, in New Zealand; Nome, in Alaska—all weeks away by surface ship travel—are now but a matter of days from our eastern cities by this miracle of air transport. Before the war began last fall, it was possible to reach Paris and London in less than 2 days. Lisbon, the only neutral European port now available, is reached in 28 hours.

AIR LINES BUILD GOOD WILL

In times of peace, nothing could do more to bring the citizens of other parts of the world into close contact with us than these services by air. They have been of inestimable value to this country in the building of good will, in fostering new and speedy means of communication by mail, express, and personal travel, and in the opening of undreamed of possibilities for commerce. By the latest example, the inauguration of air service to Australasia this month, we tap an export and import market of $600,000,000 a year, which so far, because of the slowness and infrequency of steamer service, we have had but a small share.

Here in our own country the development of the air mail pick-up-and-delivery system is of vital importance in expanding to hundreds of communities the advantages of air-mail service. More than 125 towns and cities are to be served, and it is my hope and belief that hundreds of points will be added within the next few years.

In time of national emergency these air lines of ours would be of vital importance to our country's safety. Secretary of War Stimson said the other day before the Military Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives, "Air power today has decided the fate of nations." In measuring the extent of our air power, our commercial air lines must be measured, too, for they are an arm of our military air force. As Col. Edgar S. Gorrell, president of the Air Transport Association of America, recently told me, these air lines are more ready than any other industry to respond instantaneously to the demands of a national crisis. In a matter of hours, every resource of the air lines, personnel and equipment, can be devoted to the execution of plans for assisting in the mobilization of our military air force at any point throughout the Western Hemisphere. Unlike any other peacetime industry, the air lines, because of their mobility, bear a unique relationship to the national defense. Of all peacetime industries, this alone can and will be used as a whole, if need be, in the defense of our country, through acting as the vital transportation complement of our military air forces as may be required. It is for this reason that the policy of our War and Navy Departments is to maintain the air lines at all times as a functioning unit. It is more important probably than in the case of any other industry that there should be applied to the air lines the principle of keeping personnel in their civilian positions when our manpower is conscripted, and of providing even for the expansion of our air lines, both in terms of personnel and equipment. This expansion is so important to our national defense that it is entirely probable that the War Department might even assign to the air lines certain of its own personnel and equipment, if need be.

There is another side to the picture of our civil aviation development. It is in the growth of private flying that a nation becomes really airminded. The C. A. A. has accomplished much within the past 2 years. Programs for the increase in the number of civilian pilots, and instruction of mechanics for encouragement of the production of better aircraft, for training more and better instructors, for regulations that make for greater safety—all these have been under way and are bearing fruit. On July 1, this year, there were 41,006 certificated pilots of all grades, 13,873 planes, and 10,230 certificated mechanics. The factories at present have 500 private planes on order and about 400 more transports building for the air lines. This number will naturally increase as the defense program moves ahead. In 1939 private and charter pilots flew 178,000,000 miles, and it is estimated that this will leap to 240,000,000 by the end of 1940.

NATION NEEDS AIRPORTS

We need at once to formulate a Federal-airport program whereby landing fields by the thousands will be built in America. There are many progressive cities not possessing big populations which nevertheless have been farsighted. In my own congressional district, a great modern airport is nearing completion at Morgantown as eloquent testimony to what can be accomplished through cooperation, planning, and hard work.

One of the most gigantic jobs done has been the civilian pilot-training program initiated in 13 colleges as an experiment in the first semester of 1939. The result now is that just under 10,000 young men and women were trained in college and noncollege courses by June 30, and such was the stimulus given to air-mindedness that more than half again as many learned to fly in commercial schools at their own expense. The still further extension of the plan, at the President's request, will add another 50,000 by the end of the college year next June. Of that number the first 16,000 are now being trained in summer courses, the second group will begin their instruction in September, and the third next February. The Army and Navy think so highly of the results obtained that they have assigned liaison officers to work directly with the Civil Aeronautics Authority in coordinating the work with that of the services; 12,485 mechanics were trained in 1939, and under a new program 6,275 are now being trained under the National Youth Administration and many more in private industry for work in the factories, at airports, and on the air lines.

One of the most remarkable features of pilot training has been the degree of safety achieved. In the last war more students were killed while learning to fly than died in battle in France. Under the civilian pilot-training program only three casualties have occurred.

For many years I have been firmly convinced that our aircraft and allied industries are located so as to be vulnerable to possible aerial attack. During debate on the House floor, March 13, 1936, I sought to impress my colleagues with the need, as I saw it, to decentralize our armament-manufacturing plants. At that time I said:

"In this Nation practically every concern manufacturing aircraft is located on the coasts of the United States, and due to the danger from attack we should give serious consideration to the need for aircraft development inland."

At that time I laid the matter before the President, the Secretaries of the War and Navy Departments, the chairmen of the House Committees on Military and Naval Affairs, and also the then Director of Air Commerce.

With each passing month since that time the need for decentralized defense factories has become more apparent. I trust protective action in the expansion program will bring the establishment of defense units in many parts of America which are removed from our borders. It is not too late, but now is the time as actual production begins.

AVIATION MERITS STUDY

There is a growing movement in Congress to establish standing committees on aviation in both the House and Senate. Our shipping has its special committee devoted to our maritime affairs. Our land transportation has its special committee devoted to its peculiar problems. The whole matter of building roads on the ground is given the attention of a special committee. It is entirely proper, therefore—indeed, it is necessary—that transportation by air and the essential matter of building roads in the air should receive the exclusive attention of a standing committee charged with the duty of fostering and developing aviation. Of all forces in the modern world, aviation, more than any other, is changing the very map of the globe. In the greatest legislative body known to mankind, the Congress of the United States, the significance of aviation should be truly appreciated by the creation of standing committees which can devote their labors without mitigation to the further strengthening and development of America's proud position in the heavens.

Indeed, I go further. In the President's Cabinet, instead of having a separate Department of War and a separate Department of Navy with military aviation scattered between them, there should be a single department of national defense under which the three great arms of our Nation's power may be coordinated on an equal footing. Our fighting forces by air, by land, and by water should, on an equal basis, find a place in a single great department with one coordinating head at the Cabinet table. Senator CLARK of Missouri and myself have introduced in Congress legislation which would make this a reality. This proposal will be vigorously pushed.

Again and again during the past year the power of aviation has been impressed upon us by a ruthless invader. May our country learn, while God gives us time, to so nourish our aviation that the Stars and Stripes will fly ever triumphantly over land and sea, over mountain and wave, supreme against the jealousy of unprincipled aggressors.

To this great task we should bend every energy both in government and in private industry.

In building for an indomitable military strength we must, as the President has said, recognize "Civil aviation is * * * the backlog of national defense," and that "The country's welfare in time of peace and its safety in time of war rests upon the existence of a stabilized aircraft production—an economically and technically sound air-transportation system, both domestic and overseas—an adequate supply of well-trained civilian pilots and ground personnel."

PEACETIME AVIATION LIVES

Fortunate it is that through creation of an expanding civil aviation we not only build our military strength but also contribute immeasurably to the pleasure and prosperity of our people in their civilian life. This thought should always be kept uppermost. It is forcefully expressed in a significant statement recently made to me by the Honorable Harllee Branch, Chairman of the Civil Aeronautics Board. "Despite the necessary emphasis today on military aviation," Mr. Branch says, "civil aviation still provides a noteworthy example of American engineering genius. The building of our air transport system and the development of private flying may not have as much appeal now as the filling of the air with defensive aircraft, but its steady climb to usefulness and importance in the past few years is an achievement that is the pride of the Nation. Wars have been fought through the long span of history. Conquerors have come and gone, remaining in most cases only as names for schoolboys to learn. But the story of human progress is largely measured in terms of communication and transportation. The man who built the first wagon wheel did more to push forward the conquest of the earth than Alexander and all his legions. The Wright brothers, with their rickety airplane at Kitty Hawk, wrote the future of the race in brighter letters than any known before. When wars are at an end, man will make the earth little and friendly with this gift of wings."

To this sentiment I add the thought that onward and upward must be the flight orders for America.

Report of the Employment and Civil Service Committee of the Veterans of Foreign Wars

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 20, 1940

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, it is a great privilege for me to have opportunity to ask to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the extremely able and challenging analysis of unemployment and related problems prepared by the employment and civil-service committee of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, under the chairmanship of Mr. Dan Campbell.

REPORT OF THE EMPLOYMENT AND CIVIL SERVICE COMMITTEE

To the Commander in Chief, Officers, and Delegates of the Forty-first Annual Encampment of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States:

For the fifth consecutive year it is the privilege and pleasure of your chairman to address himself to this group. Frankness requires it should be stated, with whatever reluctance, that the problems which directly concern the work of the committee are as acute and perplexing today as they were 5 years ago. However, it is not the veteran only who is a victim of this economic maladjustment of our social system. The people of the entire Nation share the burdens engendered by unemployment in lesser or greater degree. The pressure is greatest, however, upon two groups of our citizens, namely, youth, in the age range from 16 to 24, and the worker who has passed the industrial deadline of 40, into which group the veteran falls. And this latter group is in the most unfortunate position of all, because by the time a man reaches 40, family and other responsibilities have been assumed, so that the loss of a job is not only a great individual misfortune but a major tragedy for all concerned.

Your chairman will not burden you with figures covering the registration and placement of veterans during the past year, other than to submit that both for the year just past and for the entire 5-year period the employment chart bears a striking resemblance to that of a fever patient—a series of erratic ups and downs—but indicating no tendency to reach a crisis and straighten out to show recovery. Then, too, the total number of unemployed does not materially decrease from year to year, and the present estimates range from nine to eleven million so classified.

Unemployment is not only tragic in itself, but has brought many other serious factors into our social and economic life. For example, many students of history insist that a decline in the birth rate of a nation marks a turning point in its history. Whether this is true or not, under normal conditions, the birth rate in the United States was not expected to show a decrease until about 1990. But the economic effects of unemployment has already been reflected in a declining birth rate. When the primary schools open this fall, there will be one-fifth fewer children under 10 years of age than 1930, when enrollment in this group reached an all-time peak. In a time of great unemployment this might seem to be a good thing for the country in many ways. In one survey it was found that in 1933 only 27 percent of those applying for relief work were unmarried, but 5 years later the percentage had risen to more than 50 percent—youth without jobs cannot very well assume the responsibilities of marriage. One of the first major effects of this decrease in the birth rate will be a greatly lessened demand for school buildings, teachers, and so forth, thus further narrowing the field of employment, and this will eventually materially affect the whole system of education, public and private schools and colleges alike.

The present national-defense program is right now being brought into direct contact with one of the most serious effects of unemployment continued over a long period of time, namely, in its recruiting activities. During the World War, from the first draft, 500,000 were rejected as physically unfit for military service, representing approximately 16 percent of the total number examined in that draft. At that time this apparent physical deterioration of the race was the subject of much comment and discussion. Even more disturbing were the results of the Army's present campaign for new recruits. Col. Lloyd B. Magruder, chief recruiting officer of the Second Corps Area, reported that 32 percent of the young men volunteering in that area during May were rejected as physically unfit, and estimated that probably 60 percent of those from the large cities would be rejected for health and other reasons. These figures were so astonishing that your chairman took the matter up with the War Department and is informed that while the 32 percent above referred to was a local situation, yet the average rejections throughout the United States for all causes was 30 percent. During one recent drive to bring the Marine Corps up to full peacetime strength, the recruiting officers left the cities and centered their efforts in the smaller towns and farming communities. There they found a better physical type, but many were rejected on account of bad teeth.

In peacetime the armed forces get most of their recruits from the lower-bracket families, and it is just this group, because of economic conditions, that finds it so difficult to procure the bare necessities to sustain life at anywhere near a normal level, as evidenced by the first physical manifestation of undernourishment, namely, underweight and poor eyesight, the dominant reasons for rejection. One-half of the babies born in one State were born to families on relief. How far reaching this low bracket income group affects employment and American life generally is indicated by the following analysis of the various income groups:

In a survey made by the national resources committee, under the direction of Dr. Hildegardner Kneeland, it was ascertained that the national income was approximately $59,983,000,000 (including the imposed value of homes occupied by their owners), and consumers at 41,000,000 family units and individuals. Of the 29,400,300 families spending nearly $48,000,000,000, the survey showed 14 percent getting under $500 per year; 42 percent under $1,000; 65 percent under $1,500; and 87 percent under $2,500 per year. Ten percent had incomes from $2,500 to $5,000, while only 1 percent had incomes from $10,000 up. Individuals had practically an identical income range. Combining the families and individuals into three groups, it was found that the lower third received under $780 per year, and that fully 70 percent of them were not receiving relief in any form; the middle third averaged $1,076 per year, while the top third averaged just under $3,000. The average for all groups was $1,386. This is the important factor that economists designate as the "buying power of the Nation"—and are agreed that it must be increased by a substantial amount if employment is ever again to attain normal levels.

Obviously, no successful attack can be made upon the problem of unemployment, unless there is much greater production and utilization of consumer goods than is true today. Much of the Government works program has been based upon a "subsistence" wage that has not increased incomes to a point where consumer demand would require the necessary step-up in production that would automatically absorb much of the present unemployment.

It has been suggested that increasing the national income by $10,000,000,000 would be sufficient to provide for the reemployment of the majority of the unemployed of today. When it is considered that approximately 78 percent of all consumer goods sold in the United States is purchased by the approximately 90 percent having incomes of less than $3,000, it will readily be seen that in order to release the necessary purchasing power there must be a decidedly larger increase in the income of that particular group, so that productive activity may be started and, as a result thereof, absorb unemployed workers at a wage scale above the bare subsistence level.

The current efforts to provide an adequate national defense, combined with the production of war material for shipment to Europe, may provide this necessary increase in income. This program has already stimulated employment at "prevailing" rather than "subsistence" wages, thereby increasing purchasing power to support a continuation of the larger production. A report released by the Department of Commerce, under date of July 24, 1940, definitely reflects this by showing that exports to Europe of United States merchandise in June were valued at $344,000,000, a gain of only 8 percent over such shipments in May, but 40 percent larger than the average for the corresponding month of the three immediately preceding years.

However, we cannot become too optimistic as to the effect of the national-defense program upon unemployment. It will most certainly take up some of the slack, possibly all of it, but we definitely know it will not provide a permanent abolishment of unemployment. As a matter of fact, we know that long continued and increasing production of war materials necessarily curtails production of consumer goods and thereby has a tendency to lower the general standard of living. Unless the national-defense program so stimulates normal industry to a point where it can absorb the unemployed, when the program is finally terminated, we will find ourselves face to face with the same old problem—no nearer a permanent solution than it is today. We must regard this, so far as unemployment is concerned, as a purely temporary relief, and should not for a moment be allowed to obscure the imperative need for a constructive program directed toward the removal of this plague of unemployment permanently from our national life.

Another important economic factor in the restriction of purchasing power is taxation. The purpose of taxation in a democracy is to provide ways and means for the ordinary and efficient conduct of the government, requiring each to contribute according to his means. The basic function of taxation has materially changed to include not only the maintenance of government, but to take care of the social problems that arise in our economic life, due in large part to the continuing problem of unemployment. Taxation in order to equalize social conditions is not only a new theory in our government, but is revolutionary. The far-reaching effects of taxation may be visualized to some extent when it is known that in 1937 there were 175,000 taxing units in the United States—Federal, State, county, city, town, village, school district, etc., collecting approximately some $17,000,000,000, and supporting an army of more than 5,000,000 officeholders The average citizen considers taxation as entirely remote from his own direct interests, because the other fellow pays the tax. But every person earning $1,000 a year pays $123.30 tax, or 12.3 percent of his income. These are mostly the so-called hidden taxes. They reach out, not only to the man with a job, but every person receiving income of any kind pays a proportionate share.

It is estimated that an average investment of $8,600 in plant, tools, and equipment is required to give one man a job in private industry. During the 1920's an average of $3,750,000,000 flowed into private business each year, but less than one-fifth of that amount has been going into private business since 1930. More investments means more jobs and more jobs means the best safeguard for our form of government. Congress is now engaged in studying this problem, not so much with a view to reducing taxes—that is quite impossible if our national-defense program is to be successfully carried to completion—but from the standpoint that larger investments, with more jobs and increased national income, will naturally produce greater revenue and make for a better functioning and more secure democratic form of government.

We veterans who have served in our country's wars believe our form of government is the best the world has so far known. Today we are living in the greatest changing period in all history. We have seen the lights of democracy snuffed out, one after the other, in Europe. In our own country there are many questioning whether a democracy can successfully solve the social and economic problems as effectively as other forms of government. There are two groups most vitally affected by unemployment, youth and those over 40.

As to youth, there are 21,000,000 in the United States between 16 and 24 years of age. It is estimated that 3,000,000 are girls who have married, 4,000,000 are still in school, 9,000,000 have jobs, but there are no jobs for approximately 5,000,000.

As to the over-40 group, since 1900 the life span has been lengthened 12 years. The United States Public Health Service made a Nation-wide survey and found that old age is the fastest growing cause of death. Of the 10 deadliest diseases it was found that the first 6 were those in which age is a predisposing factor. It was also ascertained that with the lengthened life span there has been no general increase in the degenerative diseases of late life. In the animal kingdom the life span is 5 times the period required to attain maturity. In man maturity is attained at 21 years, so that instead of three score and ten, the life span of man should be 5 times 21, or 105 years. With the continued advance of medical science, the time will come when old age will practically be the only cause of death, outside of accidents. This is the dream of science which is slowly becoming a reality.

Because the figures of the 1940 census are not yet available, it is necessary to go back to other years for data on old age. According to the 1900 census, our population was, in round numbers, 70,000,000, of whom 4,300,000, or 6 percent, were over 60 years of age. In 1930, with a population of 122,800,000, there were 10,385,000, or 8 percent, over 60 years of age. All census figures from 1880 on show a consistently steady increase in the number of every age group from 45 years on. The 1930 census also shows that there were then more than 28,000,000 persons over 45 years of age. In 1935 it was estimated there were 4,349,000 persons over 70 years of age. With a decreasing birth rate and a constantly increasing old-age group, it is only a question of time when we will be faced with the terrific problem of properly caring for an enormous old-age group who cannot earn any part of their own support—unless age as a barrier to employment is entirely disregarded. If men cannot secure employment after 40, it is already a grave problem as to how they may be cared for until they reach the age of 65, when they become eligible for social-security benefits. During the interim of 25 years the problem of support becomes a very vital one. And the veteran has a very definite and pertinent interest in this question, because in the age group of from 40 to 50 years he represents 43.3 percent of the total.

Among these two groups there has already developed strong resentment against the present form of government. The youth movement is charged by many with "leftist" tendencies, and the convention held in Washington a few months ago did not highly commend itself to the country. The older group has found expression through various ham-and-eggs or other old-age-pension programs. The intensity with which the over-40 group is thinking in terms of the future is best emphasized by the fact that during the Seventy-sixth Congress more than 1,100 bills were introduced calling for some form of old-age pensions.

Both groups feel baffled, confused, embittered, and resentful. Without jobs, youth cannot marry, have children, own homes, and live normal American lives. Age feels it has been cheated and defeated by life, not so much because of themselves as because of social forces over which they had no control. Among both groups unemployment has developed an unsatisfied, troubled, frustrated, discontented segment of American life, rebellious against a system of society which seemingly denies them the right to live a normal life. With such a background, not knowing where to turn, they might easily be persuaded that other forms of government were superior to our own—a great group who would feel they had everything to gain and nothing to lose.

A few years ago, such a statement would seem utterly fantastic. And yet we have seen other countries with similar backgrounds fall easy prey to dictatorships, with war as an outlet.

For 5 years the Veterans of Foreign Wars and other veteran groups have been making unemployment one of the major objectives of their programs, in connection with the Veterans' Placement and other employment services. The Employment Weeks have served to dramatize the problem through radio, press, and pulpit. Gradually the American people have come to realize that this is the most important question we have, second only to adequate national defense. Many other groups have sensed the importance of it. During the period of June 4 to 6, an Interfaith Conference on Unemployment was held in Washington. This was composed of the Industrial Division, Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, the Social Action Department, National Catholic Welfare Conference, and the Social Justice Commission, Central Conference of American Rabbis. Invited to participate were more than 40 individuals representing a great variety of interests, including your chairman. Their findings clearly recognize the gravity of the problem. In Congress itself, the Honorable JERRY VOORHIS, of California, organized a volunteer committee, nonpartisan, of some 70 members, who met weekly or oftener and have made a splendid report, a copy of which may be obtained by addressing the above-named Congressman.

During employment week of this year, Comrade Millard W. Rice secured time for a Nation-wide radio broadcast, on which speakers for the V. F. W., A. L., D. A. V., Veterans' Administration, and the Employment Service were heard. All of this has been constructively helpful in bringing home to the American public the gravity of the unemployment situation and the imperative need for remedial action.

On the situations created by the long depression and the large number of unemployed is a marked shortage of skilled workers in certain lines of industry vital to national defense. The old apprenticeship system, or other training methods, has been abandoned, except in minor instances. Many individuals because of lack of employment in their respective fields where they had acquired certain skills, found it necessary to take up other employment where possible, with the result that the old expertness has been lost of their efficiency at least greatly diminished, while young men and women who had not been able to secure employment found it increasingly difficult to do so because they had no experience. It became obvious that both groups should be provided with opportunities to recover lost skills and to acquire the rudiments of new skills if desired. With this in mind, a letter was addressed to the President of the United States May 4, 1939, requesting that he have the several Federal agencies set up a coordinated program of guidance, training, and reemployment especially designed for persons more than 40 years of age, etc. This letter and the reply of the Honorable Secretary of Labor, Frances Perkins, were given complete in the report of your chairman to the fortieth encampment at Boston last year. During June 21 and 22 a conference was held in Washington of of the Federal Advisory Council to Social Security Board, at which Comrade Millard W. Rice, legislative representative, and your chairman attended as representatives of our commander in chief. At this conference we again pressed for the adoption of some such program of training and retraining and it was finally adopted as one of the major recommendations of the conference. As an example of the speed with which action may be secured when necessary, it is worth while to state that the Social Security Board accepted the recommendations on June 22 and the National Defense Commission on June 28, and the plan was in actual operation the first week of July. Because of the part the V. F. W. had in this important matter, it is deemed desirable as a matter of record to give the report in full, as follows:

"Re: (1) Organization of the labor market and (2) training programs.

"The national-defense emergency sharpens the need of knowing what workers are available, where they are, and what they can do—or what they could do with a minimum training—and of so streamlining the functioning of the public employment service that both normal and emergency employment requirements may be known and met with a minimum of time, expense, and confusion.

"The Federal Advisory Council to the Social Security Board, subject to the controlling approval and acceptance of the National Defense Commission, therefore recommends that—

"1. All employers be encouraged to file promptly with their local public employment office, either directly or through such employment agencies as they regularly use, both (a) their immediate requirements and (b) their prospective requirements by occupation and skill; and not to advertise or solicit competitively anywhere, nor to recruit outside their immediate locality, until the local employment office has had an opportunity to meet such requirements locally or through its intercity and interstate clearance machinery.

"2. All persons employable for needed occupations but not now registered with public employment offices—including skilled workers now employed on semiskilled or unskilled jobs—be encouraged to register promptly with their local public employment offices and not to apply for work or move to other cities without first ascertaining from their local public employment office the localities in which there is a demand for their type and grade of skill.

"If recommendations 1 and 2 are systematically and thoroughly followed, undesirable and unwarranted dislocation will be minimized.

"3. The employment offices immediately proceed, in order of indicated need, with a reexamination of applicants in both active and inactive files, in order to ascertain the primary and secondary skills available in occupations for which demands are increasing.

"4. As a basis for, and to the end of insuring a comprehensive, flexible, and high-speed program of training to meet immediate and long-term needs for production and skilled workers:

"(A) The employment service at the same time ascertains the capacity of such workers to qualify for:

"(a) essential occupations by supplementary training;

"(b) immediate attention be given to the problem of selection and training of instructors for service within public and private agencies;

"(c) all training programs for national defense and all cooperating educational institutions which are Federally aided, supported, or controlled, be maintained without discrimination in the admission and treatment of trainees or students, on the grounds of race, creed, or color;

"(d) the National Defense Commission give organized attention to the early coordination of all needed facilities and activities for training and retraining purposes.

"5. To effectuate the foregoing, the Bureau of Employment Security proceed at once to a reappraisal of its organization, procedure, and personnel at Federal, State, and local levels, to insure that it is adequately prepared and staffed to meet all needs that the National Defense Commission may place upon it.

"6. Since the success of any employment and training program depends upon maximum decentralization and efficiency in each locality where supply and demand meet at the job level, steps be taken immediately to bring to full strength and effectiveness both State and local advisory councils to the employment service (as respectively required and recommended under the Wagner-Peyser Act), the same to be fully representative of the parties at interest; that is, an equal number of representatives of labor and of employers and, included among the public representatives, interested and qualified representatives of such groups or services as veterans, rehabilitation, junior employment schools, and vocational guidance, training, social and relief agencies, and of any other major groups dealing with employment and training whose resources and activities can best be coordinated with the national-defense program through the public employment service.

"7. Insofar as the powers of the Social Security Board permit priority or preference be given to citizens and to those who have taken out first citizenship papers.

* * * * * * *

"The Social Security Board and the National Defense Commission accepted the above report of the Federal Advisory Council on Employment Security on June 28, 1940, and the Social Security Board directed the Bureau of Employment Security to transmit the report to the State employment security agencies for their consideration and for their application as far as may be possible."

The foregoing report has been submitted to the State employment security agencies which, with the cooperation of the Board's Bureau of Employment Security, operates the 1,500 full-time public employment offices and the 3,000 additional employment service points throughout the country. It might be added that this Federal Advisory Council is made up of outstanding representatives of organized labor, management, and the general public.

The present set-up provides for an initial training of 150,000 students or trainees within the next 3 months. The program will be financed by an initial appropriation of $15,000,000. By the end of 3 months it is expected that about 1,043 vocational schools will be participating.

As the meeting of the Federal Advisory Council did not specifically discuss the place of the veteran in the program, your chairman addressed a communication to the Honorable Paul V. McNutt and suggested that he have Gen. Frank T. Hines, chairman, call a meeting of the subcommittee on veterans' placement. This was done on July 17, at which time it was disclosed that 50,000 of the trainees would be selected from W. P. A. and the 100,000 from other sources, and that, insofar as practicable, the veterans' preference now accorded on W. P. A. work would be extended to those desiring training. Also, that those assigned from the W. P. A. would continue to draw the same pay while in school as they did on the W. P. A. work—not paying them to go to school but paying them so that they might have the advantage of going to school. Veterans interested should keep in close touch with their nearest veterans' placement representative. At the meeting of July 17 a resolution was also adopted as presented by the V. F. W. recommending that on all national-defense activities veterans be given preference.

As to the V. F. W. bill asking for veterans' preference, there is nothing further to report on that. As between our bill and the A. L. bill, there are irreconcilable differences. Last year the A. L. encampment rejected the recommendations of its veterans' preference committee chairman, which, naturally, brought their bill in line with our own, but later the executive committee overruled the encampment, leaving the two bills in exactly the same position as before. We still do not believe it is the function of a veterans' organization to ask Congress to take away rights they already have. This matter was covered in detail in our report of last year.

RECOMMENDATIONS

Since the submission of the first report of your chairman, in which was outlined a definite program covering employment and civil service, it has been the practice of your chairman to ask for a reaffirmation of those objectives, with such changes and modifications as may be necessary through adoption of legislation or resolutions by the respective encampments. It is therefore recommended that the following program be adopted as the objectives of the Veterans of Foreign Wars for the ensuing year on the subjects covered:

EMPLOYMENT FOR VETERANS

1. Federal civil-service preference for veterans as to:

A. Examinations:

1. Ten points to be added to earned ratings of service-connected disabled veterans, their wives, war veterans over age of 55, and widows of all deceased veterans, placement at top of civil-service register.

2. Five points added to earned ratings of all other veterans, and names placed next in order on civil-service register.

3. Quarterly examination privileges for all war, campaign, and expedition veterans, for 6-year-service veterans, and for 10-point persons.

4. Age and physical requirements waived if otherwise qualified.

5. Educational prerequisites waived if otherwise qualified.

6. Include war service as part of experience prerequisite time.

7. Credit experience gained in voluntary civic, social welfare, and veterans' service work, with same credit as if on paid basis.

B. Appointments:

1. Appointing officer to submit adequate reason for skipping over a veteran to Civil Service Commission; its reaction thereto to be available to the veteran or his representative.

C. Retention, upon reduction of forces, in all Federal agencies:

1. Preference of retention to be on basis of seniority, with all active military or naval service to be included for seniority purposes.

D. Removal only on basis of written charges; protection against lower job or salary status; transfers with same job classification and salary, as to handicapped veterans, if possible, rather than dismissal or retirement.

E. Reinstatement from furloughed, resigned or dismissed status, and after recovery from retirement disability.

F. Appeal Board to consider appeals on all Federal employment matters, veteran or his representatives to review records and present evidence.

G. Local postmasters to make permanent appointments of veterans in same order as original substitute appointments.

2. Same preference as to all Federal positions, contracts, public works, W. P. A., etc.

A. Effective preferences as to all war, campaign, and expedition veterans, the wives of unemployable veterans, and the widows of veterans who have been certified by any governmental agency as in need of employment, as to all administrative, supervisory, and work-relief employment for which they are qualified and available under the W. P. A.

3. Civil service for all non-policy-making, full-time Federal employees.

4. Preference to American citizens as to all governmental employment, services, contracts, loans, grants, and other assistance.

5. Optional civil-service retirement for all civil-service employees.

6. A census of all veterans in each community and State, cross classified as to ages, occupations, able-bodied and disabled, employed, partially employed, and unemployed, as to those:

A. Employed by the Federal Government, by States, counties, and municipalities, with and without civil-service status.

B. Employed under Federal, State, and local relief projects.

7. Urge employers, especially those who are veterans, to extend employment to qualified veterans.

8. A coordinated program of vocational training and placement in suitable employment of all unemployed employable older persons, particularly veterans.

9. Effective veteran employment and civil-service preference laws by all States, counties, and municipalities; greater uniformity of beneficial State laws relative to veterans, their dependents and their organizations.

10. Cooperation of local, State, and national employment committees of Veterans of Foreign Wars with other veterans' organizations, governmental agencies, and private employers to take such steps as will assure to all ex-service men the opportunity for permanent, suitable, gainful employment.

CONCLUSION

Veterans are urged to keep their registration alive in their nearest employment office.

The usual friendly cooperation has been maintained between your chairman and the veterans' placement representatives, and we wish to express our indebtedness for courtesies extended by Messrs. O. D. Hollanbeck and his assistant, Hugh Kerwin.

Our commander in chief has lent full sympathetic cooperation at all times and thanks are hereby extended.

As stated in previous reports, Comrade Millard W. Rice has been actively interested in the problems of this committee and has rendered valuable cooperation at all times, all of which is hereby gratefully acknowledged.

Respectfully submitted.

DAN CAMPBELL, Chairman.

JULY 26, 1940.

Steps Toward British Union, a World State and International Strife—Part II

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. THORKELSON

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 19, 1940

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, we are now dominated and plagued by various pressure groups that care little or nothing about the United States as long as they can involve us in the present European war. Some of these groups are well known, others remain obscure, but nevertheless very powerful and effective in their insidious attempt to convince the people of this Nation that war is impending. These groups are composed of members who are generally classed as the "intelligentsia." I shall not question their intelligence, but if one is to judge them by what they have said and done, their intelligence is not being directed for the greater interest of the United States. Aiding these groups, I believe often innocently, are those whom we may take the liberty of calling their tools and servants. We have reached a stage where these anglophiles advance the thought that in order to qualify as a good American, one must be pro-English and willing to fight and die for England. These England-first groups and hands-across-the-sea organizations are made up of many Canadian and Anglo-American societies which are located in our larger cities. One of these, and the one to which I shall now refer, is the Pilgrims.

THE PILGRIMS

When the Pilgrims was organized in 1902, to aid in developing Anglophiles in the United States, the Canadians, being British subjects, were not solicited at first as members of this charitable and exclusive propaganda service to sell America to the British Empire. Like converts, many of these members are more loyal to England than the British themselves. In their fanatical zeal to serve Albion, I am informed by a student, that one of them placed the English crown on the flagstaff of the Columbia University. If this is true, the Columbia alumni should "crown" him who gave orders for the mounting of it, and replace the crown with the eagle, so this noble emblem can rest in its rightful place.

The Pilgrim membership may be found in our military organization, in the Government, and particularly among professors, ministers, and authors. In wielding the pen, the aid of these writers is more valuable, for can they not write, as did Carnegie when in substance he haid: Give America to England as a hemostat for the bleeding wound of the British Empire, which the surgeons left oozing after their operation in 1776; the operation which amputated the United States from the British Empire, and set America free.

These Pilgrims, being unfamiliar with the surgery of 1776, evidently do not realize that Canada joined to the United States will prove an equally efficient hemostat to stop this hemorrhage in the British Empire. The American Pilgrims no doubt fear this most sensible measure, because it might antagonize the noble and wealthy in the English Government and the Bank of England so much that they will pack up and leave for home. Such exodus might also prove inconvenient to our idle, wealthy, and charming ladies and their parents, when in their crusade to obtain a new or slightly used husband to hang on their family tree, they find it necessary to embark for Palestine to satisfy their family ambition. It is this and more that the Americans must fight to counteract the propaganda which is now disseminated throughout the country and in our daily press, in order to save America for the Americans.

Many of the members of these groups are ignorant of the real purpose of these organizations and their influence in our political life. Some of the members are so blinded by the glamour and the exclusiveness of these clubs that they do not realize that in supporting their activities they betray America. I now quote from the annual meetings of the Pilgrims, held in New York, 1913 and 1934:

[The Pilgrims, New York. Addresses delivered at dinner in celebration of the tenth anniversary of the Pilgrims of the United States, New York, Tuesday, the 4th of February, 1913, at the Waldorf-Astoria, 1913]

(Hon. Joseph H. Choate, president of the Pilgrims and chairman of the evening, on rising and rapping for order, is roundly cheered and toasted by the members and guests assembled.)

Mr. CHOATE. I am going to ask you, in the first place, to rise, as you did just now for a much less worthy object, when I propose the loyal toasts. I ask you to fill your glasses and rise and drink to the President of the United States and his Majesty, the King of England.

(The toast was drunk with great enthusiasm, cheering and singing The Star-Spangled Banner and God Save the King.)

Before the chairman could resume, a delegation of members, consisting of Messrs. F. Cunliffe-Owen, R. A. C. Smith, Herbert Noble, George W. Burleigh, Lawrence L. Gillespie, and George Gray Ward, presented Mr. Choate with a large and beautiful gold and silver salver, richly decorated and suitably inscribed, Mr. Cunliffe-Owen addressing him as follows:

"Mr. Choate, your brother Pilgrims making you the offering herewith of the Pilgrim fare, bread and salt—bread signifying long life and prosperity and salt to ward off from you all evil spirits and every kind of harm—and we ask you, our honored president, in the name of all our brother Pilgrims of the United States, to accept this gold and silver salver as a memento of the occasion."

Mr. CHOATE. I accept the salver with profound gratitude, and I will eat the fare on some more suitable occasion. It will doubtless do for me all that you wish and foretell, but never having until this moment heard of this munificent and wholly undeserved gift, I can only now express to you my warm thanks and high appreciation of your kindness.

I now read to you a message from the President of the United States:

WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, D. C., February 4, 1913.

Please extend to the Pilgrims of the United States and their guests at their tenth anniversary my hearty greetings and my best wishes for a delightful reunion. I am unable to be with you, but I cherish the earnest hope that your gathering may emphasize the cordial relations which we know exist between Briton and Canadian and American.

WM. H. TAFT.

A message from His Majesty the King:

LONDON, February 4, 1913.

I am commanded to convey to the Pilgrims of the United States, celebrating their tenth anniversary, the expression of His Majesty's gratitude for their kind and friendly sentiments contained in your telegram of this evening.

PRIVATE SECRETARY.

A message from Her Majesty, Queen Alexandra, one of the best friends we ever had on the other side of the water:

"I am commanded by Queen Alexandra to ask you to convey to Ex-Ambassador Choate and the members of the Pilgrims of the United States, now celebrating their tenth anniversary under His Excellency's presidency, Her Majesty's sincere thanks for the kind sentiments expressed in the telegram which Her Majesty has just received, sentiments which I am to assure the Pilgrims are much valued by Her Majesty.

"DIGHTON PROBYN."

Now, gentlemen, it remains for me to say a few words, and a few words only. I think, if I continue in this office many years, I may make longer speeches, but I will begin with something very brief and very pertinent. I am a year younger than I was a year ago when you did me the honor to elect me your president, and if I go on, as I hope to do, and as I hope you will do, I shall be a very young man at last.

We are here to celebrate ourselves and our friends on both sides of the water, and among them the best friends that I have ever known—and I knew well their sentiments some years ago, which I believe have continued and which I believe are not well represented in the heart of his present Majesty—I will tell you, in the first place, that King Edward VII, and his Queen Alexandra were two of the most constant and devoted friends that the people of the United States ever had. They lost no occasion to manifest their good will to their kindred in America, and his present Majesty King George V was always most cordial, most friendly, and most determined, so far as I could judge from the sentiments that he expressed—most determined, I say—that the cordial relations between the two countries which have now been transmitted to him by his father should forever continue. We have no difficulty with the royal family. We have no difficulty and never have had that I know of with the people of England. The people of England and the people of the United States are always friendly to each other. Now and then the governments of the two countries come to different conclusions for a brief time on some subject of mutual interest.

It is 10 years since this organization was founded and they have been 10 years of success and constantly advancing prosperity, and, so far as I can understand, of constantly strengthened good will between the people of the two countries. And what I claim for the Pilgrims is that they have done their fair share on both sides of the water to promote this great interest in the world, the preservation of peace between the two countries that combine all the English-speaking people of mankind.

It was not my good fortune to be present when this society was founded in America on the 4th day of February 1903, but I had had the good fortune to be present in London, 6 months before, when the Pilgrims of Great Britain held their first dinner, under the presidency of that grand old soldier and royal hero, Field Marshal Lord Roberts. He believes in making his nation a great fighting nation, but not to fight against the United States. He would consider it the most barbarous, the most unnatural, the most unthinkable contest that ever could be raised. Let me read to you a dispatch from Field Marshal Lord Roberts, which is much better than anything I can say:

"Greatly touched by the Pilgrims' charming and hospitable invitation. There is none I would sooner accept, but unfortunately it is quite impossible for me to be with you on February 4. So sincerely wish it were otherwise. All prosperity to the American Pilgrims."

And from Lord Charles Beresford, who was with us at the foundation of the Pilgrims in England:

"All good luck to Pilgrims. Congratulations on brilliant success of efforts to bring together two great English-speaking nations."

Now, gentleman, that is the object, and the sole object that I know of, that this flourishing society has—the sole reason for its existence; to promote good will, good fellowship, abiding friendship and everlasting peace between the United States and Great Britain. And, for one, I have no fear of failure.

We are now entering upon the celebration of the one hundredth year of peace between the two nations. In 2 years more that celebration will be complete. It is going on all the time, from day to day, from week to week, and from month to month. You will hardly hear so much of anything else for a long time to come. Well, how has it been accomplished? How is it that we have been able to keep the peace, notwithstanding the alarming controversies that have arisen from time to time, controversies which between any other two great nations would probably have provoked and resulted in war? Why, it is because, in the long run, in the main, the people of the two countries are one. They are united in sentiments and in the general object they have in view and in their valuation of things that go to make civilization. We might have fought a dozen wars in the last hundred years, but we have kept the peace always. And how is it? How has it been done? Why, as I believe, it has been accomplished by the preservation on both sides of absolute good faith in their dealings and in ultimate fidelity to the promises that they have made to each other. I do not mean to say that they have not quarreled. They have quarreled many times, and sometimes not a little sharply.

They have threatened very much on both sides—much more than you will ever hear them do again; but every quarrel has ended in reconciliation, in peace established either by diplomacy or by arbitration—arbitration, the great boast and glory of America.

We have a little difference just now, but I do not look upon it as half as serious as the differences that have arisen in former times, 10, 20, 40, 50, 75, 100 years ago, and there is nothing in it that cannot be readily settled upon the principle of adherence on both sides to the doctrine, to the principle, of good faith and of honest dealing with one another.

I had something to do with the negotiation of the treaty which has formed—I won't say a bone of contention, because I haven't heard anything like the gnawing of bones; not at all—but this little difference that has arisen.

It so happened that that negotiation was carried on in London for several weeks between Lord Pauncefote and myself and approved, as we went along by John Hay and by Lord Lansdowne. Well, if there ever were two men who deserved the gratitude of their respective nations and each of the other's nation, it was those two men, Mr. Hay and Lord Pauncefote, for their perfectly plain, perfectly honest, perfectly straightforward, method of dealing with one another.

Their principle, their rule of action, was to say what they meant and to mean what they said, and their effort was always to express in perfectly plain English what both had equally in his own mind; and when they said, as they did say in that treaty that the ships of all nations shall have free passage on equal terms through the canal without any discrimination whatever, they thought they were using plain English. And I must say, now that both of these great men and diplomatists have passed away—I must say, as the survivor of them both, that they lived and died without believing or suspecting that their words were capable of any other than the plain meaning that they bore upon their face.

Well, but the wit of man passeth all understanding, and different meanings have been discovered for those very plain and simple words, and thus a difference has arisen as to the interpretation of a treaty. And how are you going to adjust and settle that difference?

Well, I should say, as any gentlemen would settle differences that they could not adjust which had arisen between them—refer it to some other gentlemen; and my first proposition would be to refer it to the Pilgrims on both sides of the water. We would not have any difficulty. In the first place, we would take a secret vote, if you please, separately on both sides of the water. We would let our brother Pilgrims of Great Britain answer the question—try their hand at this little puzzle; it is only a puzzle—the question is how to put it together. Let them give their answer first and seal it up, not communicate it to us, and then let these 500 law-abiding, country-loving American Pilgrims answer the question for themselves by another sealed and secret vote.

Now, the people of this country are not going to allow anybody—any Congress, any Government, any President—to break their good faith which they have pledged to the mother country. How are we going to maintain the peace for the next 100 years? These English-speaking people are going to increase on this side of the water in the next hundred years from one hundred millions to four or five hundred millions, and England and her dominions across the seas will increase in like proportion. How are they going to keep the peace. There is only one way. It is by keeping their word, by keeping their good faith, by being always honest in their dealings with one another. So I am not afraid. This little puzzle will be adjusted. I hope that Mr. Bryce will stay here long enough to settle it with Mr. TAFT. We know both are great lovers of peace. If not settled by them, why other men—I won't say equally good; I won't say equally good, although I may think so—other men will arise in their places and settle it, and then we shall have 10 years of balmy and delightful peace, and then some other question will arise and the puzzle solvers on both sides of the Atlantic will put their heads together and it will be settled, and so again and again and again and again, and our great-grandchildren celebrating in 2013 the second centenary of the Pilgrims, will have cause to bless their fathers that they founded this society and kept the world on the right track

Now, gentlemen, I have read to you the various messages that we have received from our very eminent friends across the water and at Washington, and we did hope to have with us tonight His Excellency the British Ambassador, but I suspect that he has eaten as many dinners as he could stand—his secretary nods assent—and no man can stand the public dinner every night. I was never able to do it myself. And so we have the pleasure of welcoming here tonight as the representative of Mr. Bryce, the British Ambassador, the counselor—I call him counselor—I do not know whether he exactly likes to be called counselor, for they might think he is a counselor-at-law instead of, as he is in fact, the first secretary of the British Embassy, and I call upon him to give us his message from Mr. Bryce. I have the pleasure of presenting to you Mr. Mitchell Innes, Counselor of the British Embassy at Washington.

Mr. Speaker, it is interesting to read the speeches given by the American members of the Pilgrims, for they, like all converts are more un-American and pro-English than the British themselves.

The address of Joseph H. Choate is an example of Anglophile, pertinent at this time in view of the conditions that exist today. I shall now requote some of these statements in order to show how deceptive they can be. Mr. Choate states:

We have no difficulty and never have had that I know of with the people of England.

A statement that is perfectly true, because the people of England have little or nothing to say in the British Government. Our trouble has been with the British Government, which has never at any time been friendly toward the United States—but the gentleman did not make such statement. Furthermore, it is well to note the servile attitude of the speaker to the Crown of England, and his praise of the rulers, which again is perfectly all right, yet he has failed in his speech as others have in theirs, to say one good word for the Government of the United States. He then goes on to say:

The people of England and the people of the United States are always friendly to each other; another statement which no one can criticize, but to which I want to add that the people of all countries—the common people—have always been and are now friendly to each other. If war depended upon them there would be no war. The trouble lies with the rulers of the different governments. It is they who advocate war; war of destruction, not only of property and human life but of Christian civilization itself.

So in view of this, let us remember that no country has been at war so much as England and no country has brought about more misfortune and suffering than the British Government. This should be clear as we review the early history of our own colonies, of India, Ireland, and the 400,000,000 opium addicts in China, all of which may be charged to the greed of the British Government. Mr. Choate, in making his statements, spoke for the people of the United States, when in reality he should have hesitated even to speak for himself. His sole concern appeared to have been our friendliness toward Great Britain, but not their friendliness toward us; and again he placed the United States in the position of a suppliant to the British throne.

Mr. Choate then referred to a dispute which arose in regard to the passage of ships through the Panama Canal, and intimated that it was the understanding of Hon. John Hay and Lord Landsdowne that the British should have equal rights with us in the use of this Canal; a right which the British have never conceded to the United States in the Suez Canal. We have even been driven out of foreign markets by England for many, many years, and in her wars she has brazenly furnished us with a blacklist of firms with which we are not supposed to trade; and we, like fools, comply with her demands.

Continuing his discussion on this topic, Mr. Choate expressed himself as being quite willing to leave the decision of the Panama Canal in the hands of the British and American Pilgrims, which anyone can readily understand would be a one-sided decision; that is, all for England and nothing for the United States.

Mr. Choate then makes his most extraordinary statement, upon which every Member of Congress and the people of this Nation should ponder—particularly in view of the happenings since 1912:

Now the people of this country are not going to allow anybody—any Congress, any government, any President—to break the good faith which they have pledged to the mother country.

In making this statement, Mr. Choate takes the position that Great Britain or England is our mother country; the same position that was taken by Cecil Rhodes over 50 years ago and by Andrew Carnegie in 1893, when he wrote a book entitled, "Triumphant Democracy."

I want you to note particularly that this was in 1913, and that 1913 was the very year we changed our Government from a republic to a semidemocracy; the year in which we destroyed constitutional government, international security, and paved the road for us to become a colony of the British Empire. It was also the same year in which we, by adopting the Federal Reserve Act, placed our Treasury under the control and domination of the Bank of England and the international banking groups that are now financing the British-Israel movement in the United States. It was also the year preceding the World War; a war in which we became involved, as everyone knows, in 1917, but what everyone does not know is that we were committed to this war in 1910, and were to all intents and purposes in the war in 1914, when J. P. Morgan & Co. began to finance the Triple Entente. This statement is borne out by Mr. J. P. Morgan's own testimony before the Senate committee investigating the munitions industry.

Mr. Choate was, therefore, right, because nothing has stopped, not even Congress, the destruction of this Republic and its gradual incorporation into the British Empire through the efforts of the many subversive and pro-English groups, led and directed, as I have said, by the British-Israel movement.

Let me now quote a message sent by George T. Wilson, chairman of the American Pilgrims, to his brother Pilgrims in London, when they celebrated our entry into the World War. This message states the real hopes and the purpose of the Pilgrims:

Sir HARRY E. BRITTAIN,
Chairman (London):

I should like to read two cables which have arrived within the last few minutes from New York. The first is from our good friends and fellow members, the Pilgrims of America, and it reads as follows:

"At last the Union Jack and the Stars and Stripes are nailed to the same staff not to come down until the job is done. Our boys in khaki are anxious to rub shoulders with yours in France and share your struggle and your triumph in freedom's cause. The Pilgrims' dream of 15 years at length has come to pass. (Signed) George T. Wilson, Chairman." [Loud cheers.]

I shall now quote a speech delivered by Nicholas Murray Butler, to a meeting of the Pilgrims in New York, in 1934:

ANNUAL PILGRIM MEETING, 1934

President BUTLER. You have before you the report of your committee on nominations proposing the names of seven gentlemen for election to the executive committee, their terms to expire in the year 1935. Are there other nominations?

Mr. CHARLES H. WARREN. I move that the secretary cast one ballot for the names mentioned in the report of the nominating committee.

The motion was seconded.

President BUTLER. It has been regularly moved and seconded that the secretary be instructed to cast one ballot for the names mentioned in the report of the nominating committee. This requires a unanimous vote. So many as are in favor will please say "aye"; contrary-minded, "nay," if any. The vote being unanimous, the secretary is so empowered.

Secretary CHURCH. Mr. President, I report I have so cast a ballot.

President BUTLER. The secretary reports that he has cast a ballot for the gentlemen named in the report of the nominating committee. Therefore, Mr. Burleigh, Mr. Darrell, Mr. Demorest, Mr Lamont, Mr. Noble, Mr. Satterlee, and Mr. Shields are elected to the executive committee, terms to expire in 1935.

Fellow pilgrims, let me first recall to mind the fact that Sunday was the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of that distinguished and beloved American, linked with Great Britain, who served so long as our president, Joseph H. Choate. In the presence of that anniversary and in your presence, I salute his memory and bear tribute to the service which his years on earth rendered to the great cause which we have so much at heart.

There have been happenings in the year 1931 so grave, so far reaching in their importance, and so massive in their historic interest that it is no slight task to make choice among them of those of which it is permissible to speak in your presence for a few moments this afternoon. Let me first, however, pay tribute to that splendid spirit of the British people which in time of storm and stress, of national embarrassment and portending danger, enabled them, in accordance with the best ideals of the race, to put aside and behind all partisan differences and all prejudices of party affiliation and to unite in that most impressive demonstration which they gave at the last general election. That spirit was voiced by Mr. Snowden on the floor of the House of Commons in the stirring words which he quoted from Swinburne's famous ode:

"Come the world against her,
England yet shall stand!"

[Applause.]

It was not only a magnificent exhibition of political capacity and political power, but it might well be an example to other peoples on this earth, facing problems such as those which are before mankind today, to forget their superficial and often artificial differences and to unite all their power and all their patriotism to solve their great problems solely in the interests of the nation and of the world. Great Britain has shown that it can be done.

I recall that a year ago it occurred to me to say something on this occasion of the movement going on to bring into existence a British commonwealth of nations, a new form of political organization to take the place of the centuries-old organization of the British Empire. I invited your attention to the fact that that movement was going forward, more Anglicana, informally, quietly, illogically, under the pressure of opportunity in events and without any formal or public announcement. During the year, however, without the world paying much attention, and hardly noticed in these United States, that movement, which has been under way for the better part of a generation, came to its climax and has now been formally written into the public law of Great Britain.

I hold in my hand the few printed pages which constitute the State of Westminster, 1931 (see appendix 2), beyond question the most important act in public law since the ratification of the Constitution of the United States. This statute, covering but three or four printed pages, contains three specific provisions which are its essence and which I should like to emphasize.

First, what is to be a dominion?

The expression "dominion" is to mean the Dominion of Canada, the Commonwealth of Australia, the Dominion of New Zealand, the Union of South Africa, the Irish Free State, and Newfoundland, six dominions in all.

What is to be the relation of local self-government in each of those dominions to the British Parliament? The Statute of Westminster reads:

"No law and no provision of any law made after the commencement of this act by the parliament of a dominion shall be void or inoperative on the ground that it is repugnant to the law of England, or to the provisions of any existing or future act of Parliament of the United Kingdom or to any order, rule, or regulation made under any such act, and the powers of the parliament of the dominion shall include the power to repeal or amend any such act, order, rule, or regulation insofar as the same is part of the law of the dominion."

In other words, absolute legislative self-control is devolved by the Parliament of Great Britain, where that control has rested for 800 years, upon the parliaments respectively of the six Dominions.

What certainty and security have these dominions that their local self-government shall be permanent and complete?

The Statute of Westminster reads:

"No act of Parliament of the United Kingdom passed after the commencement of this act shall extend, or be deemed to extend, to a Dominion as part of the law of that Dominion unless it is expressly declared in that act that that Dominion has requested, and consented to, the enactment thereof."

Those three brief paragraphs, I repeat, are the most important contribution to the public law of the world made since the ratification of the Constitution of the United States. They introduce into the government of mankind a new form of federal relationship, not a federal relationship such as exists between our own States and the Federal Government, but a federal relationship which consists in loyalty and devotion to a person who is the symbol of unity; but the legislation power is as multiform as the Dominions. The British people consciously, after 25 years of discussion and experimentation, have formulated this great statute, enacted it into law without dissent, and have started this new ship of state out on the sea of human political experience. I submit, my fellow pilgrims, that that is so stupendous a happening and so amazing an achievement that we would do well to pause for a moment to remark upon it. Let me say two things about it in addition, and you will pardon a word of personal reminiscence.

In June and July 1921 the Imperial Conference was sitting in London, and the sort of question which underlay this movement was uppermost in the minds of the conferees. There were other delegates to the conference, but the Prime Ministers of the several Dominions as now defined and the Prime Minister in the Government of Great Britain itself were, of course, the leading personalities. Mr. Lloyd George was Prime Minister. He did me the honor to ask me to come to Chequers for the week end to meet these gentlemen and to hear them discuss the problem of the possibility of a British Commonwealth of Nations.

They spent the whole of Saturday, and Saturday evening, and all of Sunday until luncheon under the trees and in the library at Chequers discussing informally and familiarly and with profound knowledge and that grasp which only comes from experience, the problems that were before them. There was the Prime Minister of Canada, Mr. Meighen. There was General Smuts from the Union of South Africa. There was the Prime Minister of Australia, Mr. Hughes. There was the Prime Minister of New Zealand, Mr. Massey, and there were two representatives from the Government of India, the Maharajah of Cutch and Mr. Srinivasa Sastri of Madras.

It was my privilege and good fortune to be questioned by these gentlemen as to the working of our own Federal system. In particular, they wished illustrations of what happened when there was conflict of authority and of jurisdiction. They pointed out that we had in our great cities officers of the Federal Government. How did they operate without inducing conflict of authority and feeling with the State and municipal officials? How were these almost invisible lines of administrative power kept from overlapping and from friction? What was the function of the courts? What the limit, if any, of their authority? I assure you it was no small pleasure and pride to be able to answer questions to that distinguished and influential group as to how a different form of the federal principle had been operating for more than a century and a half in the United States.

Finally, when the luncheon hour came on Sunday, and these informal discussions were brought to an end, Mr. Lloyd Green turned the conversation into lighter vein and called attention to the fact that it was fortunate indeed that their minds were meeting, that the words British Commonwealth of Nations were beginning to be used by them, and that the day was Sunday. A benediction, as it were, upon their efforts!

"Yes," I said, "Mr. Prime Minister, but if you will pardon an American, there is something more important than that. Tomorrow will be the Fourth of July." [Laughter.]

By pure accident they had brought their discussion of the reorganization of the British Empire and its Dominions to a conclusion at the anniversary of the Declaration of Independence [laughter], surely an interesting coincidence.

One thing more. We do not realize, my fellow Pilgrims, the foresight of our own fathers, how far those nation-builders saw into the future, and what an amazing grasp they had upon the fundamentals of political life and social organization. I sometimes think we are in the habit of taking them too much for granted.

There is on exhibition in this city today one of the two existing signed copies (the other being in the Record Office in London) of a document which in American history stands in importance and significance side by side with the Declaration of Independence itself, and probably not one American in a million has ever heard of its existence. That is the paper which John Adams called the Olive Branch Petition. (See Appendix.) That petition was presented to King George III in July 1775, over the signatures of 46 Members of the Continental Congress, praying for precisely the relationship which the statute of Westminster has written into public law, the public law of England, for the Dominions. And who signed it? The first name is the name which stands at the head of the signers of the Declaration of Independence a year later, John Hancock. Among the 46 names are those of Samuel Adams, John Adams, Roger Sherman, John Jay, Benjamin Franklin, James Wilson, Patrick Henry, Richard Henry Lee, and Thomas Jefferson. Washington did not sign because he was in command of the troops in Massachusetts, and the Congress was meeting in Philadelphia. Lexington, Concord, and Bunker Hill had been fought. And this very proposal, which 160 years afterward has been worked out in the life of the British peoples, were presented to them by the signers of the Declaration of Independence a year before they signed that Declaration as the alternative step. It is one of the most extraordinary things in the history of government, and we pay little or no attention to it.

What happened? The Olive Branch Petition was sent to England by the hands of William Penn's grandson. He was to take it to the Government. For weeks he could not be received. Finally he was received, not by his Majesty, but by the Colonial Office, and was then told that inasmuch as the petition had not been received on the throne, no answer would be given. As John Adams had said, "We have the olive branch in one hand and the sword in the other." When the olive branch was rejected, recourse was had to the sword, and these very same men in 12 months signed the Declaration of Independence and history took its course.

It is one of the most astounding things in the history of government that these men off in this distant series of colonies, economically in their infancy, financially helpless and dependent, had the vision of organization which has come now to all the British peoples, and for which surely every Pilgrim wishes the very greatest possible measure of success. [Applause.]

So it is, gentlemen, in the history of our race. Ideas, how slowly they travel, arguments, how slowly they are apprehended; action, how slowly it follows upon conviction! To be sure, as we look back we can see that these 46 members of the Continental Congress were in advance of the opinion of the world. British opinion could not at that time have accepted that course of action. They could not think in terms of a parliament whose legislative authority ended at the island shores. Therefore, revolution, independence, separate nationhood, were of the essence of the great undertaking, and so they happened. But in the intervening years a lesson has been learned by all, by the motherland and its captains of the mind, by the Dominions and those who speak their voice, and now with great fortune and wisdom they have in the Statute of Westminster written into the public law the principles of the Olive Branch Petition of 1775. [Applause.]

Let me only add that this great principle of federation of one kind or another is the principle which is to mark the life of nations in the days that are to come. Those that are of like race and faith, that have similar economic habits and interests, that have a common language, they will tend more and more to group themselves into units as our United States of America have done. The British Commonwealth of Nations will, perhaps, be the only one of its type because Great Britain is the only far-flung empire which has gone out for 500 years and put its hand on the distant places of the earth for their enrichment, their betterment, and their increasing civilization. Other proud and powerful and ambitious nations will find ways and means, without losing their independence, their self-control, or limiting their pride, to bring themselves into new economic units for cooperation, enrichment, and the benefit and satisfaction of all their peoples.

This principle of international cooperation, in one form or another, whether it be our form, whether it be the British form, or whether it be the forms which are slowly coming on the continent of Europe, that is the principle which we may look forward to as guiding and shaping the life of the world for the next century or more. But as we Pilgrims look particularly at our own field of historic interest and affection, surely we may in the dark year of 1931 take profound pride and satisfaction in remarking the significance, the far-reaching importance, of this Statute of Westminster and the prophecy of it by our own nation-builders in July 1775.

The audience arose and applauded.

Mr. Speaker, I have included Mr. Butler's address, in order to show how far we have drifted toward this British union. In this speech, you will note he brings out the fact that the olive branch petition has now been adopted by England and extended to her colonies. He further intimates that in view of this adoption, it is now in order for us to join the British Empire. He makes the further statement that this movement has gone Anglican, or more English, which is quite true, for we are just about on the verge of capitulating to the forces which are driving us into the British Empire. To show this, let me quote:

That petition was presented to King George III in July 1775, over the signatures of 46 members of the Continental Congress, praying for precisely the relationship which the Statute of Westminster has written into public law, the public law of England, for the Dominions. * * *

I recall that a year ago it occurred to me to say something on this occasion of the movement going on to bring into existence a British Commonwealth of Nations, a new form of political organization to take the place of the centuries-old organization of the British Empire. I invited your attention to the fact that that movement was going forward, more Anglican, informally, quietly, illogically, under the pressure of opportunity in events and without any formal or public announcement. Newspaper Articles in Opposition to Third Presidential Term

OF

HON. STYLES BRIDGES

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 20 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ARTICLES FROM NEWSPAPERS OF 1937

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD articles from various newspapers in opposition to the third Presidential term.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Herald Tribune of October 31, 1937]

SIX ROOSEVELT PARTY CHIEFS VETO THIRD TERM—FLORIDA CHAIRMAN THINKS REFERENDUM MIGHT EVEN CONDEMN SECOND TERM; COMMITTEE HALTS POLL

(By Albert L. Warner)

WASHINGTON, October 30.—The Democratic chairmen of six States advise against a third-term nomination for President Roosevelt, according to a private poll, the results of which were revealed today, along with the considered answers of these Democratic leaders.

One of them, J. B. Hodges, chairman of the Democratic State executive committee of Florida, breaks completely with the President and his administration. Attacking the President with a sharpness which no Republican has surpassed, this Democratic leader charges Mr. Roosevelt with making "unconstitutional" proposals, "encouraging" sit-down strikes, breaking his Budget-balancing promises and spreading lack of confidence. He suggests that, instead of an inquiry as to a third term, an investigation should determine whether the people want "the completion of the President's second term."

Finally, a member of the President's own family, Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr., now at the University of Virginia, enters the third-term discussion to leave the door open because "what we feel today may have to be revised 2 years from now in the light of circumstances beyond our control, such as the foreign situation."

UNWRITTEN LAW

The Minnesota Democratic chairman declared the two-term rule was an unwritten part of the Constitution. The South Dakota chairman said he had already informed members of the Cabinet that the voters of his State positively were against a third term for anyone. The Kansas chairman said it would be "a bad precedent." The Alabama chairman asserted a third-term candidate would sound the "death knell" of the party sponsoring him and Alabama would go Republican for the first time in history if he were a Democrat. According to the chairman for Mississippi, "the people as a whole would look with disfavor upon a third term."

The poll which produced these results was taken by Joseph Leib, formerly of South Bend, Ind., young political writer who organized the first Roosevelt-for-President Club in 1930 and was an eager member of the Young Democratic movement in 1932. A persistent letter writer, he polled the Democratic State chairmen in 1935 and gave out the answers showing that the overwhelming majority of the delegates to the 1936 convention would carry instructions to vote for Mr. Roosevelt.

COMMITTEE HALTS POLL

The poll this year was cut short because the Democratic National Committee stepped in to halt it. Lawrence W. Robert, Jr., secretary of the committee, was informed by Charles Reid, Georgia State chairman, of the letter he had received asking his views on a third term. Robert advised Leib to stop. Subsequently, and presumably on advice from national headquarters, no more chairmen sent in their views. All six who replied thought that a third term would be distinctly unwise.

The seven-page letter from Mr. Hodges, the Florida State chairman, upon which he said by telephone later he was willing to stand publicly, was described on Capitol Hill today as a southern political development of the first order. Mr. Hodges had been a public critic of the President's Supreme Court plan and an insurgent on some other matters, but today he leads a Florida insurrection against Mr. Roosevelt personally and his whole conduct of affairs.

The more or less private views of these State chairmen are in striking contrast to public comments of several Democrats in public office who may be seeking to ingratiate themselves at the White House. Gov. George H. Earle, of Pennsylvania, is one of those who have been talking up the third-term idea.

This was the letter sent out to the State chairmen:

"I am trying to find out how the people feel about a third term for the President.

"So much has already been said about the matter. Of course, no one knows what will happen by 1940—but what do you hear and how do things look?

"Thanks and regards."

The following replies were received from State Democratic chairmen:

Herbert Holmes, chairman Mississippi State Democratic executive committee:

"Of course, it is impossible for me to know how all the people of our State regard a third term for the President, but from what I can learn from those with whom I have talked, the people as a whole would look with disfavor upon a third term.

"Those who are receiving employment or bounty from the Government, whom I have contacted, are very much in favor of his nomination for a third term, but this does not represent a very large voting strength."

C. M. Fitzwilliam, Kansas State committee chairman:

"President Roosevelt is strong as ever in Kansas, and though Kansans are not for a third term, I think he would carry the State. Personally, I think it would be a bad precedent."

A. W. Powell, South Dakota State chairman:

"Tom Berry served two terms as the most popular Governor that South Dakota ever had. He balanced the budget, reduced bonded indebtedness several million dollars, and operated the State without a levy on real estate or personal property.

"In 1936, we thought he was our strongest candidate for Governor and he ran for the third term and was defeated by over 10,000 votes when every constitutional officer won.

"Mr. Roosevelt lost over 30,000 votes in 1936, and I know it would be fatal to ask the people of South Dakota to reelect him for the third term.

"Out here there is the feeling that these things should be passed around, and the ballots are marked accordingly.

"Personally, I would vote for Franklin D. for the third term as an expression of sheer gratitude for the improvement in my situation as brought about by his program, but the 300,000 other voters in South Dakota, I am very positive, feel otherwise, and I have so informed some members of the Cabinet."

John D. McQueen, chairman, State Democratic executive committee of Alabama:

"Replying thereto (Leib's inquiry), I beg to advise that it is my candid opinion that the nomination by any party of anyone, regardless of who he might be, as a candidate for election to a third term as President of the United States would sound the death knell of the party responsible for such nomination.

"I do not believe the people of the United States would ever elect the same man as President of the United States for a third term, and it is my candid belief that if the Democratic Party does so nominate, it will mean that the party will not only go down in defeat but that it will be so torn by internal strife as to destroy any possibility of the party ever again being the dominant party.

"So far as Alabama is concerned, it is my opinion that such action on the part of the national convention would mean that this State, for the first time since its stanch Democrats redeemed the State from the ignominious rule of the carpetbaggers which was inflicted upon us following the War between the States, would fail to be found in the Democratic column."

John F. D. Meighen, Minnesota chairman:

"My opinion is that the two-term rule is part of our unwritten Constitution, just as much as the right of the Federal Government to purchase new Alaskas. Save in grave emergency, I do not think the voters will overlook the two-term rule."

J. B. Hodges, chairman of the State Democratic executive committee of Florida (excerpts):

"You have asked a very frank question, addressing me on the envelope in which your letter came, as Democratic State chairman, and I presume you desire a frank answer, and I am making one.

"There has been much said, and a great deal of speculation has been indulged in, by the people and the press of the Nation in regard to a possible third term for President Roosevelt, and he has nowhere at any time, so far as I know, made any definite statement relative thereto, preferring to dismiss inquiries in regard to that matter lightly, with statements that may be interpreted as having two meanings, apparently trying to follow in the footsteps of another President of the United States, but his statements and actions are not nearly as clever as the tart reply of such other President, to wit: 'I do not choose to run.' * * *

"In fact, propaganda is already aboard in the Nation by way of reference to the refusal of President Washington to accept a third term, such propaganda pointing out that there is now no law or statute against it; that it is not mentioned by the Constitution; that other Presidents have been besought to seek third terms; that they did not refuse because of Washington's refusal, but because of some illness or the infirmity of age, and with the propaganda set-up in the several alphabetical departments of the New Deal government, the idea of a third term can be, and is being, propagated at the expense of the American taxpayer. * * *

"It would be more profitable to the New Deal * * * to ascertain from the American people whether they are now agreeable to the completion of the President's second term instead of undertaking to ascertain whether or not the people desire the President for a third term.

"I am a Democrat—a liberal Democrat—and I expect to remain a Democrat—a liberal Democrat—as long as I live, but the platform of the Democratic Party adopted at Philadelphia last year was not prepared and written by the delegates to the convention, but was prepared and written somewhere else, and is prepared in such a clever manner that many of the planks therein are capable of more than one construction, very much like the tart statements of the President heretofore made about a third term."

Hodges' seven-page reply charged the President with disregarding platform pledges "to solve its legislative problems within the Constitution" by proposing the "amazing" Supreme Court reorganization bill. He charged the President with making other "unconstitutional" proposals, "encouraging" sit-down strikes and the C. I. O., and with promising to balance the Budget so many times that "the people of the Nation have no confidence in any such promise."

Hodges said that lack of confidence in the President "is now growing to an alarming extent," that the people see no necessity for a special session of Congress and that "they do not intend to allow the Government of the United States to be operated on catch phrases."

"Our objections are now inaudible," Hodges' letter said. "We have learned that we can only make changes on general-election years, so our people tolerate these things, knowing that there can be no change until 1940, when they hope to select some other Democrat who will reflect the actual thoughts and desires of the rank and file of the Democratic Party."

Hodges' advice on a third term for the President was: "Don't do it. The people are against it."

A letter signed by Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr., from Charlottesville, Va., dated October 24, said:

"Thank you very much for your recent letter, but I am afraid I cannot give you the answer you desire. In the first place, I think it is not my position to make any statement concerning a third term for my father. And furthermore, the necessity for deciding such an issue has not as yet arisen, since what we feel today may have to be revised 2 years from now in the light of circumstances beyond our control, such as the foreign situation.

"However, many thanks for your letter, and I would appreciate it very much if you would let me know the result of your inquiry."

FOUR MORE PARTY HEADS JOIN FIGHT AGAINST THIRD TERM FOR ROOSEVELT—TWO DEMOCRATIC STATE CHAIRMEN AND TWO GOVERNORS WARN OF ADVERSE SENTIMENT; THREE SENATORS ALSO CAUTION AGAINST TRADITION-SMASHING ATTEMPT

WASHINGTON, November 12.—Two chairmen of Democratic State committees and two Democratic Governors today cautioned against a third-term nomination for President Roosevelt, joining the six Democratic State chairmen who 2 weeks ago were recorded as either actively opposing or warning against breaking tradition.

Also comment written by three Democratic Senators, variously dated from July to October, but made public today, showed that they were either fearful of a third term or felt sure Mr. Roosevelt would not want to run again.

The Democratic State chairman of Arizona, Junior Gibbons, declared that Arizona Democrats feared that if Mr. Roosevelt broke precedent the result might be disastrous at some future time. The Democratic State chairman of Vermont, Park H. Pollard, promised to support anyone nominated by the Democratic National Convention, but found many of his party in his own State not favorable to a third term.

The Governors of Rhode Island and Virginia, Robert E. Quinn and George C. Peery, both declared that sentiment in their States would be against a third term for anyone.

Previously, the Democratic State chairmen of Florida, Minnesota, South Dakota, Kansas, Alabama, and Mississippi had asserted opposition or warning. Their comment had included a direct attack on the President by the State chairman of Florida, J. B. Hodges, and a warning from the Alabama chairman, John D. McQueen, that a third-term nomination would be a death knell for the party.

The poll which brought today's additions to the symposium was taken by Joseph Leib of South Bend, Ind., who organized the first Roosevelt-for-President Club in 1930. He asked the reaction to the proposal of a third term.

The comments today follow:

Robert F. Quinn, Governor of Rhode Island: "Personally, I am an admirer and supporter of President Roosevelt. I do not think, however, that sentiment in Rhode Island would be against a third term for any man."

Gov. George C. Peery, of Virginia: "I think the majority of the people in Virginia are pro-Roosevelt. However, I believe there is a strong sentiment in Virginia against the President's being elected for a third term."

Junius Gibbons, chairman of the Democratic State Central Committee of Arizona: "I have made it my business to inquire quite thoroughly into the sentiment here. To date I have not found one Democrat who has not been thoroughly in accord with President Roosevelt and the policies which he has been trying to inaugurate, but I do meet with this year: Many of them are afraid that should we break the precedents set by previous Presidents for only a second term it might prove disastrous at some future time, and that none of them are skeptical of the motives of President Roosevelt; but once a precedent is broken it might easily be broken at some subsequent time and someone would be elected to the Presidency who might have ulterior motives and disastrous results might come of it."

Park H. Pollard, chairman of the Vermont Democratic Committee: "If the President is a candidate for a third term I should expect a delegation favorable could be secured in Vermont. Among the rank and file I find many not favorable to a third term. I am a Democrat and would support anyone the national convention saw fit to nominate."

Senator MORRIS SHEPPARD, of Texas: "The President has indicated that he will not run a third time. He has thus killed that issue himself."

Senator WALTER F. GEORGE, of Georgia: "I am not in a position to discuss the third term suggested, but in my opinion we have nothing to fear. I do not know that the President has fully intended to announce himself for a third term."

Senator M. M. LOGAN, of Kentucky: "I am not for the President for a third term."

Senator ALBEN W. BARKLEY, of Kentucky, majority leader of the Senate: "I am not in a position to make any statement or prediction concerning this matter."

Charles Michelson, director of publicity for the Democratic National Committee, in a leaflet issued Saturday discussed the matter of a third term, referring to it as an "old bogy" trotted out by Mr. Roosevelt's critics. He intimated the President was looking ahead with longing retirement in 1941, but that, after all, conditions "3 years hence" were uncertain and "obviously, the President cannot in advance decline renomination that may never be offered him." Also "just as obviously, with the world in such a turmoil as it is today outside of this continent, it cannot be forecast whether the American people would permit him to lay down his burdens in view of possible eventualities."

THIRD TERM FOR ROOSEVELT OPPOSED BY LEADERS OF NATION'S CHURCHES—"UNBROKEN TRADITION" CITED, ELECTION ROUT FORECAST IN POLL RETURNS, BUT SOME FEAR WAR OR PATRONAGE MIGHT REELECT HIM

WASHINGTON, March 27.—Sixteen clergymen and religious leaders, including five bishops, have replied to a poll on third-term prospects for President Roosevelt by unanimously voicing either personal opposition to such a step or saying that the bulk of the people would be antagonistic or reluctant.

There were two qualifying notes from a scattering of these writers. Several felt that if the United States were at war, or on the verge of war, the situation might be somewhat changed. Two clergymen thought that if Mr. Roosevelt threw himself into a third-term campaign "political patronage" and other "resources" at his command might bring him another victory. One minister even suggested that the President might try to "jockey us into a war in order to further his own desire to continue as President."

Directly or indirectly, all 16 voiced respect for the tradition against a third term.

Bishop Joseph Schrembs, of the Catholic diocese of Cleveland, pointed to the "unbroken tradition" which he thought the majority of the American people accepted.

Bishop Adna W. Leonard, of the Methodist Episcopal Church at Pittsburgh, declared that Mr. Roosevelt's "unfortunate attempt to concentrate all power in himself" would bring a surprise to him in the next election.

Rabbi Louis I. Mann, of Chicago, thought Mr. Roosevelt could be elected again, but, personally, he hoped the President would not try because the two-term precedent is "grounded in the warp and woof of our democracy."

Bishop Henry K. Sherrill, of the Protestant Episcopal Churches of Boston, said the American people were against a third term "for any President," although a war might make a difference.

These letters constituted the answers to a poll of some 80 ministers who were queried by Joseph Leib, political writer. There was no reply endorsing a third term. The letters follow:

Rev. William E. Lampe, of Philadelphia, secretary of the executive committee of the Evangelical and Reformed Church: "I do not think that the American people would stand for a third term for President Roosevelt or anyone else. In Washington's time he and others took every step to see that there be no king or dictator. President Grant failed to secure a third term. Sentiment is stronger today against a third term than ever before. Roosevelt has made enough mistakes without being given an opportunity to add to them."

Rev. Charles E. Burton, of New York, secretary of the general council of the Congregational and Christian Churches of America: "The people would be very much against it."

PREDICTS SURPRISE AT POLLS

Bishop Leonard: "I am unalterably opposed to a third term for Mr. Roosevelt as President or for any other man as President of the United States for a third term. I am confident that nothing could more easily arouse the American people than for Mr. Roosevelt to stand for a third term. Of course, his unfortunate attempt to concentrate all power in himself will find an expression at the polls in the next election, which I think will be a surprise both to him and to the new dealers."

Bishop Schrembs: "An unbroken tradition going back to the first, and in many respects the greatest, of our Presidents would seem to preclude a third term for the Presidency. I cannot bring myself to believe that President Roosevelt would seriously contemplate breaking this tradition and neither do I believe that the majority of the American people would vote for Mr. Roosevelt if he actually attempted a third term."

George Craig Stewart, Episcopal Bishop of Chicago: "My impression would be that there would be a very vigorous resistance to any proposal for a President of the United States to become a candidate for a third term. My own conviction is that Mr. Roosevelt would echo the famous words of Mr. Coolidge, 'I do not choose to run.'"

BELIEVES HE "MIGHT WIN"

Paul B. Kern, Methodist Bishop, Durham, N. C.: "It is my opinion that Mr. Roosevelt will run in 1940 if he is persuaded that he can be elected. I think the opposition to him will grow and he would get no such vote as he did in 1936. I believe that he might win by a narrow margin. Such a victory, however, would be brought about not by his popularity nor widespread confidence in him, but by the fact that he controls sufficient political patronage to influence a large number of votes."

Rabbi Mann: "There is, naturally, much talk on this subject in this section of the country and I feel, from what I gather, that if President Roosevelt were to run for a third term next week or next month, he could be elected. Personally, I hope that he would not try because the precedent of two terms is grounded in the warp and woof of our democracy."

Rev. Julian C. McPheeters, pastor of the Glide Memorial Methodist Episcopal Church, South, San Francisco: "The people of this section would be reluctant for President Roosevelt to continue for another term. The only way I can conceive of such a possibility is for the country to be facing the imminent crisis of an impending war. Even under such conditions the people would regret facing any situation which would make possible a third term."

POSSIBILITY IN WARTIME

Bishop Sherrill: "In general, I think the American people are against a third term of any President. However, if we were in the midst of a war or any critical international situation, there might be a great difference; or if we were in the midst of a depression or in prosperity, so my very unhelpful answer is that I just do not know."

Rev. Robert G. Armstrong, secretary of the New Hampshire Congregational Christian Conference: "I feel strongly about Roosevelt running for a third term. I think he would certainly love to do so, and I have no more confidence in him than to believe that he might even jockey us into a war in order to further his own desire to continue as President. But I think that there would be a very strong reaction against him, even on the part of his admirers, in this section of the country. There has been a decided turn away from Roosevelt, I feel, so far as this section is concerned, in the last few months. I think that would be true of all New England."

Rev. Ralph H. Long, of New York, executive director of the National Lutheran Council: "I can easily conceive that situations might arise in which it would be desirable to have a President of the United States carry on through a third term. That would, of course, depend very largely upon the particular situation and upon the man himself. At the present time I do not believe that the American people will want to consider a third term."

OPPOSES THIRD TERM

Rev. A. R. Robinson, of Pittsburgh, moderator of the United Presbyterian Church: "Personally, without assuming to speak for the church of which I am the moderator this year, I feel that a third term for any President is contrary to the spirit and traditions of our national life. So much for my personal feelings. But in answer to your question I am forced to this belief—that any President who has at his disposal the resources that brought about the recent overwhelming majority, and who is willing to use those resources for political purposes, could be elected for a third term or a fourth term or any number of terms that he desired."

Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, Foundry Methodist Episcopal Church, Washington: "Of course, if at the time of the nominating convention, America is engulfed in the war wave which seems to be gathering, no one can prognosticate what would happen. Mr. Roosevelt, with his militant quarantine-the-aggressors attitude (with which I heartily agree), would then so fire the country with a high resolve to make the power of this democracy felt in world affairs that, in spite of the tradition against the third term, he might be swept into office. But if things are anywhere near normal and a world war is as far off as it seems now, personally I do not believe Mr. Roosevelt has any idea of running again. If he did, I do not think he could be nominated; and if he should be nominated I do not think he could be elected, so strong is the feeling against a third term in the hearts of the American people."

SEES OPPOSITION IN TEXAS

Rev. J. M. Dawson, pastor of the First Baptist Church, Waco, Tex.: "I would say that sentiment among my acquaintances is strong against our Nation going into war and pronouncedly against any President running for a third term. It is only fair to say that President Roosevelt is personally very popular in Texas, but neither any disposition to lead us into war nor aspiration for a third term would meet with general favor, in my belief."

Rev. Stanley I. Stuber, pastor of the First Baptist Church, Clifton Springs, N. Y.: "It rather looks that the President, through his big-money program and foreign policy, is leading us toward war. He may have in mind, in this connection, a third term. This section in which I live, which is largely Republican, is decidedly against the third-term idea. My own view is that although I am in favor of much New Deal legislation and point of view, I am certainly against Mr. Roosevelt's war policy. For this reason I oppose the third-term idea, chiefly as a rebuke to any war ambitions which the President may have."

Rev. Carl E. Grammer, of Summit, N. J., Protestant Episcopal clergyman, president emeritus of the board of Sweet Briar College: "I am one of those who do not believe in the methods of the New Deal. I believe that the tradition against a third term is very strong and that if Mr. Roosevelt disregards it and runs again, this claim of indispensability will open the eyes of the people to his arrogance and lawlessness and lead to his defeat."

COLLEGE HEADS FIRMLY OPPOSED TO THIRD TERM—PRESIDENTS OF 13 LEADING SCHOOLS IN NATION VOICE DISAPPROVAL IN REPLIES TO POLL; NEW DEAL SENTIMENT WANING

NEW YORK, December 3.—Presidents of 13 leading universities joined in a "college yell" to voice disapproval to a third term for Franklin D. Roosevelt, it was announced today by Joseph Leib, political writer and founder of the first Roosevelt-for-President Club in 1930, who conducted a poll among the school heads.

The colleges that replied were: Vanderbilt, Dartmouth, Lehigh, Duke, Brown, Drake, Colgate, Cornell, Washington and Jefferson, Beloit, Texas Christian, Lafayette, College of the Ozarks.

Only private institutions were canvassed, as State universities come under the jurisdiction of political leaders. Virginia Military Institute was polled by mistake, and C. E. Kilbourne, leader of the school, replied: "As superintendent of a State institution, nonpartisan in character, I do not feel justified in taking part in the political canvass."

Harvard and Princeton were not polled, since their presidents are under consideration for posts on the Republican National Committee policy board. Columbia was likewise avoided, as President Butler is a leader in Republican circles, it was explained.

Not one college head who replied came out in favor of a third term for the President. This is of particular significance, since the New Deal administration has chosen most of its important figures from the universities. The poll seemingly indicates that sentiment in the colleges regarding the New Deal is on the wane, especially should the President run for another term.

The Dartmouth president said that overthrowing the tradition of a third term would be injurious to the Government, and would react adversely upon the reputation of the President who might seek another term. From Lehigh its president reported that the sentiments of the people with whom he is acquainted are overwhelmingly opposed to a third term.

PREDICTS TREMENDOUS OPPOSITION

In the South, Duke's head informed that not a single person with whom he discussed the possibility of a third term favored it, and predicted that there would be tremendous opposition if the Chief Executive attempted to run for another term. Brown's leader advised that there was no evidence that the Nation could not produce leaders once in 8 years.

From the Midwest, Drake's president added that a third term would be ill advised and unacceptable to the people. In Tennessee, Vanderbilt's president stated that he met nothing but opposition to a third term.

In New York, Mr. Roosevelt's home State, both Cornell's and Colgate's presidents added that such an idea as a third term would encounter substantial opposition, and that the President's strongest supporters in that part of the country would vote against him. The president of Washington and Jefferson merely wrote that he was opposed to a third term, and Lafayette's head thought that the term for any President should be 7 years, eliminating any possibility of a second term.

In Wisconsin, Beloit's president announced that he has not heard a single person speak favorably about the matter. Texas Christian's head explained that he did not hear any great enthusiasm expressed for the idea for any President. And the president of the College of the Ozarks added that he would regret very much to see the precedent of the past broken down.

LETTER SENT TO EDUCATORS

The letters sent out by Mr. Leib said:

"MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: In a Republic like ours where every citizen is called upon at some time or another to take part in public affairs, may I address you on a vital question? So much has been said about the possibility of a third term for Mr. Roosevelt, yet no one seems to know just definitely how the voters feel on this matter. In this connection I am writing to you in the hope of finding the truth, no matter how the wind may be blowing. As head of a great school you have come in contact with many people. No doubt you have discussed this matter on many occasions. I would appreciate it very much if you will advise me as to the sentiments on this matter in your section of the country."

Mr. Leib recently polled Democratic leaders throughout the Nation and found that eight State chairmen, two Governors, and three Senators actively opposed or warned against breaking the third-term tradition. Much of the opposition came from the "solid South" States. The State chairman who opposed the idea came from Alabama, Mississippi, Florida, Arizona, South Dakota, Minnesota, Kansas, and Vermont. The Governors came from Virginia and Rhode Island, while the Senators were George of Georgia; Logan, of Kentucky; and Sheppard of Texas.

ONLY ONE APPROVES

The final replies of the State chairman-governors poll showed that only one chairman expressed approval to a third term for Mr. Roosevelt. The others opposed and warned against the idea or else refused to comment. V. E. Barnes, who is State chairman as well as executive director of the unemployment compensation commission of Kentucky said that there is much favorable talk about a third term for the President.

L. G. Flannery, chairman of Wyoming, who is also head of the periodical section of the W. P. A. information service in Washington, D. C., said that he took care not to bring up or discuss the question of a third term with his Wyoming citizens, as he felt that to do so would raise a controversial question on which there would be sharp and strong differences of opinion.

The Iowa chairman said that his thoughts were centered on 1938 rather than on the 1940 election. The Michigan chairman declined to comment on the 1940 situation until after the 1938 elections in his State. The Colorado chairman said that there was little discussion of the matter in his section. The Rhode Island chairman did not wish to engage in public opinion on the matter. The Utah chairman said he was not prepared to answer the question.

Governor Browning, of Tennessee, advised that the proposal has taken no kind of a form in his State so far as he knew. Governor Stark of Missouri said that he does not believe there is any very pronounced sentiment either way in his State. Governor McMullen, of Delaware, reported that he has not discussed the matter. Governor Huxman, of Kansas, advised that he has many times declined to express an opinion.

REPLIES BY COLLEGE HEADS

Following are the replies from the 13 college presidents:

Henry M. Wriston, Brown: "I am opposed to a third term for any President. The strain of the office is such that I think 8 years is enough. There is no evidence that this Nation cannot produce leaders once in 8 years."

E. M. Hopkins, Dartmouth: "I can simply say that among my friends and acquaintances, whether here in the college or in other centers, I know of no single case where a man does not believe that overthrowing the tradition against a third term would be injurious to the Government and would react upon the reputation of the individual President who might have sought or even wanted a third term."

"OVERWHELMINGLY OPPOSED"

C. C. Williams, Lehigh: "I have inquired amongst acquaintances in Bethlehem as occasion offered and I believe that the sentiments of the people with whom I am acquainted are quite overwhelmingly, if not unanimously, opposed to a third term."

W. P. Few, Duke: "I am writing to say that of the many I have happened to hear discuss the possibility of a third term for Mr. Roosevelt I cannot recall a single one who was in favor of it."

D. W. Morehouse, Drake: "I would say that from all of the information I can gather any propaganda for a third term would be ill-advised and unacceptable to our citizens."

J. H. Kirkland, Vanderbilt: "Of course, I cannot presume to know the feeling for any large part of the Nation. I can only speak for that small group of people with whom I am associated and with which the question of a third term has occasionally been discussed. I am free to say that I have met nothing but opposition to such a proposal."

George B. Cutten, Colgate: "Regardless of what a person's political stamp may be, and I have many friends in both the two main parties, I have not heard a person express himself who was not much opposed to a third term for Mr. Roosevelt, or anyone else. All the men with whom I have talked are opposed to any third term."

Edmound E. Day, Cornell: "I would assume without any actual canvass that any such idea would encounter substantial opposition."

Ralph Cooper Hutchinson, Washington and Jefferson: "I am opposed."

Irving Maurer, Beloit: "May I say that while I have heard various points of view expressed in regard to the concept of the service of President Roosevelt I do not think I have heard a single person speak favorably about the possibility of President Roosevelt's running for a third term."

SUGGESTS 7-YEAR TERM

W. M. Lewis, Lafayette: "The framers of the Constitution, so farseeing in most things, might have done well to cling to their original idea of making the term of office for the President 7 years and eliminating any possibility of a second term."

E. M. Waits, Texas Christian University: "In answer to your inquiry concerning the sentiment relative to a third term for President Roosevelt, allow me to say that I have not heard the matter discussed very extensively up to the present time. For the most part, I have not heard any great enthusiasm expressed for the idea of a third term for any President."

Wiley Lin Hurie, College of the Ozarks: "Personally I would regret very much to see the precedent of the past broken down. For no very good reason I suppose I have a feeling, based on sentiment, that it would not be a good thing to elect any President to a third term."

Preparation for Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH F. GUFFEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 19 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. WILLIAM C. BULLITT

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, on yesterday in Philadelphia our Ambassador to France, Mr. Bullitt, delivered a stirring address which should challenge the attention of every American.

France, the country where our Ambassador is stationed, recently has fallen prey to a stronger nation. This was due in part to indifference to the type of its armed forces and too much reliance in the strength of its fortifications. The people of France failed to take full recognition of the constant danger by which they were surrounded and neglected to awake fully to their peril.

I am not an alarmist, but I think the address delivered by Ambassador Bullitt from the steps of Independence Hall, where America proclaimed its independence, should be carefully read and thoughtful attention given to its warning. The time to awaken to the spirit of defense is now. "The ramparts we watch" are too sacred and too precious to us all to permit them to be endangered by the neglect of proper precautions looking to necessary defense.

I ask that the address be incorporated in the Appendix of the RECORD as part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Fellow citizens of my country, men and women, Americans, there are times, rare and infrequent, when a man feels he has a right to ask his fellow citizens to hear him. Here tonight, in my own city, in this square where our Republic was created, I feel I have that right.

For nearly 4 years I have served as Ambassador of our Republic to the French Republic. That republic, like our own, followed the gleam of liberty, equality, and fraternity for all men and all races. That republic, like our own, strove for peace.

I have seen the French Republic destroyed.

As your emissary, as the representative of American democracy, I have witnessed the acts which destroyed the French democracy. I know of my own knowledge what blows were struck, what devices of intrigue and treachery and force were employed. I know who are the enemies of freedom because I have seen them at their work. I know how dangerous they are and by what means they are dangerous.

Because I have seen these things and know them of my own knowledge, I know that dangers beset free institutions everywhere, and I know what those dangers are. The strategy of destruction by which the free nation of France was overthrown is the strategy of destruction by which the enemies of freedom hope to overthrow liberty in this, the greatest of the nations that freedom has created. Because I have seen these things with my own eyes, heard them with my own ears, and felt them in my own body, I ask you, my fellow free Americans, to hear what I feel it my duty to say.

America is in danger.

It is my conviction, drawn from my own experience and from the information in the hands of our Government in Washington, that the United States is in as great peril today as was France a year ago. And I believe that unless we act now, decisively, to meet the threat we shall be too late.

The dictators are convinced that all democracies will always be too late. You remember Hitler's statement: "Each country will imagine that it alone will escape. I shall not even need to destroy them one by one. Selfishness and lack of foresight will prevent each one fighting until it is too late."

Control of government by public opinion is the essence of democracy. And it has always been our belief that free speech and a free press and free education would enable us to form and express our opinions sufficiently swiftly not only to permit but to compel our Government to act quickly and effectively. But the problems of world affairs have become so complex, in this day of volcanic change, that the average citizen has the greatest difficulty in understanding them and judging what is best for his country before it is too late.

The dictators have developed a strategy of attack that is based on this difficulty. To prepare the way for military attack on a democracy they employ every possible variety of agent and propaganda to befuddle the public so that the democracy will not prepare in time. They succeeded in befuddling public opinion in France and England to such an extent that they were able to conquer France in a few days and are now striving to conquer an England which awakened late.

They are not yet in a position to attack America by military means; but their campaign of befuddlement, their preparatory assault, is following the same lines in America that it followed in France. Do not imagine that the French citizen was less intelligent or cared less about his country than the American cititzen. The honest French patriot did his best, but he just could not see through the smoke screens of bribery, propaganda, lies, and threats which the dictators spread in his country. For every Frenchman who acted as the conscious agent of a foreign dictator, there were a thousand who, with good intentions and high patriotism, unwittingly played the dictators' game.

How many Americans today are playing the dictators' game without knowing it?

In France, as in the United States today, there were many honest pacifists. There were many because after 1918 every Frenchman became in one sense a pacifist. The French wanted no more war. And when the German propagandists told the French that they could buy peace with Germany by making one concession after another, the French believed them.

The French, who were much stronger at the time than were the Germans, let the Germans reconstruct an army, a navy, and an air force, let them reoccupy the Rhineland and the Saar, then Austria, then the Sudeten areas of Czechoslovakia, then the whole of Czechoslovakia. After that the Germans said that the price of peace was Danzig and Poland's outlet to the sea. By that time the French had learned that the lie, the solemn pledge given and broken, had become Germany's normal weapon in international affairs. Yet today there are Americans who argue that we should believe the dictators when they say that they have no intention of extending their conquests to the Western Hemisphere and certainly not to the United States. France believed. Where now is France?

There are also Americans who argue that if Hitler should conquer Great Britain he would be content to stop there, and that the United States would be able to cooperate happily with the Hitler Empire of Europe. To believe this is to misunderstand the entire nature of the Nazi system. It is not organized to develop an empire in peace. It is organized as a dynamic military machine. The ruthless hold of the Nazi leaders on the German people is based on the gearing of all energies for the sacrifices necessary to wage war. The continued sacrifices by the great mass of the people which the Nazi system demands cannot be obtained except by maintaining a supercharged war temperature. The German nation has been made a predatory army of assault. Its organization is military. Its military operations have enormous momentum. It cannot stop in its tracks. It can only be stopped.

Were Germany to try to resume the ways of peace, the military discipline which is the very foundation of the Nazi hierarchy would crumble. In order to continue in power that hierarchy must continue to lead Germany on new predatory adventures. The third Reich cannot change its objectives and methods without changing its entire organization and leadership.

The Americans who believe that the Nazis will not have to be stopped but will stop of their own accord are indulging in the fatal vice of wishful thinking. They want to believe this. Therefore they believe it. There is no other basis than their wish for their conclusion that the Nazis suddenly will become peace-loving men.

The men and women who tell you that the dictators will not attack the Western Hemisphere may be honest, wishful thinkers or they may be agents of the dictators, but in either case, by lulling you into a false feeling of security and retarding your preparations for defense, they are keeping the way clear for an assault on America by the dictators. They are enemies, consciously or unconsciously, of our country and our liberties.

In France there were high-placed and influential German agents who circulated in what was called society, and argued, because Hitler had said he loved France, that Germany would never so much wish to invade France as to attack the Maginot Line which was estimated to be such a tremendous obstacle. Today, we hear Americans of the same stripe arguing that the dictators will never so wish to invade the Americas as to cross the Atlantic which is regarded as such a tremendous obstacle. They ask us to ignore the fact that the Atlantic is an obstacle only so long as the European exits to the Atlantic are controlled by a nation which is genuinely friendly to us. We can remember, however, that in the past when those exits have been in the hands of a power unfriendly to us, the Atlantic has become a broad highway for the invasion of the Americas. By way of the Atlantic our own land was invaded twice: during our Revolution and the War of 1812—and that with sailing ships. By way of the Atlantic, Mexico was invaded during our Civil War.

The truth is that the destruction of the British Navy would be the turning of our Atlantic Maginot Line. Without the British Navy, the Atlantic would give us no more protection than the Maginot Line gave France after the German troops had marched through Belgium. The soothing words "Maginot Line" were the refrain of a lullaby of death for France. The soothing words "Atlantic Ocean" are being used now by the propagandists of the dictators in the hope that they may become a lullaby of death for the United States.

The French knew that they were outnumbered two to one by the Germans, and that all Germans—men, women, and children—had been mobolized for war. They knew that Great Britain was unprepared for war and that little help could come to France from England. When they thought hard, therefore, they knew that every French man, woman, and child ought to be working for the national defense. The French had, of course, universal military training for the army. Even the French priests were trained to fight, and they fought at the front like other good soldiers and would not have been respected if they had not. But when the question arose of mobilizing the whole nation for national defense by compulsory national service, even as a temporary measure to save the liberties of France, the French found it more comfortable to listen to the voices, some sincere, some bought by the dictators, which told them that their individual liberties were sacred and must not be sacrificed for a moment even to save the liberties of the nation; that it was more important for the individual to work only 40 hours a week than for his country to have enough airplanes; that the voluntary acceptance of national service as a temporary measure would be an imitation of the dictatorships. Thus, in the name of the preservation of individual liberty, the national liberty of France was condemned in advance to destruction.

Recently, in this country, we have heard men and women arguing that we ourselves would be imitating the dictatorships if we should create through conscription an army adequate to defend our country. They, too, are playing the dictators' game.

Then there are many in France, some honest, some agents of the dictators, who argued that since airplane design was changing rapidly, France should have good models but should not manufacture planes in great quantity until after the outbreak of war. They were prominent and powerful. As a result, at one time French plane production was allowed to sink to 37 a month while Germany was producing a thousand a month.

Have we been wiser during the past years? Have we built the planes or trained the aviators to man them? Have we prepared the tanks or the men to drive them? Have we trained and equipped even infantry for our national defense? Are there not among us many who think and talk as did the Frenchmen who opposed adequate preparations? Recently I heard a Senator who is as good an American as any of us state that while he would favor conscription the moment we should be attacked, he would oppose conscription until after we should have been attacked. The ruined homes of France, the women and children starving on the roads, cry out to him, and to everyone of us, that wars are won or lost by the preparations made or not made before they begin; that untrained soldiers are not opponents but merely victims for trained men with tanks and planes. The dictators, who are confident that all democracies will always be too late, count not only on their agents to befuddle American opinion but also on honorable men like that Senator.

What stands today between the Americas and the unleashed dictatorships? The British fleet and the courage of the British people. How long will the British fleet be able to hold the exits from Europe to the Atlantic? I cannot answer that question nor can any man.

You have heard the appeal of General Pershing for aid to the British Fleet. You have heard the appeal of Admiral Standley. You have heard the appeal of William Allen White and his associates. If you let those appeals go unanswered and the British Fleet goes under, do you realize what that would mean to you, to all of the people of this country? Great Britain and Ireland, along with the whole continent of Europe, would be organized into one economic unit directed from Berlin; a unit which would be far stronger in productive capacity than the United States, which would have five times our capacity to produce warships; a unit whose trade would be controlled by one trading trust directed from Berlin. No country of North or South America would be able to trade with Europe except on such terms as might be pleasing to the dictators. Those conditions for many of the countries of South America would be the acceptance of a greater or less measure of Nazi control.

For us, since we would not accept Nazi control, they would mean the cutting off of our markets for cotton, tobacco, and other export products. That would be so fatal to the economy of certain sections of our country that we should face the gravest economic crisis in our history; a crisis which it would be the task of Nazi and Communist agents to exploit.

In the Pacific would be the Japanese Navy, cooperating with the dictators, which would be able to cut us off from our supplies of rubber and tin and would compel us to leave a large part of our fleet in the Pacific to defend Hawaii and the west coast. In the Atlantic would be combined fleets of the dictators which would be so close to our own fleet in strength that they would be able to cut us off from all commerce not only with Europe but also with Africa and would endanger even our communications with the southern portion of this hemisphere.

Are you sure that under those circumstances the powerful Nazi and Communist movements which already exist in various countries of South America would not be able to seize power and would not invite the European dictators to organize air forces on their territories, and that those air forces would not move northward with dive bombers to the Panama Canal and then move against this country? Are you sure that our existing fleet and air force would be able to defend even the northern route to the United States by way of Greenland, Newfoundland, and Canada?

It is as clear as anything on this earth that the United States will not go to war, but it is equally clear that war is coming toward the Americas.

The agents of the dictators are already here preparing the way for their armies. They are preparing the way in the same manner in which they prepared the way in France.

In France much of the most terrible and traitorous work was done by the Fascists and Communists working together. Many honest French democrats and liberals had been snared by Communist propaganda and argued that, because the Communists called themselves a political party and pretended at the time to be in favor of democracy, it would be undemocratic to deny to the Communists the rights of any other political party. The honest French patriots and democrats who protected the Communists did not discover until too late that the Communists were acting as spies and agents of the dictators, that the Communist Party was merely camouflaged as a political party and was in reality a conspiracy to commit patricide at the direction of a foreign dictator. They discovered too late that the Communists were traitors who were claiming the protection of the state which they intended to destroy only in order the better to prepare for its destruction.

When the German invasion began to sweep into Belgium and France there were Communist and Nazi agents of Germany in each town and village who produced panic among the civilian populations by spreading fantastic tales of murdering by the German troops of men, women, and children. By this means 10,000,000 civilians were harried in fear from their homes and clogged all the roads, so that the French, British, and Belgian Armies could not maneuver, so that transport of supplies became almost impossible, and a magnificent fighting force became a clotted mass of men and material, a perfect target for bombing and machine-gunning from the air.

At the most critical moment of the fighting in Belgium other German agents, this time Communist railway men, stopped all traffic on the Belgian railways so that there was no transport by train for the French, British, and Belgian Armies.

Throughout France, especially in Paris, there were hundreds of Communist and Nazi agents of the dictators with extremely short-wave portable radio transmitting sets in their hiding places. They kept the Germans fully informed of the movements of the French Army and of the intentions of the French Government. Since they could change their hiding places daily, the French were never able to track down more than one-tenth of these spies.

The French had been more hospitable than are even we Americans to refugees from Germany. More than one-half the spies captured doing actual military spy work against the French Army were refugees from Germany.

Do you believe that there are no Nazi and Communist agents of this sort in America?

On the 10th day of last May the people of France were as confident as are the people of the United States today that their country could not be conquered. Three days later, on the 13th day of May, the Germans had smashed through the center of the French Army and France was doomed.

The way had been prepared by spies, agents, and propagandists, but it was the strength of the German Army and the skill of its leaders that enabled Germany to strike the fatal blow. The blow was struck just where the French did not expect it. The attack was made by a new method that the French had never imagined. Waves of bombing planes preceded waves of tanks with perfect coordination maintained by radio. The tanks cut through the French lines, then wheeled and lopped off piece after piece of the French Army.

The French soldier fought as courageously and magnificently as any soldier has ever fought. Division after division, cut off from supplies of all sorts, fought on until there were no more shells for the cannons or cartridges for the guns, then charged with the bayonet. The courage of the French was magnificent but of no avail against the tanks and planes of the Germans. And, make no mistake, the German infantrymen were as brave as the French.

The entire western world had been lulled by stories of the inferiority of German equipment. I have seen, myself, hundreds of thousands of German soldiers with all their motorized and mechanized equipment. I have never seen one piece of that equipment broken down.

The German military machine today is without question the most powerful that has ever been created. It has been used with consummate skill. And you may be sure that, if the Nazis have an opportunity to turn it against us, it will be as strong or stronger than it is today and will be used in the most unexpected manner.

I cannot tell you where and when the attack will come, any more than the French General Staff could have told you that the German attack would be made at Sedan on the 13th of May; but I am certain that if Great Britain is defeated, the attack will come, and that all the strength of this Nation will be needed—mobilized, organized, equipped, and ready—if we are to parry it and save the independence of our country.

Why are we sleeping, Americans? When are we going to wake up? When are we going to tell our Government that we want to defend our homes and our children and our liberties, whatever the cost in money or blood? When are we going to give the lie to those who say that the people of the United States no longer care about their liberties, that they look on the United States just as a trough into which to get their snouts and not as the greatest adventure in human freedom that this earth has known?

When are we going to let the world know that, in spite of all the efforts of all the propagandists who call their propaganda debunking and try to teach us to fear even truth, we still know that when anyone tries to debunk the Ten Commandments and the Sermon on the Mount he prepares for himself hell in this world and in the next?

When are we going to let legislators in Washington know that we don't want any more politicians who are afraid of the next election and scared to ask us to make the sacrifices that we know are necessary to preserve our liberties and our Declaration of Independence and our Constitution? When are we going to tell them that we want to know what are our duties, not what are our privileges? When are we going to say to them that we don't want to hear any longer about what we can get from our country, but we do want to hear what we can give to our country? When are we going to stand before God and say that we know a human being is worthy of freedom only when he serves the ideal in which he believes?

Do we want to see Hitler in Independence Hall making fun of the Liberty Bell? No.

Then here, in this square, where Washington walked with Jerferson, where our independence was declared, where our Constitution was framed, I ask you and all other Americans who hear my voice tonight to join in the fight to keep our country free.

Write and telegraph to your Senators and Representatives. Write to your newspapers. Demand the privilege of being called into the service of the Nation. Tell them that we want conscription. Tell them that we back up General Pershing.

If you belong to great patriotic organizations, make them act. If you want to make your will felt but do not know how to make it felt, write to me and I shall try personally to put you in touch with the men and women who know how you can help most effectively in your own home towns and villages.

Our defense against the enemies who are already within our country has still to be organized. Nearly all our defense against the enemies that are still outside our country has still to be organized. If we won't act, our Government can't. It is up to us.

The fighting line of the war for the enslavement of the human spirit is nearing our shores. For every American "there is no discharge in that war." An American is a free man or he is nothing. Our fate and the fate of our children depend on what each one of us does—now.

Steps Toward British Union, a World State and International Strife—Part IV

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. THORKELSON

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 19, 1940

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my own remarks in the RECORD, I include a short article entitled, "Undermining America."

UNDERMINING AMERICA

The beginning of the undermining of America was brought by Cecil Rhodes, who, in 1877, left money to establish scholarships at Oxford for the purpose of training diplomats to foster the reunion of Britain and America. In the first draft of his will, which is quoted in the book Cecil Rhodes, by Basil Williams, or the book Cecil Rhodes, by Sarah Gertrude Millen, he stated:

"Directed that a secret society should be endowed with the following objects: 'The extension of British rule throughout the world; the colonization by British subjects of all lands where the means of livelihood are attainable by energy, labor, and enterprise; and especially the occupation by British settlers of the entire continent of Africa, the Holy Land, the Valley of the Euphrates, the Islands of Cyprus and Candia, the whole of South America, the islands of the Pacific not heretofore possessed by Great Britain, the whole of the Malay Archipelago, the seaboard of China and Japan, the ultimate recovery of the United States of America as an integral part of the British Empire.'" "The foundation of so great a power as to hereafter render wars impossible, and promote the best interests of humanity."

A new will was made:

"He substituted English-speaking peoples for actual Britons; he came to realize his limitations and reduced his scheme to a mere beginning of it, the scholarships; but yet the thought behind each successive will remained the same—the world for England, England for the world." (See page 145, Cecil Rhodes, by Sarah Gertrude Millen.)

Other quotations:

Page 377: "But the essence of the wil', as the world knows, is the Scholarship Foundation. In the end all that Rhodes can do toward extending British rule throughout the world and restoring Anglo-Saxon unity and founding a guardian power for the whole of humanity is to arrange for a number of young men from the United States, the British colonies, and Germany to go to Oxford. * * * There are, accordingly, rather more Rhodes scholars from America than from all the British Dominions put together."

Page 378: "If the Union of South Africa could be made under the shadow of Table Mountain, why not an Anglo-Saxon Union under the spires of Oxford?"

In 1893 Andrew Carnegie wrote his book, Triumphant Democracy, the last chapter of which is "The Reunion of Britain and America." (The 1931 edition of this book is devoid of this last chapter.) The following is a quotation from the original book:

"Regarding those I should like Britons to consider what the proposed reunion means. Not the most sanguine advocate of imperial federation" dares to intimate that the federation that he dreams of would free the markets of all its members to each other. This question cannot even be discussed when imperial conferences meet; if it be introduced, it is judiciously shelved. But an Anglo-American reunion brings free entry here of all British productions as a matter of course. The richest market in the world is opened to Britain free of all duty by a stroke of the pen. No tax revenue, although under free trade such taxes might still exist. What would not trade with the Republic, duty free, mean to the linen, woolen, iron, and steel industries of Scotland, to the tin-plate manufacturers of England. It would mean prosperity to every industry in the United Kingdom, and thus in turn would mean renewed prosperity to the agricultural interests, now so sorely depressed."

Another quotation:

"In the event of reunion, the American manufacturers would supply the interior of the country, but the great population skirting the Atlantic seaboard and the Pacific coast would receive their manufactured articles chiefly from Great Britain."

And still another quotation:

"Time may dispel many pleasing illusions and destroy many noble dreams, but it shall never shake my belief that the wound caused by the wholly unlooked-for and undesired separation of the mother from her child is not to bleed forever. Let men say what they will, therefore, I say, that as surely as the sun in the heavens once shone upon Britain and America united, so surely is it one morning to rise, shine upon, and greet again the reunited state, the British-American Union."

1914: Andrew Carnegie took over the controlling group of the Federal Council of Churches by subsidizing what is known as the Church Peace Union with $2,000,000, and the Church Peace Union or the board of trustees has always exercised a dominating influence in the Federal Council. This endowment has provided sufficient annual income to run the budget of the Federal Council and its cooperating organizations. Among the associated groups are the World's Alliance of International Friendship Through the Churches, Commission on International Friendship and Good Will, National Council for Prevention of War, and American Civil Liberties Union. (See Pastors, Pacifists, and Politicians, pp. 5 and 6, published by the Constructive Educational Publishing Co., Chicago.)

1917–18: Witnessed the promise of England to give Palestine to the Zionist Jews, if they would throw America into the war on her side. This was reported in the New York Times March 8, 1930, Sunday editorial. It was this that caused Otto Kahn to come to America and become an American citizen. (See New York Sun, June 19, 1936—Pledged Jews National Home—p. 19.)

1917: At the annual meeting of the trustees for the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, held at the Headquarters Building, No. 2, Jackson Place, Washington, D. C., on April 20, 1917, the following resolutions were adopted by the board:

"PEACE THROUGH TRIUMPH OF DEMOCRACY

"Resolved, That the trustees of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, assembled for their annual meeting, declare hereby their belief that the most effectual means of promoting durable international peace is to prosecute the war against the Imperial Government of Germany to final victory for democracy, in accordance with the policy declared by the President of the United States.

"SERVICES TENDERED TO THE GOVERNMENT

"Resolved, That the endowment offers to the Government the services of its division of international law, its personnel and equipment, for dealing with the pressure of international business incident to the war." (See pp. 181–183 of the C. E. for I. P. Year Book, 1917.)

In connection with the adoption of this resolution, the following quotation from a letter written to Hon. Robert Lansing, Secretary of State, dated April 21, 1917, by the secretary of the board, Dr. James Brown Scott:

"Of course, a general offer to the Government should be interpreted as an offer to the particular department of the Government to which the division of international law may be of more appropriate service, and, since the nature of the work of the division is in line with, and many of its officers and employees are former officers and employees of the Department of State, I feel that the services and equipment of the division should be offered to that Department, which offer I hereby convey as the representative of the endowment in carrying out the above resolution of the board of trustees."

In June 1918: Woodrow Wilson sent two men to England: Mr. Charles Moore, of Detroit, Mich., and Prof. Andrew McLaughlin, of Chicago University, and an agreement was made to leave the carrying trade of the Atlantic to Great Britain, which was embodied in our version of the peace treaty, as written by Col. Edward M. House, at Beverly Farms, Mass.

1918: Witnessed the American Historical Association, Carnegie endowed, meeting in London, and the agreement was made to rewrite American history to please England. (See American Historical Year Book, 1918.)

1919: When Lord Northcliffe had completed his propaganda organization in this country during the recent World War, and was returning home it was announced that he was leaving behind him $150,000,000 (our own money, of course) and 10,000 trained agents to carry on the work. His own London Times in the issue of July 4, 1919, rendered account of the "efficient propaganda" which he had inaugurated here and was being carried out by those trained in the arts of creating public good will and of swaying public opinion toward a definite purpose. (See Report on Investigation of American History, City of New York, May 25, 1923.)

Among the methods, stated by the London Times, to be then in operation or in prospect in this country were:

"Efficiently organized propaganda to mobilize the press, the church, the stage, and the cinema, to press into active service the whole educational system, the universities, public and high schools and primary schools. Histories and textbooks on literature should be revised. New books should be added, particularly in the primary school. Hundreds of exchange university scholarships should be provided. Local societies should be formed in every center to foster British-American good will, in close cooperation with an administrative committee." (See Report on Investigation of American History, City of New York, May 25, 1923.)

This same Fourth of July issue of the London Times contained a signed article by Owen Wister, American born, in which we said: "A movement to correct the schoolbooks of the United States has been started and it will go on." (See p. 62 of Report on Investigation of American History, city of New York, May 25, 1923.)

1919: Witnessed the rewriting of American history to please England. Protests were made by the Sons of the American Revolution and other patriotic societies. (See Report on Pro-British Histories, held at City Hall, May 25, 1923.)

1919: Mr. Edward Filene, of Boston, an internationalist, set up the Twentieth Century Fund, Inc., and by interlocking directorates has control over 124 trust funds, together totaling nearly a billion dollars. Included in this control are the Carnegie, Rockefeller, the Duke and Russell Sage Foundations from which funds go subsidies to subversive communistic, socialistic, and all peace movements, as well as the cooperative movements. Among activities of Twentieth Century Fund, Inc., are the following: N. R. A., S. E. C., Wagner Labor Act, International Labor Office (affiliated with League of Nations), Foreign Policy Association, credit unions, cooperatives, League of Women Voters. (See Red Network, published by Elizabeth Dilling, 53 West Jackson Boulevard, Chicago, Ill., for communistic activities of these groups. Also see Year Books and American Foundations and Their Fields, published by Twentieth Century Fund, Inc., 330 West Forty-second Street, New York.)

1920: From the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, Year Book, 1920—Division of International Law—report of the director, James Brown Scott, page 111.

THE FUTURE OF INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATION

"The director believes that the road to progress runs from the Hague Conferences to a distant and ever receding horizon. He believes that nations are only willing to try on an international scale those things which have been tried within national lines and which have been successful. He believes in an infinite series of little steps, not in any one leap, however attractive the prospect may be.

"During the Conference of Paris, the director daily passed through the Place de la Concorde in going to and from the Hotel de Crillon to the Quai d'Orsay. He has often stood before the obelisk marking the site where the head of Louis XVI fell, and with it the old regime. The men of that day dreamed of a newer and better future. All that has been was wrong and the wrong must be righted. They abolished the old calendar based upon the birth of the Man of Nazareth, and brushing it aside, they began their new era with the year 1. But it all ended with the final entry of Louis XVIII, the brother of Louis XVI, into the Tuileries in the year of Our Lord 1815.

"The statesmen of the future, if not of the present day, are bound to recur to the past, and in international organization, the past is, in the opinion of the director, the Hague Peace Conferences."

RECOMMENDATIONS ON INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATION

(Quotations from p. 110, Year Book 1920)

"It is not necessary for a workable program of international organization that the world should be federated; it is, however, essential that the nations of the civilized world should cooperate."

1921–25: Witnessed the battle for the suppression of the Star-Spangled Banner and the desire to replace it with America the Beautiful. Nine years were consumed in getting the bill out of the pigeonhole of the judiciary, legalizing the national anthem against such attacks. In spite of this, the official national anthem is rarely heard.

Mrs. Augusta Stetson put paid advertisements in newspapers around the country, including the New York Times (August 5, 1925), and admitted under oath when subpenaed to city hall, March 5, 1924, for an investigation that she had spent $169,000 in one fund and $17,000 in another to destroy and delete the Star-Spangled Banner because it was not pleasing to England. Franklin Ford, her secretary, in 1931, admitted at his office that he was financed by the English-Speaking Union and the British Commonwealth Club, Inc. (Refer to hearing before Deputy Commissioner Lowden, March 5, 1924, New York City.)

1925: A March issue of Saturday Evening Post carries an article by Owen D. Young, the originator of the Young plan bonds for the reparation of Germany, in which he stated that American labor would have to be reduced to the status of European labor.

1929: Witnessed the visit of Ramsay MacDonald with Hoover on the Rapidan. (See World-Telegram, October 10, 1929.) "The result of those representations, both Washington and London will hold to be of vital significance to the future of organized society."

See also New York Times, October 10, 1929, Ramsay MacDonald said: "I have achieved more than I hoped."

1929: Witnessed the stock-market crash. See National Message, official organ British-Israel World Federation, New York Public Library, October 12, 1935, page 679:

"It was told to me by a heavyweight American financier before the crash came that the crash was coming, that it would be permitted to run to the danger point, and that when the danger point was passed it would be reversed by measures carefully prepared in advance to meet the situation. I carefully noted what he said and left it for events to prove the value of his statement."

1934: John L. Lewis, organizer of the Committee for Industrial Organization, attended the June conference of the International Labor Organization. (See New York Times, October 11, 1934.)

1935: See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, August 26, page 15051, Mr. Huey Long: "A newspaperman whom I know to be reliable telephoned me tonight and said: 'I have found out for you that the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Morgenthau, has given out a statement in confidence * * * that this 9-cent plan was devised by Mr. Oscar Johnson, of Mississippi.' I said, 'If it is the Oscar Johnson, of Mississippi, that I know about, he was the manager of a chain of British plantations.' The newspaperman said, 'That is the same man.' I knew this idea could not have been given birth in the brain of an American cotton owner nor an American cotton planter, nor any American who understood the situation. I knew that the idea had foreign parentage; and, lo and behold, the gentleman who was formerly a manager of a number of British plantations, and has lately returned from London, has given birth to this plan, and his brain child has become the adopted child of the A. A. A. of the good old United States. * * * And he thought the cotton farmer was doing well if he made $100 a year."

1935: September 25, New York Sun, Food From Overseas: "Twenty-two million pounds of butter came into this country from foreign countries. In the first 8 months of 1934 imported oats, for example, totaled scarcely 200,000 bushels, but this year in the same period imports exceeded 10,000,000 bushels. Imports of corn in the same period of this year exceeded 31,800,000 bushels compared with 371,700 in 1934. American wheat exports dropped from 16,600,000 bushels in the first 8 months of 1934 to 142,000 in 1935." (While crops in this country were being burned and plowed under.)

1935: Witnessed a secret national peace conference financed by a grant from the Carnegie Endowment for Peace, see New York American, December 19, 1935: "Meeting behind closed doors at the Westchester Country Club at Harrison, N. Y., the conference, composed of 29 organizations, adopted the following six-point program:

1. A Nation-wide radio campaign to commit the United States to a policy of internationalism.

2. Crippling of the Army and Navy billion-dollar appropriation bill by attaching a billion-dollar housing project clause as a rider.

3. Abolition of the Army and Navy sedition bill, which would punish anyone attempting to incite enlisted men to insubordination or mutiny.

4. Abolition of the R. O. T. C. in colleges.

5. A vigorous campaign against those who oppose this country's entrance into the League of Nations and to prevent the United States from obstructing the League in applying sanctions.

6. Adoption of the drastic neutrality bill.

1935–36: American Association for Adult Education, 60 East Forty-second Street, New York City, Carnegie endowed, lists the following activities that are financed by the Carnegie Corporation, and the Rockefeller General Education Board: Forum Experimentation (public forums), Federal Emergency Program (cooperates with U. S. Office of Education), C. C. C. camps, community organization, workers' education, international relations, commonwealth college. (See p. 5701, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, April 14, 1936, also see Annual Report of the Directors, above address).

1936: Witnesses Nicholas Murray Butler sailing on the Queen Mary June 5, for the most important Carnegie Endowment for Peace Conference in London, England, that has ever been held. It is at this meeting that the question of gold being used on an international basis is to be discussed.

1936—Herald Tribune, June 19, 1936, page 22: "Supply Held Adequate for World Gold Basis." There even may be too much, Brookings Institution says. Brookings Institution (Carnegie-endowed) study of the adequacy of the gold supply, written by Dr. Charles O'Hardy, held that no existing or prospective deficiency in the world gold supply stood in the way of restoration of an international gold standard, whenever such a step was considered advantageous. * * * Two officials of the Federal Reserve System: Dr. E. A. Goldenweiser, chief economist, and Adolph C. Miller, former governor and special member, recently made speeches heralding return to the gold standard in modified form. Henry Mongenthau, Jr., Secretary of the Treasury, has said that the United States will cooperate in such a movement as soon as the rest of the world is ready.

NOTE: What guaranty have the people of the United States that the currency which they would hold would be redeemable in gold?

1936: Witnesses the United States Government largely influenced or controlled by organized financial interests cooperating with or under the control of the 20th Century Fund, Inc., or American Foundations and their Fields. Some of these with their officers and trustees are listed herein:

The Carnegie Fund joined with the (Rockefeller Fund) General Education Board because they found themselves doing the same work. Above quotation from the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace Year Book, 1934.

The Carnegie, Rockefeller, and Twentieth Century Funds have through subsidies control over our press, churches, schools, the stage, cinema, colleges, and our Government, and America has not had a President entirely free from this control, particularly since the war.

1776: Hark ye to the warnings of the men of the "horse and buggy days"!

In his Farewell Address, George Washington bequeathed to the American people, as he said the "counsels of an old and affectionate friend." And he did so in the hope that his advice and admonition would, in the years to come, serve the following useful purpose:

1. "Moderate the fury of party spirit."
2. "Warn against the mischiefs of foreign intrigue." (This includes Britain.)
3. "Guard against the impostures of pretended patriotism."

George Washington also said:

"I never have heard, and I hope I never shall hear, any serious mention of a paper emission in this State; yet such a thing may be in agitation. Ignorance and design are productive of much mischief. The former (ignorance) is the tool of the latter (design), and is often set at work suddenly and unexpectedly."

Daniel Webster warned you, in 1832, while in Congress:

"Of all the contrivances for cheating the laboring classes of mankind, none have been more effectual than that which deludes them with paper money. This is the most effectual of inventions to fertilize the rich man's field by the sweat of the poor man's brow. Ordinary tyranny, oppression, excessive taxation—these bear lightly on the happiness of the mass of the community, compared with fraudulent currencies and the robberies committed by depreciated paper. Our own history has recorded for our instruction enough, and more than enough, of the demoralizing tendency, the injustice, and the intolerable oppression, on the virtuous and well disposed, of a degraded paper currency, authorized by law, or in any way countenanced by government." (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, January 24, 1934. Speech by Hon. Louis T. McFadden, of Pennsylvania.)

Mr. Speaker, the information contained in this booklet is important at this time, particularly in view of the fact that the pro-English groups in the United States are now working in close cooperation with world internationalist organizations.

Before 1917, foreign influence came mainly from Anglo-American groups. Since the World War, these groups have been fortified by the international financiers and the internationalists, or the so-called minority group. The pressure is therefore more than double, for combined, these groups control all avenues of communication and are now using them to further their plan of British domination to establish a world federation of states.

Let me call your attention to the fact that on the reverse of the great seal of the United States, which appears on our dollar bills, you will find the exact symbol of the British-Israel world federation movement. This symbol is also carried on literature of other organizations promoting a world government and a world religion. At the bottom of the circle surrounding the pyramid, you will find the wording: "Novus Ordo Seclorum." It was this new order that was advocated by Clinton Roosevelt several hundred years ago; recently in Philip Dru, and now followed by the Executive.

Do you not think, as good American people, that the administration has gone far from constitutional government, when there is inscribed a symbol on the reverse of our great seal, that advocates a new order? Yes, an order which means the destruction of our Republic as formulated in the Constitution of the United States.

It may also interest you to know that this contemplated "Union Now," as advocated by Clarence Streit, will be under the control of Great Britain, and is a movement to return the United States as a colony in the British Empire. Should we become a part of this union, our traditional rights and liberties will be lost, and we will have no greater status than an English possession. This was the dream of Cecil Rhodes and Andrew Carnegie, when the latter wrote his book, Triumphant Democracy, in 1893.

Embargo Against Japan in 1918

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEWIS B. SCHWELLENBACH

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 20 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ARTICLE BY HENRY H. DOUGLAS

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article by Henry H. Douglas, a distinguished student of Far Eastern affairs, which appeared in the August issue of Amerasia. The article is entitled "A Bit of American History—Successful Embargo Against Japan in 1918."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Amerasia for August 1940]

A BIT OF AMERICAN HISTORY—SUCCESSFUL EMBARGO AGAINST JAPAN IN 1918

(By Henry H. Douglas)

During the past 3 years of Japanese aggression in China, officials, private individuals, and groups in the United States have consistently advocated an embargo on the sale of war supplies to Japan. All their efforts have foundered on the rock of public apathy and the unreasoning but widespread fear that such action would provoke immediate retaliation which the United States was not prepared to combat. Advocates of the embargo have repeatedly pointed out that if Japan, with large-scale American aid, is unable to conquer a country far weaker than herself, she is not likely to challenge a strong power like the United States once that aid has been removed. Still the fear remains and ties the hands of those in official circles who recognize the inconsistency of America's present behavior toward Japan.

In view of the widespread debate which has been carried on over the question of the probable effectiveness and the possible risk of an embargo, it is of the utmost importance to discover that the United States already has behind it the history of an economic embargo against Japan which proved so effective that within 3 months Japanese policy was altered to suit American wishes, and in conformance with previous agreements. The details of this almost unknown event in American-Japanese history were recently disclosed in State Department records and are summarized herewith. (Foreign Relations of the United States, 1918 Russia, v. II, pp. 270–465; 1919 Russia, p. 247 (here is to be found the reference to file No. 694, 119/245, in the Division of Research and Publication in the State Department, which was consulted, by special permission, by the author); 1921, v. II; 1922, v. I, pp. 363–371, 701–733.)

In August 1918 the United States and Japan jointly agreed to a plan of intervention in eastern Siberia, under which each country was to send 7,000 troops to that area. Japan's brazen violation of this agreement by dispatching to Siberia, with no word to the United States, 72,500 troops instead of the agreed 7,000 is well known. Also well known is the fact that they withdrew a large number of these troops by the end of 1918, but how American economic pressure was used to bring this about has not previously come to light.

Japan's desire for territorial expansion and domination, nourished for generations, found expression, after her declaration of war on Germany in 1914, in her seizure of the German holdings in Shantung, which had been leased by China to Germany. This was followed shortly after by the presentation of the 21 demands, which, if accepted, would have made a virtual protectorate of China. In Russia's exhaustion due to the war, her military collapse, and the revolution, Japan saw another opportunity for aggrandizement. The Japanese not only saw the opportunity for succeeding to Russia's position in Manchuria and Mongolia, but also for bringing all of Siberia east of Lake Baikal under Japanese domination. They did everything possible to prevent the establishment of any kind of stable government in Siberia following the Russian collapse, and immediately began acquiring mining, railway, shipping, and fishing rights, power plants, flour mills, etc., all over eastern Siberia. A host of Japanese surveyors swarmed into the maritime provinces and beyond. Subsidized colonization on a large scale also took place during this period. In whatever direction the situation developed, this economic penetration and colonization promised to be of enormous strategic value and importance. The possible possession of eastern Siberia became a fixed part of Japan's foreign policy.

Japanese merchants poured vast quantities of inferior and often worthless goods into Siberia. All this was shipped free of charge as military stores and was sold at exorbitant prices.

The idea of intervention in eastern Siberia in 1918 originated with the Japanese. By this means they saw a golden opportunity for gaining political control of this area. During the last days of the Kerensky regime they disseminated propaganda in all the Allied nations, pointing out that Japanese intervention in Siberia would save it from falling into the hands of the Germans. Later Japan made specific proposals to this effect to the United States and the other principal Allies. British and French opinion were inclined to accept the Japanese plan of intervention, but only on condition that the United States would also assent. The United States refused, and it was this refusal that killed the plan for exclusive Japanese intervention.

As a result of Japan's overtures to Gen. D. M. Horvath, the Russian commander in the Far East, it was definitely revealed that Japan was not interested in restoring Siberia but was interested only in that portion east of Lake Baikal which, once under her control, she would be able to hold indefinitely.

The United States did not relax her opposition to exclusive intervention by the Japanese, but finally agreed to a plan of joint intervention under which the United States and Japan were each to send 7,000 troops to Siberia. This announcement was made on August 3, 1918. A few days later it was tacitly agreed that Japan might send 12,000 troops instead of the original 7,000. The force dispatched by the United States totaled 7,649 fighting men and officers. With no further word of any kind to the United States, Japan proceeded within the next few weeks to send a force of 72,500 troops to Siberia. This was more than all the other forces of the Allied intervention, east and west, combined.

It was Japan's intention to do in Siberia at that time what she later did in Manchuria in 1931. It had been agreed that the army of intervention should be under the supreme command of the Japanese, and they always saw to it that a Japanese officer of higher rank was present whenever any important action of any kind was either taken or contemplated. Every harbor and every river in Siberia was dominated by the Japanese. Every bridge and road was guarded by Japanese troops and every railway station flew the Japanese flag only. No one of any nationality, military or civilian, could come or go but the Japanese General Staff was informed, though the American and European staffs were never informed of Japanese movements. Nothing moved without Japanese permission.

The situation became so bad that the commanders of the troops of the western nations made a formal protest, and on November 2, 1918, Secretary of State Lansing told Viscount Ishii, Ambassador to the United States, that Japan had gone too far. Japanese action had produced serious tension. President Wilson, disappointed and displeased with Japan's failure to observe the agreement, made the most vigorous diplomatic protest and authorized the strongest kind of economic pressure. On November 18, the War Trade Board issued an order stopping the further granting of all licenses for the export of cotton to Japan and the import of silk from that country. Outstanding licenses were not revoked, but would have been had this been found necessary. Iron and steel and their products were considered for such action, but as the feeling seemed to be that Japan would be able to obtain these products elsewhere, cotton and silk were chosen as the commodities that would make the embargo most practically effective.

At that time we were buying from Japan about $15,000,000 worth of silk and were selling that country roughly $13,000,000 worth of cotton per month. This trade was vital to Japan's economy. The action taken by the United States, together with the effect of the collapse of Germany, brought an immediate favorable response from the Japanese. Over 50,000 troops were removed from Siberia by the end of December 1918. This was so gratifying to the United States that the granting of licenses was shortly restored. In fact, the response to the embargo had been so immediate that the only eventual effect on the trade statistics for cotton and silk was the reduction of silk imports by about one-third during the first 3 months of 1919.

In this incident we have a concrete example of the effectiveness of American economic pressure. This action resulted in the removal of over two-thirds of the troops Japan had sent to Siberia.

The Washington Conference of 1922 continued the process begun in November 1918, with the result that the last Japanese troops left the Siberian mainland in October 1922.

The situation today is, of course, very different from that of the autumn of 1918. Japan is a far stronger military power and her ruling class, both military and civilian, are thoroughly committed to a program of forceful expansion on the continent. Moreover, Japanese confidence and morale have been strengthened by the successes of her fellow-aggressors in Europe. But the United States, too, is far stronger than in 1918 and, which is even more important, Japan is today far more dependent upon American supplies for the continued functioning of her war industries. She no longer has alternative sources from which to secure sufficient quantities of iron and steel products, machine tools, oil, etc. In half a dozen key commodities Japan is dependent upon the United States for the greater portion of her imports.

There is every reason to believe that if Japan had been able to do so, she would have used the same sort of "blitzkrieg" tactics against China as Hitler used against Holland, Belgium, and France. It is logical to conclude that Japan did not do so because she could not. This fact alone is a measure of Japan's weakness and of her vital dependence upon supplies she has been securing chiefly from the United States. Viewed in this light, the example of the 1918 embargo should provide a strong argument for the effectiveness of an embargo today. In 1918 the United States Government was not afraid to make its displeasure felt by measures which were easily understood by the militarists of Japan. Diplomatic protests were backed by economic pressure and the desired results achieved. Today the issues at stake are of more vital importance to the United States; the weapons at hand of equal if not greater effectiveness. This bit of history should do much to encourage the American people to demand a repeat performance on the part of the United States.

National Youth Administration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LAWRENCE J. CONNERY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 20, 1940

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, it has recently been called to my attention that a movement is afoot within the National Youth Administration to enter upon a program of constructing throughout the country for unemployed American boys a system of so-called barracks in which these youth are to be housed while being trained and educated for gainful employment.

I have no doubt whatever that the objects and intentions behind such program are worthy ones. Such an endeavor has already been undertaken, I understand, at Passamaquoddy in Maine with a great degree of success.

But in this instance I must protest, Mr. Speaker, if the information which comes to me is correct, for I have been told that the National Youth Administration must carve into the present existing limited appropriation made available on July 1, 1940, in order to carry out this vast new project. If this is done it will mean that at least 5,000 boys and girls now employed by the National Youth Administration in my own State of Massachusetts will be sacrificed in order that the mere pittance they are now receiving may be expended in the erection of wooden structures. If this is true in Massachusetts then similar cuts will be made in National Youth Administration rolls throughout the country.

After all, I believe it is the sense of this Congress that as many boys and girls, who unfortunately have been unable to secure employment, be cared for under this National Youth program as is possible with such funds as have been made available, and that the Congress having exhibited at all times a sympathetic interest in the welfare of these countless American boys and girls will therefore look with great disfavor upon any move which in all probability will send thousands upon thousands now on the rolls into the streets.

To my mind it would be much better if those in charge of the National Youth program would hesitate before making such a move and, if such an extensive program is contemplated, come before Congress and seek additional appropriations for the purpose of initiating it. We can have no sympathy for any such project when it means that wooden structures throughout the land will discriminatingly house a few at the expense of many of our youth.

Steps Toward British Union, a World State, and International Strife—Part I

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. THORKELSON

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 19, 1940

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, in order that the American people may have a clearer understanding of those who over a period of years have been undermining this Republic, in order to return it to the British Empire, I have inserted in the RECORD a number of articles to prove this point. These articles are entitled "Steps Toward British Union, a World State, and International Strife." This is part I, and in this I include a hope expressed by Mr. Andrew Carnegie, in his book entitled "Triumphant Democracy." In this he expresses himself in this manner:

> Let men say what they will, I say that as surely as the sun in the heavens once shone upon Britain and America united, so surely is it one morning to rise, to shine upon, to greet again the reunited states—the British-American Union.

This statement is clear, and the organizations which Mr. Carnegie endowed have spent millions in order to bring this about. This thing has been made possible by scholarships, exchange professors, subsidies of churches, subsidies of educational institutions; all of them working for the purpose of eliminating Americanism as was taught once in our schools and to gradually exchange this for an English version of our history.

These organizations were organized to bring about a British union, a union in which the United States would again become a part of the British Empire. However, this has been upset to some extent by the attempt of the internationalists to establish their own government as an international or world union. And there is, therefore, a conflict between the two, for England wants a British union, with America as a colony, and the international money changers want a Jewish controlled union, in order to establish their own world government.

It is, therefore, best for us to stay out of both of these, in order to save what is left of this Republic as it was given to us in 1787, by a people who knew more about international intrigue and the real problems that confronted the world, than we know today. These early founders not only understood the problems, but in drafting the Constitution they provided an instrument for us to follow, so that we could remain secure from foreign double-dealing and intrigue. Had we adhered to the Constitution as it was given to us, we would have been secure and safe today.

Therefore, it is our duty, in the interest of our people and in the interest of this Republic of the United States, to ponder seriously and to give fullest consideration to solving the problem which now confronts the world. In doing so, I am rather inclined to believe that the real American people will decide without hesitation, to return to those fundamental principles that were set forth in the Constitution of the United States. Let no one tell you that this instrument is not as valuable today as it was in 1787; for the fact is that it is much more valuable today—so much so that complete disintegration of this Republic cannot be avoided should we fail to return our Government to the principles set forth therein.

I shall now quote an article by Andrew Carnegie, which he wrote at the request of the London Express, and which appeared in that paper October 14, 1904, entitled "Drifting Together."

DRIFTING TOGETHER—WILL THE UNITED STATES AND CANADA UNITE?

(Written by request for the London Express, October 14, 1904, by Andrew Carnegie)

Britain and America being now firmly agreed that those who attempted to tax the American Colonies against their protest were wrong, and that in resisting this the colonists vindicated their rights as British citizens and therefore only did their duty, the question arises: Is a separation forced upon one of the parties, and now deeply regretted by the other, to be permanent?

I cannot think so, and crave permission to present some considerations in support of my belief that the future is certain to bring reunion of the separated parts, which will probably come about in this way: Those born north and south of an imaginary line between Canada and the United States, being all Americans, must soon merge. It were as great folly to remain divided as for England and Scotland to have done so.

It is not to be believed that Americans and Canadians will not be warned by Europe, with its divisions armed, not against foreign foes, but against each other. It is the duty of Canadians and Americans to prevent this, and to secure to their continent internal peace under one government, as it was the duty of Englishmen and Scotsmen to unite under precisely similar conditions. England has 7 times the population of Scotland; the Republic has 14 times that of Canada. Born Canadians and Americans are a common type, indistinguishable one from the other. Nothing is surer in the near future than that they must unite. It were criminal for them to stand apart.

CANADA'S DESTINY

It need not be feared that force will ever be used or required to accomplish this union. It will come—must come—in the natural order of things. Political as well as material bodies obey the law of gravitation. Canada's destiny is to annex the Republic, as Scotland did England, and then, taking the hand of the rebellious big brother and that of the mother, place them in each other's grasp, thus reuniting the then happy family that should never have known separation. To accept this view, the people of the United Kingdom have only to recall the bloody wars upon this island for centuries arising from Scotland and England floating separate flags, and contrast the change today under one flag.

The Canadians and Americans may be trusted to follow the example of the motherland and have but one flag embracing one whole race in America. Present petty jealousies melt away as the population north and south become in a greater degree born Americans.

Even if this blessed reunion came as early as the end of the next decade, say 16 years hence, Canada and the Republic—the Scotland and England of America—would embrace 115,000,000 of English-speaking people, probably 7,000,000 of these in Canada. By the end of the present decade, 6 years hence, their population will be close to 97,000,000—6,000,000 of these in Canada. The Republic added to her numbers the past 14 years more than the total population of Australasia, or than that of Canada, the immigration having been enormous. One of these years it almost reached a million.

CECIL RHODES

The peaceful union of Canada and America would lead Britain to a serious view of her position, resulting in the conclusion that Cecil Rhodes reached—it will be remembered that he was at first a strong British Imperialist. Mr. Stead recounts that Mr. Rhodes went to Lord Rothschild and laid that scheme before him, who replied—"This is all very well, if you can get America to join—if not, it amounts to nothing!" This led Mr. Rhodes to a study of the subject, and the result was he saw clearly that Lord Rothschild was right.

British federation would leave Britain as a member of the smaller part of her own race, and out of the main channel of progress; instead of sitting (with race imperialism accomplished) enthroned as the mother among hundreds of millions of her own children, composing all but a fraction of English-speaking men. Hence he abandoned the scheme and thereafter favored race federation, and left to America more scholarships than to all other lands. He saw that it was to the Republic, not to British settlements, his country had to look for the coming reunion of his race, with Britain in her rightful place as parent of all. A few figures will leave no room for dispute about this. In the last decade, 1890–1900, Britain, Canada, Australasia, and New Zealand, combined, added to their population 4,500,000—America 13,500,000. Canada only added 508,000, the Commonwealth of Australasia only 660,000. In the 4 years since 1900 America added more than the total population of either Canada or Australasia. During the present decade, 1900–1910, at the same rate of increase to date, she will add more than the present total white population of Canada, Australasia, New Zealand, and South Africa combined. So fast does the Republic grow, so slowly the Empire.

INCREASE OF POPULATION

The United Kingdom itself increased last decade more than three times as much as Canada and Australasia combined. It is not to her colonies, therefore, that Britain can look for much increase of population or of trade. The growth of Australasia, small as it was in the last decade, so far as reported in this decade is even less. Canada is growing faster only in the far northwest, which is separated by a thousand miles of barren land from the English-speaking Province of Ontario. Last decade Ontario Province (English) actually declined in British population; Quebec Province (French) slightly increased. The census of 1900 shows fewer British-born residents in all Canada than that of 1890. The wheatfields now reached by rail are being settled by Americans who cross the border, selling their American farms and buying new farms in Canada at one-tenth of the price realized for the old. Except for this influx, about 70,000 so far, the rate of increase in Canada will be about as last decade.

When we come to the population of the United Kingdom, we find already in England and Wales 558 to the square mile. What thoughtful man could wish much further increase, even if it were possible? A denser population must cause deterioration. The density of population in England and Wales is not reached by any European country, except the small state of Belgium. France has only 188, Germany 270 (or one-half), Italy 290, Japan has only 296. The authorities agree that England and Wales are fully populated. Ireland proves that it is so by the small increase. Scotland has increased steadily for some decades, but little scope is left for further increase. Substantially, Ireland and Scotland have today all they can maintain in comfort.

Mark the contrast. America has only 21 people per square mile, one-sixteenth that of the United Kingdom, one for every 26 in England and Wales. These figures include Alaska, which resembles most of Canada, and is not likely to support many people. Excluding Alaska, the American population is 28 per square mile, one-twentieth that of England and Wales. It is evident that Green was right when he wrote years ago that the home of the English-speaking race was not to be on the Clyde and the Thames, but upon the Hudson, the Delaware, Ohio, Mississippi, and St. Lawrence. There is not room for it in the dear old home, but there is, fortunately, in the new lands of her children in Canada and America.

When we note the development Britain has attained industrially, we are amazed. It is wonderful almost beyond belief: we doubt and investigate to assure ourselves that we have the facts. This little kingdom has today more shipping, and about as many spindles turning as all the rest of the world. She is the richest of all nations per capita. She makes more iron and mines more coal per capita than any nation. Marvelous! Nothing comparable to her in history! She positively dwarfs all previous records—a dwarf more powerful than most giants. Who is there, then, who can expect her to do more, what she has accomplished being scarcely credible?

PHYSICALLY IMPOSSIBLE

It is physically impossible that much further increase can come to Britain, and in addition to this, conditions otherwise are unfavorable to further development. Other nations by the use of her inventions, are more and more supplying their own wants, and will continue to do so. They will also compete with her more and more, especially in iron and steel, and in cotton manufactures, owing to her lack of the cotton plantations and of needed iron stone. If Britain succeeds in maintaining present production in these fields great will be the credit due to her captains of industry. As with population, therefore, so with industrials—much increase is impossible.

This is the age of consolidation, industrially and nationally. Consider the recent consolidation of Italy and the more recent consolidation and rapid growth of the German Empire. Who can imagine that the process has stopped? On the contrary, we are on the eve of further consolidations in Europe of great extent. The successes of the American Republic, 45 States consolidated into one Union, with free trade over all, and that of Germany with its Zollverein, are too significant to pass unheeded.

The day of small nations is passing. Their incorporation with larger areas is to be hailed by lovers of progress, provided always that one point be carefully preserved. The national sentiment of the small powers should not only be guarded, but fostered in every way, so that, as in the American Union and in Britain, the Virginian and the Scotsman remain as intensely Virginian or Scotch as ever. Pride in and loyalty to the wider empire do not supplant but supplement love of the part where he was born. He loves the part and is proud of the whole.

What will Britain do? The day is coming when Britain will have to decide on one of three courses. First, shall she sink—comparatively to the giant consolidations—into a third- or fourth-rate power, a Holland or Belgium comparatively? Here note that we do not postulate her actual decline, but the increased growth of other powers. Or, second, shall she consolidate with a European giant? Or, third, shall she grasp the outstretched hand of her children in America and become again as she was before, the mother member of the English-speaking race?

Assuming that other powers are to increase their present population (as Germany and Russia have yet room to do), or by further consolidation, it being evident that there is not room in the 120,000 square miles of the little, crowded United Kingdom for further increase of moment, then the conclusion is inevitable that one of these three courses is the only possible alternative, for Britain has no adjoining territory she can annex.

Some have been disposed to regard British federation as a possible fourth alternative, but the figures given, which convinced Rothschild and Rhodes, we submit, compel its exclusion, especially to such as seek for my motherland, as I do, a destiny worthy of her—a future commensurate with her glorious and unparalleled past. Let us rejoice that this is open. Her Canadian and republican children across the Atlantic will hail the day she takes her rightful place in the high council of her reunited race—that race whose destiny, I believe with faith unshaken, is to dominate the world for the good of the world.

Our Foreign Commercial and Agricultural Activities Under Highly Qualified Director

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL STEFAN

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 20, 1940

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, we are now in the midst of a great debate over our export and import business. We are worried over our future foreign trade. On July 29, 1940, Mr. Raymond H. Geist, Chief of our Division of Commercial Affairs, Department of State, delivered two very important addresses before the twenty-seventh national foreign trade convention at San Francisco. These addresses contain valuable information and answer many questions which many Members who are interested in our foreign trade have been anxious to learn about. For that reason I respectfully submit these addresses in my remarks.

Mr. Speaker, here on this floor we debate daily reasons for the loss of our foreign trade but we hear very little about the men we employ to represent us in foreign lands where they must keep in close contact with the foreign purchaser, the question of foreign economy, the questions of foreign supply and demand. It was my privilege to inspect our foreign service less than a year ago. One of my duties was to inspect and talk to the personnel. By and large I feel that those men in our foreign commercial service are highly qualified for the tasks we have assigned to them. I hope that we see the day that our Department of Commerce will emerge from its present chaotic condition and be equally as strong as our foreign commercial service. In these unsolved foreign problems our foreign commercial service is facing great obstacles, but it faces a gigantic task when the future brings about more tranquil world conditions. I feel that its personnel is equal to this great task.

Its Chief, Mr. Geist, has been in our service many years. Although these foreign service officers are not vocal and we in this House hear very little about them, the records of our Foreign Service, if examined, will show a great service already performed by this one officer. I feel we are fortunate in having Mr. Geist as Chief of the Foreign Commercial Affairs and his continued service in that capacity, in my opinion, will bring a large measure of beneficial service to American industry, service which will be reflected to the benefit of our producers.

The address and statement are as follows:

I have been asked to present at this session of the twenty-seventh national foreign trade convention a statement regarding the recent reorganization changes in the Foreign Service of the United States.

Under the President's Reorganization Plan No. II, which went into effect July 1, 1939, the Foreign Services of the Departments of Commerce and Agriculture were combined with the Foreign Service of the United States. It will be recalled that, according to this plan, all commercial attachés and agricultural attachés became Foreign Service officers, and, consequently, officers of the Department of State, functioning at our missions abroad under the direction of the Secretary of State. This plan has now been in effect over a year. These changes were brought about after mature deliberation by responsible officers not only in the Department of State, but also in the Departments of Commerce and Agriculture. It was not a plan hastily devised. The advantages inherent in effecting a well-unified organization in our Foreign Service, especially in connection with those factors having directly to do with the all-important task of promoting the foreign trade of the United States, have been recognized for many years. However, such changes are not readily brought about; they pass through a process of evolution, which process is sometimes accelerated by the exigencies and imperative needs of the times. But such changes, when they are effected through the need of reaching a state of greater efficiency, represent a definite step forward.

It is well known that one of the tendencies in government generally is to create overlapping and duplication of effort, and there must be a steady alertness at all times to counteract this. We are always prone to add something new to what already exists, believing that a new or supplementary organization will take up the loose ends of the old. It is a far better practice to strengthen existing organization and bring about efficient unification. This was the primary object of the reorganization recently put into effect in the Foreign Service. By this consolidation three separate organizations, under three different departments of the Government, with three independent services and corps of officers, became one.

These changes were not made, as must be emphasized, solely for the sake of good administration. That alone would be sufficient reason for effecting unification, and much could be said from that point of view, but the primary reason has been to afford the commercial and agricultural interests of the United States the most effective and efficient Foreign Service possible. This was the chief aim in view; this aim has been achieved.

I may say briefly that at a time like this, when foreign affairs become so important to our national interests, it is highly important that no confusion exist in the organization of the machinery of government through which we conduct our foreign relations. Nearly all departments of our Government have some interests abroad and are in need of information of one sort or another from other countries. The Foreign Service, uniting the abilities, talents, and energies of trained officers, is equipped to serve our national interests on the widest scale and to satisfy these demands to the fullest extent. It is not necessary except, probably, on temporary assignment, to send specialists abroad to supplement the qualifications of officers permanently on duty. With the addition of the commercial and agricultural attachés to the staffs of diplomatic and consular offices stationed abroad, our Foreign Service is prepared to fulfill every task which circumstances and emergencies may impose upon it. We may congratulate ourselves that owing to the foresight of those officers in our Government who were willing to devote their energies, wisdom, and untiring efforts to these problems, our country faces the threatening international situation with a well-unified and splendidly organized and equipped Foreign Service second to none.

It is unnecessary at this time to go into the impelling reasons which prompted the Government to effect the consolidation of the various services abroad. The events which are now taking place on the international stage afford sufficient argument to establish unity wherever it may be attained. It is singularly fortunate that at least on the diplomatic front our organizations have been adequately prepared to meet the added tasks and responsibilities which international events impose; the Foreign Service of the United States is ready to meet these emergencies. No one will deny that the conduct of foreign relations today is a matter of primary importance to any government. Hasty efforts to set up an efficient diplomatic and consular service might indeed prove more disappointing and difficult than putting the country in a state of adequate military defense. Both require time and a great wealth of experience and knowledge. The Foreign Service of the United States has been in process of formation for at least a hundred and fifty years. During the last generation great advances have been made, and only a year ago the last step toward unity and completeness of organization has been achieved. In these times when international events have become not only the preoccupation of the Government but of every American citizen, it will be some comfort to know that we have a strong Department of State and a strong and vigorous Foreign Service. It is of vital importance for the commercial and industrial interests of this country to know that our diplomatic and consular establishments abroad are efficiently organized and adequately staffed; that the officers, from the Ambassadors and Ministers down through the ranks, are experienced and competent. But no mater how competent the officers are and how well qualified to undertake the important tasks entrusted to them, it is well known that division of responsibility and lack of unity may well frustrate the most sincere and earnest efforts. It may be that this lack of unity in previous years did not even then prevent a good job of trade promotion being done. The fine record of our commercial attachés and Foreign Service officers during the more normal years of international commercial intercourse, I believe, will sufficiently prove this. Let me quote from a memorandum prepared in the Department of State on the question of consolidation:

"The first reason for consolidation arises from the fact that the fundamental factors involved in foreign-trade promotion have profoundly changed. After the passage of the war years there was a certain decrease in American shipments abroad, due to the reentry of competing countries in world markets, but our exports increased annually until 1929, due largely to three factors: the quality of American goods, mass production in the United States, and the enormous amount of capital funds lent abroad by this country. The problem facing the consular officers of the Department of State and the commercial attachés of the Department of Commerce was in those days of relative simplicity. They were asked to find competent distributors in good standing with no competing lines for products in which the American exporters were interested. A wealth of information of a commercial nature was accumulated; extensive lists of the importers of all kinds of products in all countries in the world were compiled; thousands of reports on distribution, competition, and standing of foreign firms were written by our officers, until today the World Trade Directory file, largely prepared by consular officers, in the Department of Commerce, contains the names of almost 700,000 firms. Under the old technique of exporting this would be all that the exporter would need to have. With the knowledge that he could compete with his merchandise and with precise information as to the standing of a prospective distributor in a given country, he was ready to do business. In many instances the only obstacle to further advancement of American exporting in a given market was the limit of the purchasing power of the population for imported goods.

"This picture has completely and rapidly changed in the last few years and may be expected to continue to change. In many markets the questions whether the American exporter is on a competitive basis, whether his goods are of better quality, or whether the importer and the public in general are demanding his merchandise are of no consequence in the face of a local-quota policy barring all imports of that commodity in order to protect some incipient national industry, or in the presence of a clearing or barter agreement. On the other hand, the importer may be faced by an exchange-control policy so devised that if the American exporter is not actually precluded by it from entrance into the market, he can only sell goods in that market with the realization that the proceeds of his sale may be tied up indefinitely in a central bank awaiting issuance of dollar exchange by the government authorities in sole charge of this function.

"We must realize that the essence of this situation is that the old technique of trade promotion does not meet our present needs. The problem today of furthering our foreign-trade interest is in a large measure one of keeping open the channels of trade by negotiating with the central government through the medium of the Foreign Service of the Department of State; that is, ambassadors, ministers, and Foreign Service officers with representative capacities."

I would not assume that the gentlemen who have come here as delegates to the Twenty-seventh Annual Convention of the National Foreign Trade Council are interested alone in the effectiveness of the Foreign Service of the United States from the point of view of trade promotion. Our interests today are broader and more vital than that. If we are threatened the first onslaught may be against our economic security and the position of our trade in the markets of the world, against which eventualities we shall need to avail ourselves of every measure of protection. The task of defending our economic and commercial interests abroad is one of the paramount duties of the Department of State and the Foreign Service of the United States. Today this has become a major job, and according to the present outlook will become more imperative as time goes on.

In every process of recession in the course of time there sets in a countermovement. Recovery of the position of our foreign trade may be achieved only through extraordinary effort which we must be prepared to put forth when the time comes. The Foreign Service has been organized to do its part not only in promoting our foreign trade, in protecting it, but is also ready and equipped to battle ahead in the struggle for its recovery.

It will not be surprising to you to learn that during the last 12 months an unprecedented strain has been placed upon our officers in the field. Not only is this the fact with respect to nearly every office in the Service from the point of view of work and multiplicity of responsibilities and duties, but also with regard to the Service as a whole. During this period the Government has closed 5 missions in various capitals of the world and 14 consular offices. During the same period 1 new mission has been opened and 17 consular offices. Diplomatic representation was withdrawn from Tirana, Albania, on September 16, 1939; from Brussels, Luxemburg, Oslo, and The Hague on July 15, 1940. Since then the new mission at Canberra, Australia, has been opened. The consulate general at Warsaw has never formally been closed, but it is no longer functioning. The consulates have been closed at Strasbourg, Havre, Lille, Calais, and Cherbourg in France. The office at Danzig has been removed to Königsberg in east Prussia. Breslau, in Germany, was closed a few days after the outbreak of war in Europe. We have closed our offices at Hull, England, and Dundee, Scotland. In this hemisphere we have closed the consulates at Saltillo, Mexico, and St. Pierre-Miquelon. The consulate at Ensenada, Mexico, has been transferred to Tijuana, and that at London, Ontario, to Sarnia. We have opened consulates in Iceland and in Greenland. Additional consular establishments have been set up in certain places in Canada, Colombia, West Indies, British Guiana, and Brazil. These changes indicate the strain which the international crisis has placed upon diplomatic and consular activity in various parts of the world. Nevertheless, in spite of these grave events, our Foreign Service establishments have continued to function at top speed; and where our officers have had to carry on sometimes in the midst of invasions they have not failed to extend every protection and aid to American interests affected by the course of the war.

The Department, however, has not interrupted the program which has now been in progress for some time of combining the various governmental establishments at the capitals into unified offices. At present there are 33 missions in the world where all the activities of the governmental agencies are under 1 roof, and where a single administration under the supervision of the Ambassador or Minister has been established. This scheme of uniting all governmental activities in 1 mission has made it possible to carry out effectively the provisions of the reorganization plan by which the commercial and agricultural attachés became officers of the Foreign Service of the United States. There have been established at the missions where we have combined offices sections which have been designated reporting units. These reporting units have been placed everywhere in charge of the commercial attachés, whose duties are to direct the reporting work done primarily for the Department of Commerce, carry on trade promotion on behalf of the business interests of the United States, superintend the work of answering trade inquiries, the preparation of World Trade Directory Reports, trade lists, and other related activities. Besides, in order that as much unity may be achieved as is practicable, the reporting work of all consular establishments within the jurisdiction of the mission has been likewise placed under the supervision of the commercial attachés. This plan has now been in effect since July 1, 1939; but in certain cases the reporting units were not set up immediately and the full scheme of coordination has been delayed owing to the sudden occurrence of events brought about by the war. Nevertheless the physical amalgamation of our agencies abroad under 1 roof in the various capitals where the Department has been able to carry the plan through has afforded almost everywhere in the service the immediate opportunity of setting up the reporting units I have just described. The first year of this new organization has demonstrated the soundness of the plan, particularly from the administrative point of view. We have been able under this new arrangement to maintain fully unified organizations at a time when single administration was essential. Due to world conditions, a large volume of reports from the field is being interrupted through lack of transportation and by the fact that certain offices abroad are having their reporting work temporarily interfered with by events caused by the war, as in France and other countries now under military occupation. Nevertheless, the statistics of reporting work show a considerable increase during the first 6 months of 1940 compared to the same period in 1939.

Volume of work increase [1]

[6-month period from Jan. 1 to June 30]

Type of work	1939	1940	Percent of increase
Economic reports for reading, distribution, grading, and filing	13,977	17,124	22½
Telegraphic reports for reading and distribution	1,371	2,154	57
Letters from Department of Commerce for transmittal, etc.	5,011	6,144	23
Letters from firms for reply and action	291	437	50

[1] Partial statistics of work performed in the Division of Commercial Affairs, Department of State.

The volume of trade letters transmitted from the field in reply to trade inquiries from American business interests is not included in the above figures, owing to the new system of replying to certain types of trade inquiries prepared in the form of reports which have been designated as market surveys.

The changes which have been made in the manner of transmitting certain material from the field are as follows: Replies to trade inquiries from American firms or individuals concerning an agency connection, or a market survey involving the recommendation of an agent or distributor, are embodied in the form of a report and transmitted in envelopes direct to the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce for transmission to the American inquirer; World Trade Directory Reports, of which the automatic annual revision has been discontinued, are transmitted direct to the Bureau, likewise all trade lists, trade disputes and complaints, and invitations to alien businessmen.

It has been, and will continue to be, the primary duty of officers of the Foreign Service to further the agricultural and commercial interests of the United States. They conduct careful studies and report on the potentialities of their districts as a market for American products or as a competitor of American products in international trade. They investigate the standing of firms and their distributing capacity and incorporate this information in World Trade Directory Reports which are sent to the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce where they are available to American interests. Officers throughout the Service compile and submit upon request trade lists of commercial firms in their districts. They are constantly on the alert for concrete trade opportunities which are promptly submitted by mail or telegraph. There is, besides, a constant endeavor to create within the scope of the duties of officers stationed abroad a demand for American products in the countries where such officers are assigned. American interests are also promoted by taking appropriate steps to facilitate the promotion of such import trade into the United States as the economic interests of the United States may require. These duties are in accordance with the requirements laid down in the Foreign Service regulations.

There are, moreover, certain rules to be observed in replying to trade inquiries. I mention this because I understand that certain exporters are desirous of having more information as to the procedure followed in this respect by the commercial attachés and consuls abroad. The regulations provide that officers shall answer trade inquiries promptly and with their replies enclose trade-information sheets describing the commercial and economic aspects of their district. These answers are to be specific and complete. It happens sometimes that it is not possible to complete an investigation at once, and in such cases acknowledgments are sent to the inquirer advising that the complete reply will follow. It may be pointed out, however, that if the inquiry concerns a subject on which the officer has already rendered an adequate report, he may confine his reply to a brief synopsis of the information contained in the report and also make the statement in his reply to the effect that current and complete information may be obtained upon application to the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce or to the nearest district office. Firms seeking information concerning the markets for their goods in foreign countries should bear in mind that a large volume of data and commercial information has been already made available in Washington; and it is possible that all the information required is on file in the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce. In any case when a report has been sent in on a specific commodity, subsequent inquirers will be advised to address themselves to the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce.

In view of the present condition of world trade in many countries today it would be a waste of time for officers to undertake to make investigations and prepare market surveys for commodities and articles which cannot be imported. Owing to trade restrictions which exist in certain countries, such as import licenses, or lack of exchange, or the application of a commercial policy which temporarily prevents the importation of American goods, or the export of certain classes of material, it would be purposeless for the commercial attachés or consular officers to go further in their replies to trade inquiries than to state the pertinent facts. It is obvious that no real purpose can be served in furnishing complete market information when conditions beyond control render the export of goods from the United States to certain countries impossible.

Let me also, in this connection, make an explanation about World Trade Directory Reports. American firms receive inquiries from foreign firms and individuals who are in no position to enter into contracts for the importation of goods or make agency arrangements. Often the names of such inquirers are not contained in local directories or known even to existing credit-rating agencies. Their places of business are not infrequently situated in outlying provincial towns outside of commercial centers to which a visit by a consular representative is impracticable and, from the point of view of expense, prohibitive. World Trade Directory Reports on such firms are unobtainable. It would be better policy for American firms to refrain from seeking to do business with firms of this standing and character and confine their efforts to houses or individuals of established reputation and on whom credit information is readily available.

Under the Economy Act of June 30, 1932, the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce has been obliged to make a charge, the amount to be fixed on a reasonable basis by the Secretary of Commerce, for certain services rendered to American business firms and individuals. Since the first of May 1940 a charge has been collected by the Bureau not only for World Trade Directory Reports, which charge has been fixed at $1, but also for trade lists compiled by the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce for distribution to American business firms desiring such lists. In connection with this service a new procedure has been adopted in replying to certain types of trade inquiries. On receipt of an inquiry from an American firm or individual concerning an agency connection, or a market survey involving the recommendation of an agent or a distributor, prompt acknowledgments are made by the commercial attaché or by the consular officer receiving the inquiry. In these acknowledgments it is stated that suitable connections are being investigated and that appropriate recommendations will be transmitted through the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce. After the commercial attaché or consul has made the necessary investigation and a personal canvass has been made of prospective agents or distributors, a reply in the form of a report is prepared and transmitted direct to the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce for transmission to the original inquirer. In connection with such report a list is transmitted of the names of agents or distributors who have expressed an interest in the goods offered.

A new system has also been inaugurated with regard to the handling of trade opportunities forwarded to the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce by the commercial attachés and consular officers. Trade opportunities are divided into two classes: Those dealing with the outright purchase of goods and those affording opportunities for agency or distributor connections. Those offering the outright purchase of goods are published, and those from firms seeking to act as agents or distributors are filed and furnished to American firms only on request. A charge is made for this service. I may also add in summing up the activity of the Foreign Service in connection with the promotion of the trade of the United States that commercial attachés and consular officers whose positions abroad have afforded them unusual opportunities for becoming familiar with trade conditions in the countries where they have been stationed will be available for trade-conference work in the United States as heretofore when they return on leaves of absence.

The Departments of State, Commerce, and Agriculture maintain the closest liaison in order to coordinate every phase of the work of the Foreign Service on behalf of the agricultural and commercial interests of the United States carrying on foreign trade. I have given a description of the present status of our problems and efforts. It is impossible to foresee what changes may be necessary in organization or method to meet the situations which the steadily shifting scene in international trade may create. It appears reasonable to expect, however, that any schemes which we may develop to further our interests abroad or any plans which may be elaborated to fortify and extend the commercial and economical prestige of the United States in international trade will have to be organized on a basis which takes into consideration the existing structure of the Foreign Service, which is composed of officers possessing wide and extensive knowledge of the problems involved in international trade.

While studying and acting upon the grave political problems facing us in the international field, we must, above all, continue to establish our foreign trade and our economic position in the world on a sound and strong basis. What we must do will be courageously and boldly determined and carried out. The next step is to consider ways and means of organizing ourselves further, and then to determine how to strengthen and perfect the instruments of government to meet these tasks.

ADMINISTRATION OF THE EXPORT CONTROL ACT

For the benefit of those who might have questions to ask regarding the procedure to be followed in making applications for licenses to export articles and materials (other than arms, ammunition, and implements of war and tin-plate scrap) designated by the President as necessary to the national defense pursuant to section 6 of the act of Congress approved July 2, 1940, and known generally as the Export Control Act, I might opportunely make a few suggestions.

It must first of all be borne in mind that the provisions of the act went into effect on July 5, only 3 days after its approval, and that the Fourth of July, a national holiday, came in between. It was necessary during this period to have the text of the act made available to exporters as well as the regulations prescribed by the President and the forms of application. Though the forms and all the necessary explanatory material were rushed through the printers as fast as possible, it was not possible to get the forms into the hands of the exporters during the first few days before the Department of State was overwhelmed with requests for information. As you know, the administration of the provisions of section 6 of the act is vested in an Administrator of Export Control, to which office Colonel Maxwell, an Army officer, has been appointed. The mechanical work of handling the applications and acting upon them under the direction of the Administrator of Controls is centralized in the Division of Controls in the Department of State. The machinery thus set up must of necessity be centralized in Washington, and, therefore, any wish on the part of business interests of the country to have the procedure decentralized throughout various regions of the country is not feasible.

The forms and texts and explanatory material have been sent out generally to those firms in the country who it was believed might be directly interested. Forms have also been made available at the New York customhouse. They are immediately available now at the Department of State, Division of Controls. A few suggestions in connection with the procedure may be given:

It would be in the interest of certain firms who are regularly engaged in export business to appoint a competent person to handle these applications, so that he can familiarize himself with the procedure and the details in making out the forms of applications for licenses. This will avoid the necessity of frequent long-distance calls and special trips to Washington by a representative of the company. An overwhelming majority of the questions which are asked would not be necessary if a representative of the company would make it his special task to be familiar with the text of the proclamation, the regulations, and the form of application. The forms, regulations, and instructions are clear enough; but, as in all matters, a certain amount of experience and familiarity with the procedure is valuable and contributes to the smooth and easy and prompt working of the whole process.

In this connection it may be suggested that it is not necessary for export houses to engage the services of lawyers in Washington to make out these applications for a fee. No lawyers, agents, or intermediaries are necessary.

By the end of the first week after the act had been signed, the Department had received 10,000 letters and telegrams asking questions of various sorts, and it is easy to imagine to what degree the existing organization, which was rapidly being expanded, was overburdened and deluged beyond capacity. These inquiries are now coming in at the rate of about 800 a day.

Exporters are asking many questions by telegram, by long-distance telephone, and letter, of which the following is typical: "Does the exportation of a patent medicine which has a drop of chlorine in it require an export license?" It is much better, and exporters are urged, to make out the application on the form provided for that purpose, giving a very careful description of the article or materials to be exported, and to send the application in to the Division of Controls in the Department of State as a test case. If directions are carefully followed as indicated in (c) of the general instructions on the form of application, where it states, "Articles and materials appearing under (7) below should be designated clearly and specifically, the type and model designation being included whenever applicable," it will be much easier for the Administrator of Export Control to act speedily on the application itself than to give information in advance without having all the details as required on the form of application.

Finally, let me say that the attention of exporters is directed especially to the second from the last paragraph on page 3 of the mimeographed regulations which reads:

"Except as otherwise indicated the terms used in these regulations shall not include completely fabricated articles or materials which are ready for ultimate consumption."

However, wherever there is legitimate doubt as to whether or not the article requires an export license the question should be settled by making the application on the prescribed printed form.

If no license is required, the form will be returned in a few days plainly stamped "No license required." The mechanics of handling these applications, granted or refusing the licenses, will presently be working smoothly, and it is believed that as a rule applications can be handled in Washington within a week's time. In all cases, it is advisable to make the application as much in advance of contemplated manufacture or shipment as possible.

Foreign Policy Editorials From Wallace's Farmer

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ERNEST LUNDEEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 20 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

EDITORIALS FROM WALLACE'S FARMER

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD certain articles from Wallace's Farmer, well-known farmers' journal and influential in farm legislation.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Wallace's Farmer of February 11, 1939]

STAY NEUTRAL

In the European war that may be growing out of the Italian conquest of Spain and the German conquest of Czechoslovakia, the United States has only two possible policies.

It can remain neutral or it can get into the war.

There is no half-way course. If we try to discipline the aggressor nations by what President Roosevelt calls "measures short of war," we shall automatically aline ourselves with the British-French alliance and get into war ourselves.

That is why it is so important that Congress refuse to weaken the present Neutrality Act.

Our only chance of staying out of another war is to refuse to lend money abroad, refuse to ship munitions to warring nations, and refuse to let our ships take chances on running exports of American goods through submarine-infested seas.

If nations at war want our wheat and lard and automobiles, let them come to our shores, pay cash for them, and carry them back home again.

Let us prepare to pay the high costs of an effective neutrality policy in order to avoid the far higher costs of war.

Remember 1917. This time, let's stay out!

[From Wallace's Farmer of May 25, 1939]

CAN WE STAY OUT OF A WORLD WAR?

We all want to see that the United States is kept out of war. But there's a whale of an argument going on as to just how to do it. One group—we can call them the "internationalists" for short—says that if a war comes in Europe, the United States is bound to be dragged in. Therefore, let's take part in European affairs now and try to head off war.

The other group—they are usually called "isolationists"—claims that Europe is probably going to have a war no matter what we do, that if we mess into it now we'll be sure to be dragged into war later, and that we do have a chance to stay neutral if we really want to keep out.

Both sides can make pretty good arguments. Our readers ought to be familiar with both points of view.

The internationalists are quite right in saying that if war does come in Europe, the United States will have a hard time staying out. They may be right that the threat of war comes because Germany, Japan, and Italy think that Great Britain and France are weak, and that the dictatorships could win a war.

The internationalists claim that if the United States dropped its neutrality legislation, announced that it would help Great Britain and France with munitions, food, and money, Germany and her allies wouldn't dare to attack.

The isolationists take the view that Europe will have to settle her own affairs and that the United States can't help by butting in. If the United States abandons neutrality legislation, if it promises munitions, food, and money to Great Britain and France, and if war still comes, then we would be in it in 5 minutes as avowed allies of those two nations.

Does the United States have enough confidence in the present governments of France and Great Britain to put itself in their hands? Do we want to put ourselves in a situation where a diplomatic blunder by a British Prime Minister would throw us into war? And if we ally ourselves with Great Britain and France, can we be sure that they may not take the aggressive against Germany and Italy?

The debate between the isolationists and the internationalists will probably reach a crisis in the attempt to amend the present Neutrality Act.

The Neutrality Act is designed to avoid the mistakes we made in 1914–16, to block shipments of munitions to warring nations, to block loans to them, to provide for a cash-and-carry policy on shipments of other goods if it seems that American ships might get into trouble because of blockades.

President Roosevelt, together with good Republicans like ex-Secretary of State Stimson, seems to feel that the Neutrality Act should be revised, and that the best chance we have of maintaining peace is to let Germany, Italy, and Japan know that in case of war Great Britain and France will be permitted to buy munitions and anything else they need from us.

Wallace's Farmer and Iowa Homestead, along with a good many Congressmen of both parties, feels that our best chance for peace is to strengthen the Neutrality Act, and to refuse to take any part in the present squabble.

From a long-time point of view, we believe that the position of the internationalists is sound. It is necessary to have concerted action by all of the nations to keep the peace. But, at the present time, it seems to us foolish to hope that we can help the cause of peace by dealing with the present Governments of Great Britain and France.

As all of our readers know, we regard President Roosevelt as the best friend that agriculture has had in the White House during our time. We agree with most of his other policies. But on this point, as we have brought out repeatedly in previous editorials, we are convinced that he is dead wrong.

We hope that Congressmen from the farm States will see that the Neutrality Act is kept intact. We believe that we can stay out of the next war if we are willing to pay the costs of neutrality. And we are very doubtful about putting our chances for peace in the hands of the Chamberlain who sold out Czechoslovakia at Munich.

[From Wallace's Farmer of April 22, 1939]

WILL IT HELP UNITED STATES TO FORBID SALE OF ARMS?

Will forbidding the sale of arms to nations at war help keep the United States out of trouble? This is the question which Congress is debating now.

Too much of the debate has to deal with the question of whether this policy will hurt Great Britain and help Germany, or whether a change of policy would hurt Germany and help Great Britain.

The thing that is really important should be whether the policy helps the United States. Whether it helps or hurts anybody else is a minor matter.

The neutrality act now contains a provision forbidding sales of munitions to nations at war. This provision was put in the act because Congress was convinced that the munitions boom of 1914–16 helped get us into the war in 1917.

The 1914–16 munitions boom gave us a stake in the success of the allied nations. It created a fictitious and temporary prosperity based on war orders. It made participation in the war on the side of the Allies promise profits to a great many people.

We did get into war in 1917. And this munitions boom was one of a number of things that helped to suck us in.

Opponents of the Neutrality Act suggest that the munitions boom of 1914–16 was partly a product of loans to Europe, and that if we insisted on cash payments the boom would be a mild one. They suggest further that we need to expand our munitions plants for our own defense anyway, and that we need to help Great Britain at least enough so that the British Navy, and not the German Navy, will control the seas.

Their plea is that the United States should put munitions on a cash-and-carry basis. Let any nation come and buy. That would help Great Britain and France, but it would also help Japan. And Japan is probably more of a menace to the United States than Germany and Italy together.

Wallace's Farmer and Iowa Homestead believes that the safest plan is to stay out of the munitions business and to refuse to sell arms to anybody. But, unquestionably, the cash-and-carry plan applied to munitions would be much better than the credit-and-boom plan we tried in 1914–16.

[From Wallaces' Farmer of June 3, 1939]

THE BOGEYMEN CAN'T GET US

Those folks who are worrying for fear Germany, Italy, and Japan will suddenly land an expeditionary force on our shores and blow us all out of our beds can smooth down their agitated hair. It can't be done.

At last reports, the 3 nations had a combined force of 19 battleships against our 15. Of really modern battleships, they have 8 against our 12. Assuming the miracle of getting the 3 hostile fleets together in mid-Atlantic, our Navy could probably battle the lot on even terms. In our own waters, our Navy would be stronger than the combined fleet. The farther away from home a navy gets, the weaker it becomes; more ships are taken out of the battle line to protect the supply line.

But suppose three miracles happened, first that Germany, Italy, and Japan decided to forget about Russia, France, and Great Britain to attack the United States; second, that the three fleets got together; third, that they defeated our fleet. Then what?

These powers don't have ships enough to land more than 200,000 men on our shores, even if we gave the transports a police escort and refused to bomb them. And if the 200,000 landed, they would find a combat force of 400,000 men (Regular and National Guard) waiting, with an adequate air force in support.

Nobody is going to attack us. Nobody can attack us. If we get into trouble, it will be because we go out looking for it.

PAMPHLET BY JOHN J. WHITEFORD

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my own remarks in the RECORD, I include a pamphlet by John J. Whiteford. This pamphlet should be of interest to every Member of Congress because it deals with a subject that will soon confront us, as it did in 1917:

SIR UNCLE SAM, KNIGHT OF THE BRITISH EMPIRE

(By John J. Whiteford)

In these days of national and international confusion and conflict there is one issue on which the American people are substantially in agreement—We do not want war.

This great desire to keep out of war is perfectly logical. We know the cost of war from bitter experience. We are no more responsible for the outbreak of the present hostilities than we were in 1914. We are not an aggressor nation and we have no designs on foreign territory. We have nothing to gain and much to lose if we again take part in foreign wars. We have enough vital problems at home that require all of our attention and efforts. When and if the time should ever arrive, we shall be fully able and willing to defend our shores against foreign invasion.

There are, indeed, a thousand-and-one good reasons why we should stay out of foreign wars.

With all the self-evident advantages of peace for America as against the horrors of war in Europe and Asia, and with an overwhelming majority of our people against war, there still remains the ominous fact that there is a definite danger of this country drifting toward war. Even as in 1914, we are again being deluged and directed by foreign propaganda, only to a much larger extent. Again we have no clear understanding of the real issues involved. In our confusion we are again taking sides, mentally so far, but that is a ripe condition for expert foreign propagandists to lead us toward active participation in the present conflicts.

I would like to say to every American, "There is only one side we can take, and that is the American side." With this in mind, let us try to find out what are the real facts behind these foreign-made conflicts, what are the basic issues at stake, and what are the forces that are so desperately working to again involve the United States in a world war. Only by facing facts and by clearing our minds from the fog of selfish foreign propaganda can we arrive at the right answer to the question, "What is best for America?"

For all our so-called civilization, the impelling force behind the present struggles in Europe and in Asia is still the law of the jungle—the survival of the fittest. Whether we like to admit it or not, that same force guided the early settlers of New England and Virginia when they had to fight for their very existence in a strange and hostile land where they were not invited. In the conquest of this new continent our forefathers proved themselves the strongest—the fittest—and the original owners, the Indians, lost. Only by the process of applying their superior fitness could our ancestors have built themselves a new home, gained their independence, and created a rich and powerful nation. We, as their descendants, stand ready to defend our country with all our might if ever the time should come when we are called upon to show our fitness to "have and to hold" what we have gained.

The struggle of the building of America is only one example of the struggle of mankind since the beginning. The greatest example of all time is the building of the greatest empire in history—the British Empire—covering roughly one-fourth of the world's land surface and inhabited by a quarter of the world's population.

When we speak of the British Empire we must bear in mind a much larger picture than just 13,300,000 square miles of land and 500,000,000 people. It is a huge international institution of world production, consumption, and distribution, with all the related activities of commerce, finance, shipping, industry, and so forth. This vast undertaking is not limited to the geographical borders of the Empire. Its influence extends to every part of the globe, from Hong Kong to Durbin, from Gibraltar to Cairo, from Singapore to Aden, from Melbourne to Montreal, from Bombay to Bermuda, from London everywhere.

The very vastness of the British Empire and its operations constitutes a constant danger to itself and to the peace of the world. Whenever any other nation feels the urge to expand, for whatever reasons and in whatever direction, it automatically comes in conflict with the broad interests of the British Empire.

In the Orient the Sino-Japanese conflict is not only a local matter between China and Japan. It is in reality a threat to British interests in China; to British "concessions" in China; to the huge British investments in China; to British control of Chinese railways and revenues; to British trade and shipping and even to the British port of Hong Kong in China. It is a blow to British prestige and power in the Orient, with repercussions throughout the world. It is actually a challenge to the British Empire. It brought from Britain a cry of outraged justice while at the same time she tried to deposit the Sino-Japanese problem into the lap of the United States.

When Italy marched into Ethiopia, Britain again became highly indignant. This was not because of a profound love for the Ethiopians nor because Ethiopia might bring Italy great wealth. If Ethiopia had really been very valuable, that country could have been, and probably would have been, annexed to the British Empire long ago. The real reason for Britain's agitation was the fact that Italy dared challenge British power in the Mediterranean and endanger British control of the vital Suez Canal regions.

The Treaty of Versailles was in reality an instrument for the permanent elimination of Germany as a world competitor of Great Britain. For years after its signing the Germany people chafed under this yoke, to the point where, defeated and discouraged, Germany became dangerously close to becoming a communist soviet republic. Gradually German leadership took hold and pulled the people out of their spirit of defeatism and, as the pendulum swings, so has Germany again become a menace to Great Britain.

The great bear of Russia is also a definite threat to the British Empire, with its communistic paws uncomfortably close to the Balkan and Suez Canal countries, to India and Burma, and already resting heavily upon a large section of China.

Today, denuded of all propaganda, there is only one fundamental issue behind all the conflict in Europe and Asia—the survival of the British Empire. That was also the real issue of the World War. It is the old challenge of Napoleon.

The most important international question before the people of this country and of the world is whether Great Britain can continue indefinitely to defend herself and her empire against all comers, singly or in combination, and prove her fitness to "have and to hold" her dominant world position. Therein also lies the key to the problem whether America may or may not again be drawn into a world war.

It seems to me that the answer to the above question is definite and indisputable—Britain cannot win a major war in Europe and Asia without the active assistance of the most powerful of all nations, the United States. In their own interest the people of this country will have to make up their minds, soon and soberly and without being influenced by undue sentiment, whether America shall continue to gamble with her youth and her treasure to help defend the British Empire in every new crisis, or whether there are saner and better ways of insuring the peace of the world.

Today the greatest single menace to the peace of the United States is the same as in 1914. It can be summed up in one word—propaganda. Even as today, this country was neutral at the beginning of the World War and managed to stay out of it from 1914 until 1917. But during that time the foreign propaganda machines were working overtime to get us involved in a war that was decidedly not of our making. Finally, on April 6, 1917, America declared war on Germany and so became an active ally of Britain. In addition to the United States, the other allies were Belgium, Brazil, China, Cuba, France, Greece, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Italy, Japan, Nicaragua, Panama, Portugal, Rumania, Russia, Serbia, and Siam. It is true that some of the Allies, like the United States, were active only during part of the war period while others were little more than benevolent bystanders. But against this powerful combination the group of Germany, Austria-Hungary, Turkey, and Bulgaria held out for more than 4 years, from August 1914 until November 1918, and the German group might have won the war but for the entrance of America into the conflict.

In the present crisis the only active allies of Britain are, so far, the British Empire units and France. If the conflict should spread into another world war Britain cannot again count on her former combination of allies; in fact, it is more than likely that some of these countries will be lined up against her. Therefore, the most powerful ally of all, the United States, must be kept in line by Britain against eventualities. That can only be accomplished through propaganda. And the British are past masters in the art of making gullible Americans swallow the bait of persuasive propaganda.

Few Americans realize the magnitude of British influence in this country. When I write frankly on this subject I fully understand that I lay myself open to the accusation of favoring Britain's enemies. That is not at all the case. I am only following the single track of being pro-American, and I would be grateful to any critics if they would join me on that straight road. I clearly see the menace of all subversive movements, as well as the great necessity of combating all these un-American activities. The point is that, in our justified agitation over communism, nazi-ism, and fascism, we are overlooking another subversive movement that has actually proven to be more destructive to our peace and welfare.

In the past it has been largely responsible for drawing this country into the World War at a cost of thousands of our young men and billions of dollars and a long period of depression. It does not work openly and it is not generally recognized by the public. It does not yell from soap boxes in Union Square, call strikes, picket, or hold parades. It operates from the top down and so it reaches into every stratum of American life. It is the far-reaching power of British propaganda to make this country subservient to the interests of Great Britain and the British Empire.

The scene is a banquet held at the Hotel Plaza, New York City, October 25, 1939. This banquet was given by the Pilgrim Society of America in honor of the Marquess of Lothian, British Ambassador to the United States. It is an old custom of the American Pilgrims to extend this honor to every newly appointed British Ambassador, the same as the British Pilgrims invite every new American Ambassador to their midst at a banquet in London.

There are several curious things about these Pilgrim functions. In the first place there is present at these dinners an array of notables such as it would be difficult to bring together under one roof for any other purpose and by any other society. The Lothian dinner was no exception. Presiding over this affair was Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler, president of Columbia University, and chairman of the American Pilgrim Society. Among the guests were John D. Rockefeller and J. P. Morgan, Thomas W. Lamont and other members of the House of Morgan, Frank L. Polk, Jeremiah Milbank, James W. Gerard (former American ambassador to Germany), the French Ambassador to the United States, Lt. Gen. Hugh A. Drum, U. S. A., Maj. Gen. John G. Harbord (chairman of the Radio Corporation of America), the Secretary of the Treasury, Henry Morgenthau, and many other leading figures in government, diplomacy, politics, finance, banking, shipping, law, industry, insurance, and education. These men had come especially to honor Lord Lothian and to hear him speak. Before this important audience Lord Lothian's speech could not merely be a light after-dinner talk of clever stories and witticisms. It was an important speech and as such it was carried by the New York Times as front-page news.

As a highly experienced publicist, Lord Lothian opened his remarks with the naive statement that his country has no propaganda in America; that he would merely explain his country's position. The "explanation of his country's position" developed into the same old theme of most British statesmen, writers, lecturers, publicists, and other trumpeters for Anglo-American unity. It can be summed up in one stereotyped formula: "For your own good and for the good of the world, these two great democracies, the British Empire and the United States, must stick together." What this plea to America really amounts to is this: "We have the largest empire in the world. Never mind how we got it. The trouble is that we may not be able to hang on to it much longer. America is rich and powerful and wants no more additional territory. You should help us out whenever we get into trouble so that we can continue to enjoy what we have."

Lord Lothian practically confirmed that message when he wrote in Foreign Affairs, 1936:

"The situation of the last century cannot be re-created by Great Britain alone. She is not strong enough. But the United States, the South American republics, and the nations of the modern British Commonwealth could together re-create it. * * * They also are both democratic and territorially satisfied * * *."

And the morning after the Pilgrim dinner a front-page headline in the New York Times read: "Lothian asks unity in democratic aims."

There is something magnetic about the word "democratic." It is very dear to Americans and it means much to them. Once they even went to war * * * "to make the world safe for democracy." They may again be fooled by an appeal to democracy. Knowing this, it has become a valuable vehicle for foreign propagandists, and its real meaning is lost sight of in the confusion. The Communist Party of America, for instance, has officially adopted democracy in its constitution, in its literature, in speeches, and generally as an appealing propaganda attraction in selling their un-American ideology to the American people. * * * All democratic workers must stick together. It is a favorate theme with the radical labor wing.

And now we witness the weird spectacle of titled British visitors, from ambassadors to platform lecturers, using the same tactics in selling their story. * * * We great democracies must stand together.

What kind of democracy are we asked to adopt and to defend? The un-American brand of Marx, of Engels, of Lenin, of Stalin, of the Communist International. * * * Or the democracy of imperialistic Britain, of India, of Ceylon, of Burma, or Hong Kong, of Africa? * * * The democracy of the soap-box orators of Union Square, or the democracy of the Pilgrim banquets at the best hotels of London and New York?

Or shall we stand by our own conception of democracy, safe under the Constitution and the Bill of Rights, which still give us far more genuine personal liberty and opportunity than any other people in any other country of the world? If so, let us not forget that today, more than ever, the price of our liberty is eternal vigilance.

We must keep the bright spotlight of public opinion on all under-cover and un-American activities so that we may learn the truth and act accordingly. And we are entitled to know what the Pilgrim Society is, what it stands for, and who these powerful Pilgrims are that can call out the great to hear a British Ambassador expound to Americans the virtues of a united democratic front.

The Pilgrim Society originated in London, July 11, 1902, as an Anglo-American club of important Englishmen and Americans. An American branch was formed January 13, 1903, at the old Waldorf-Astoria Hotel, New York. Both societies are commonly known as The Pilgrims.

An extract of the Pilgrim constitution reads:

"The object of the society shall be the promotion of the sentiment of brotherhood among the nations, and especially the cultivation of good fellowship between citizens of the United States and its dependencies and subjects of the British Empire.

"The members shall be citizens of the United States or its dependencies or subjects of the British Empire, and others prominent for their sympathy with the objects of the society, who shall be elected by the executive committee, and membership in the London Pilgrims shall ipso facto constitute membership in the New York society, and vice versa, without additional dues. The membership shall be limited to 900. The number may be altered by the executive committee."

Nothing is more needed in the world than a "sentiment of brotherhood among the nations." Nowhere is the promotion of that sentiment more urgently and desperately needed than in Europe and in Asia. This was so even in 1902. But the group of eminent men who formed the Pilgrim Society in London did not step across the English Channel to hold out the hand of brotherhood to the weary nations of nearby Europe. Instead they preferred to reach out across the Atlantic for the special purpose of cultivating "good fellowship" between leading British and American citizens. This beautiful sentiment rose to a climax in 1917, when thousands of American good fellows crossed the Atlantic to fight other people's battles, and when the United States Treasury opened wide its purse to the Allies and lent them whatever they wanted. Then, indeed, Uncle Sam became the good knight of the British Empire. But when the battle was over—over there—and when the same Uncle Sam timidly suggested repayment of some of the billions of dollars of war debts, he was immediately dubbed "Uncle Shylock" by these same Allies. "Good fellowship" is difficult to define, like friendship, but whatever the definition is it should work both ways.

Who are these good fellows that are so deeply interested in British-American friendship and in "united democracy"? They are none other than the 900 of British-American aristocracy. They represent, as a body, the most powerful combination of men of wealth and influence on both sides of the Atlantic. They, the Pilgrims' membership in America and Great Britain, have included and still include men in the highest position in government, in diplomacy, in finance, in banking, in education, in the church, in literature, in publishing, in commerce, in industry, in shipping, and in practically all other important fields of national and international activities.

The president of the British Pilgrims is His Royal Highness, the Duke of Connaught, great uncle of the present King. As vice presidents are listed: The Most Reverend His Grace the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury; the Right Honorable Viscount Hailsham, P. C.; the Lord Desbrough, K. G., G. C. V. O.; Sir Harry E. Brittain, K. C., L. L. B., O. O. C. The membership of the British Pilgrims reads like an index to British leadership.

The president of the Americans Pilgrims is Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler, president of Columbia University. Dr. Butler has worked long and faithfully with the British. A United Press dispatch from London, December 6, 1939, stated: "In the 1940 edition of the British Who's Who, appearing today, the longest biography is that of Nicholas Murray Butler, president of Columbia University, who occupies more than a column and a half of small print—the equivalent of the combined biographies of Mussolini, Hitler, Prime Minister Chamberlain, and President Roosevelt."

Vice presidents of the New York Pilgrims are:

Herbert L. Satterlee (brother-in-law of J. P. Morgan), James W. Gerard, G. C. B. (former American Ambassador to Germany), the Right Reverend James DeWolf Perry, Elihu Root (deceased).

The executive committee of the New York Pilgrims consists of: Thomas W. Lamont, Franklin Q. Brown, George W. Burleigh, John H. Finley, Frederic R. Coudert, Edward F. Darrell, James G. Harbord, K. C. M. G., D. S. M., Theodore Hetzler, the Right Reverend William T. Manning, Gates W. McGarrah, Bryce Metcalf, Frank L. Polk, William Shields, Myron C. Taylor, Harry Edwin Ward, Charles S. Whitman, Owen D. Young.

As honorary members of the New York Pilgrims are listed: H. R. H. the Prince of Wales, K. G., H. R. H., the Duke of York, K. G., the British Ambassador to the United States, His Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, the Secretary of State of the United States, the British Consul General in New York City.

A few prominent Pilgrim members, past and present, are listed below: J. P. Morgan, Russel Leffingwell, Henry P. Davison, John W. Davis, John D. Rockefeller, Percy Rockefeller, Ogden Mills Reid, Henry Morgenthau, Otto Kahn, Robert Fulton Cutting, James B. Clews, John B. Trevor, William Fellowes Morgan, Henry W. Coudert, Marshall Field, Paul D. Cravath, Edward S. Harkness, Oliver Harriman, Edward L. Dodge,

The present membership in the American Pilgrims, and those who have passed away, represent the leadership of America in many important fields. We find among these a candidate for President of the United States, a Vice President, Secretary of State, Secretary of the Treasury, Attorney General, Ambassadors, Solicitor General, Senators, and Congressmen; presidents of the largest banks and financial institutions; presidents and directors of the United States Steel Corporation, and many other large industrial corporations; of the American Telephone & Telegraph Co.; of the Radio Corporation of America; of insurance and shipping companies. Here are also to be found the members of the leading law firms serving these banks and industries, as well as the interpreters of international law; editors, publishers, and owners of America's leading newspapers; experts in publicity; social and financial leaders and generally the group of men whose influence is capable of exerting great pressure on government and public opinion.

At the outbreak of the present hostilities in Europe, President Roosevelt expressed himself strongly on the necessity for maintaining our neutrality and he promised to do all within his power to keep this country out of war. That is also the great hope and desire of the American people. The Pilgrims and Dr. Butler disagree with this.

At a dinner in New York, at the Biltmore Hotel, February 9, 1928, in celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Pilgrims, Dr. Butler said in a speech:

"Among other things the Great War has proved conclusively that in a contest of those colossal proportions there were no neutrals * * * if the world should ever again become engulfed in another titanic struggle there would be and there could be no neutrals."

At this particular dinner, during which Dr. Butler expressed these sentiments so contrary to the real hopes and wishes of the American people, three telegrams were received and read to the celebrating American Pilgrims. One came from the King of England, one from the uncle of the King, and one from the Prince of Wales, the future King, now the Duke of Windsor.

The message from King George V was read by Sir Austin Chamberlain:

"The King has pleasure in congratulating the Pilgrims of the United States on the occasion of their twenty-fifth anniversary, and His Majesty takes this opportunity of conveying to them his good wishes for the future."

The future, according to the Pilgrims, does not include neutrality.

The message from the King's uncle, the Duke of Connaught, read:

"* * * The cause of promoting cordial friendship between our two great countries is one on which the future happiness of the world in a great measure depends. Ever since I have been president of the British Pilgrims I have realized to the full the success of the work carried on by the two societies with this common object in view."

Here again we have the same old story, whether it comes from an uncle of the King, from a British Ambassador, or from a platform lecturer * * * friendship * * * two great countries * * * common object. Here democracy was not mentioned, nor the promotion of brotherhood among the nations.

The message from the Prince of Wales read:

"As a Pilgrim of nearly 9 years' standing, I am very glad to send my brother Pilgrims in New York my warmest congratulations on the twenty-fifth anniversary of the club's inception in the United States. There have been many changes in the world during the past quarter of a century but ties which unite the Pilgrims on each side of the Atlantic remain firm as ever * * *. (Signed) EDWARD."

The British royal family certainly showed an extraordinary interest in a group of American citizens dining in New York. Since that time tremendous changes have occurred to Edward personally, as well as to the world, but he was right in his prediction that the Pilgrim ties "remain firm as ever."

Since we are dining so exaltedly, let us go to London and look at a dinner at the Savoy Hotel, April 12, 1917, of the Pilgrims of London "on the occasion of the entry of the United States into the Great War of Freedom." The guest of honor was His Excellency, the American Ambassador, Walter Hines Page.

The speeches at that dinner gave a clear expression of the "ties that bind" the American Pilgrims to London and confirmed Dr. Butler's conviction that "there were no neutrals" in the World War.

Sir Harry E. Brittain, chairman:

"I should like to read two cables which have arrived within the last few minutes from New York. The first is from our good friends and fellow members, the Pilgrims of America, and it reads as follows:

"At last the Union Jack and the Stars and Stripes are nailed to the same staff not to come down until the job is done. Our boys in khaki are anxious to rub shoulders with yours in France and share your struggle and your triumph in Freedom's cause. The Pilgrims' dream of 15 years at length has come to pass. (Signed) George T. Wilson, chairman." [Loud cheers.]

"The other message is from one who has been frequently and deservedly called the 'Allies' best friend in America,' that very excellent Pilgrim, James M. Beck. His cable reads:

"Joyous felicitations to the British Pilgrims now assembled to celebrate unity in blood brotherhood of English-speaking races. The day which Prussia did not want has come, when the flags of Great Britain, France, and the United States float together in defense of civilization. All hail the greater Entente which opens a new and more resplendent chapter in the history of our common race. To all who welcomed me so kindly last summer a cordial greeting at this great hour. (Signed) James M. Beck." [Loud and prolonged cheers.] (James M. Beck, prominent attorney, born in Philadelphia; United States attorney for eastern district Pennsylvania; Assistant Attorney General of the United States, 1900–1903; Solicitor General of the United States, 1921–25; Member of Congress, 1937.)

Good fellows, these American Pilgrims, or shall we say British colonials?

The Pilgrims' dream of 15 years turned into a nightmare for our boys in khaki, but the unity in blood brotherhood is still the goal of this one-way friendship between British and American aristocracy.

Viscount Bryce, former British Ambassador to the United States, spoke as chairman of the London Pilgrims. May we never have such a speech again. He said, in part:

"When the United States of America, renouncing the isolation which it had cherished since the days of Washington, obeyed the supreme call of duty and set herself in arms beside the free nations of the world in order to save the future of humanity, she took a step of full solemn significance for all the ages to come.

"And now, gentlemen, what is America going to do in this war? She is already doing what those who know her best expected from her. She waited long enough to be quite satisfied that honor and duty called her to arms. After long forbearance, when she was satisfied that the German Government was resolved to persevere with its barbarous and insulting policy, and that the whole feeling of the Nation had been aroused and concentrated as to be virtually unanimous, then America stepped to the front; then she bared her strong arm; then she began to throw all her resources, all her energy, all her inventive versatility, into the development of every possible means for the vigorous prosecution of the war.

"Gentlemen, America is in the war now for all she is worth [hear, hear] and how much that means those best know who know America best. [Cheers.] She will persevere to the end, for she knows what a successful end means to the future welfare of the world."

No one knew better than Lord Bryce how much America was worth as an ally of Great Britain. With enormous British hypocrisy he made it appear that America bared her strong arm to save the future of humanity and the welfare of the world, when in reality America came to the assistance of only one-quarter of the world, the British Empire.

Lord Robert Cecil was less diplomatic. Considering that the Pilgrim meetings in London have almost the status of official functions, owing to the important attendance, Lord Cecil overstepped the limits of diplomatic decency when he said at this dinner in honor of the American Ambassador:

"May I add one word about the staff of the American Embassy? [Hear, hear.] Many of us have had personal relations of a very friendly kind with several members of that staff, and they have always preserved the most accurate and correct neutrality in talking with us [laughter] but, somehow or another, after a conversation with any of them, we went away feeling as one does, after having received a hearty grasp of the hand from a friend and an earnest and heartfelt wish of Godspeed to our cause. [Cheers.]

"Well, gentlemen, neutrality is no longer necessary [hear, hear], and we all say thank God for that." [Hear, hear.]

Dr. Butler was right; there was no neutrality, not even in the American Embassy, before this country went into war. It was a joke to Lord Cecil and the Pilgrims.

The guest of honor, Walter Hines Page, spoke before this London group of British-American notables in his capacity as United States Ambassador to Great Britain, representing the American Government and the American people. He said, in part:

"As for the particular aspects of this great subject with which this club has from its beginning had to do—the closer sympathy of the two branches of the great English-speaking peoples—next to the removal of the great menace to free government, which is the prime purpose of the war, this closer sympathy will be to us the most important result of the victory. It will be important not only to us on each side of the Atlantic, but also to all other free nations."

And then Mr. Page made one of the strangest admissions that any diplomat could make under the circumstances. It is taken from the Pilgrim records as are all these quotations.

"Seven years ago an admiral of our Navy, Rear Admiral Sims, who sits now at this table, declared in the Guildhall that if ever the English race were pressed hard for ships, every ship that the United States had would come to the rescue. A great prophet as well as a great seaman, he has not been rebuked for that on this side of the water. [Cheers.]

"For my part I am stirred to the depths of my nature by this American companionship in arms with the British and their Allies, not only for the quicker ending of the war, but, I hope, for a moral union which will bring a new era in international relations.

"My lords and gentlemen, your generous and great compliment to me by making this large gathering in my honor is your way of expressing appreciation of the action of the Government and people that I represent and of the President at whose high command I have the honor to be among you in these historic and immortal days. I thank you with deep emotion."

It would have been more appropriate for the British to thank Mr. Page, with or without emotion, and to show their appreciation of America's participation in the great war of freedom in a more substantial manner than by getting together an imposing array of British notables for a Pilgrim dinner. It is interesting to note that among those who accepted the invitation of the Pilgrims so to honor Mr. Page were none other than Neville Chamberlain and Winston Churchill who are now leading another war of freedom, while the British Ambassador to Washington is leading another campaign in this country for unity of democracies.

In the nature of their exclusive membership and activities, the Pilgrims may be termed the wholesale agency for promoting the interests of Britain in this country. It is strictly a Tory organization. The retail outlet is the more widely known English-Speaking Union, which has for its avowed purpose:

"To draw together in the bond of comradeship the English-speaking people of the United States and of the British Empire by (a) disseminating knowledge of each to the other and (b) inspiring reverence for their common institutions."

It is interesting to note that the English-Speaking Union originated in London in the fateful year of 1917, when America bared her strong arm in defense of democracy. Like the Pilgrims, the English-Speaking Union has a British organization with headquarters in London and an American branch with central offices in New York. The purposes of the two organizations are virtually the same and there is an interlocking directorate and membership.

The patron of the English-Speaking Union (London) is His Majesty the King. The honorary president of the American English-Speaking Union is the prominent Pilgrim, John W. Davis, successor to the late Walter Hines Page as America's wartime Ambassador to the Court of St. James, Presidential candidate in 1924, and member of J. P. Morgan & Co. As treasurer of the American English-Speaking Union is listed Harry P. Davison, also a Morgan partner, whose father was instrumental in having J. P. Morgan & Co. appointed exclusive purchasing agents for the British Government in America during the World War. Another director of the English-Speaking Union is Maj. Gen. James G. Harbord, chairman of the Radio Corporation of America, and also a member of the executive committee of the Pilgrims.

As a valuable retail outlet for British propaganda, the English-Speaking Union of the United States covers this country with branches and correspondents in the following cities: Baltimore, Md.; Boston, Mass.; Buffalo, N. Y.; Chautauqua, N. Y.; Chicago, Ill.; Cincinnati, Ohio; Cleveland, Ohio; Columbus, Ohio; Dallas, Tex.; Denver, Colo.; Des Moines, Iowa; Detroit, Mich.; Grinnell, Iowa; Indianapolis, Ind.; Lake Placid, N. Y.; Lincoln, Nebr.; Los Angeles, Calif.; Louisville, Ky.; Milwaukee, Wis.; New York, N. Y.; Minneapolis, Minn.; New Orleans, La.; Philadelphia, Pa.; Princeton, N. J.; Providence, R. I.; Richmond, Va.; St. Louis, Mo.; Salt Lake City, Utah; San Diego, Calif.; San Francisco, Calif.; Santa Barbara, Calif.; Savannah, Ga.; Seattle, Wash.; Sewanee, Tenn.; Spokane, Wash.; Tacoma, Wash.; Washington, D. C.

The English-Speaking Union seeks to "draw together in the bond of comradeship" the people of this country and the British Empire. But let us not forget that in 1917 the Pilgrims spoke of "blood-brotherhood" and "comrades in arms." And now, when Britain is again at war, Sir Evelyn Wrench, C. M. G., LL. D., chairman of the English-Speaking Union of London (also a Pilgrim member), addresses his fellow members of the union in The English-Speaking World, October 1939, with the warning call:

"The English-Speaking Union was born 21 years ago during the Great War and it has an even greater function to play in the present crisis. We know we can count on your support."

The founders of the Republic speak to us today through the immortal words of George Washington:

"Against the wiles of foreign influence * * * the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake, since experience and history prove that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of republican government."

And yet, such are the times and such are the forces a century and a half after Valley Forge that many Americans, including many leaders of America, are advocating policies and ideologies foreign and contrary to the very fundamentals on which this Nation was founded. There is needed a new Declaration of Independence and a rededication of the proven principles of our form of government.

In our position as a rich and powerful nation we can no longer avoid the responsibility of leadership in a wilderness of foreign conflict. President Roosevelt, in his message to Congress, January 2, 1940, said that "in almost every nation of the world today there is a true belief that the United States has been, and will continue to be, a potent and active factor in seeking the reestablishment of peace."

If we are to accept and to act the role of peacemaker, the first requisite should be to stand before the world with clean hands and a cool head, fair and impartial to all, and free from any taint of favoritism and prejudice. Without this we would hold out false hopes to a war-weary world; we would not be entitled to the respect and cooperation of the embattled nations; the sincerity of our motives would be justifiably questioned, and we would fail, to the detriment of all concerned, including ourselves.

As a "potent and active" factor for world peace we cannot in the meantime accept the one-sided doctrine of "unity between the United States and the British Empire"; we cannot honestly and decently pose as an impartial apostle of world peace and at the same time act as the guardian angel of the British Empire; we cannot look fairly at the world through the meshes of the network of British propaganda; we cannot again allow our statesmen, our ambassadors, our leading bankers, lawyers, industrialists, churchmen, educators, and publishers to sway the sentiment of our Government and our people in favor of one side, a foreign side, inherently and basically non-American.

We have before us a costly lesson from the past to the present as a guide to the future. Let us remember 1914, and not forget in 1940 that a rising tide of war hysteria completely engulfed our Government and our people. The climax came on April 6, 1917, with an American declaration of war, approved by an overwhelming majority of a joint session of Congress. Only 56 out of 518 Senators and Representatives voted against war. Of the Members of the Senate only 6 dared cast their votes against the tides of war. One of these few, Senator Robert La Follette, Sr., addressed the President from the floor of the Senate with words that might well be repeated today:

"There is always lodged, and always will be, thank the God above us, power in the people supreme. Sometimes it sleeps, sometimes it seems the sleep of death; but, sir, the sovereign power of the people never dies. It may be suppressed for a time, it may be misled, be fooled, silenced. I think, Mr. President, that it is being denied expression now. I think there will come a day when it will have expression.

"The poor, sir, who are the ones called upon to rot in the trenches, have no organized power, have no press to voice their will on this question of peace or war; but oh, Mr. President, at some time they will be heard—there will come an awakening; they will have their day and they will be heard. It will be as certain and as inevitable as the return of the tides, and as resistless, too."

Today, with a warm heart full of sympathy for all the suffering in the world, we must firmly maintain our independence of thought and action, free from all foreign influence and entanglements so that we may think and speak and act as unimpaired Americans. Only then can we give the best answer to the question, What is best for America?

The Last Frontier

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES H. LEAVY

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

ARTICLE BY RICHARD L. NEUBERGER

Mr. LEAVY. Mr. Speaker, in the magazine, Free America, of August 1940, there appears an article by Richard L. Neuberger, of the Portland Oregonian, painting a vivid word picture of the possibilities in the Columbia River Basin, in the Pacific Northwest.

This article points out without exaggeration the possibilities of a decentralized industrial development that can and will come as a result of Grand Coulee and Bonneville and future development on the Columbia River. A portion of this territory being within my own congressional district and being fully familiar with the situation, I unhesitatingly state that the picture is not overdrawn. I commend it to the serious consideration of my colleagues and every person interested in well-balanced and orderly industrial development in a region that offers greater promise than any other section of our Nation.

The article follows:

LAST FRONTIER

(By Richard L. Neuberger)

It has become axiomatic to say that the American frontier is gone. And perhaps in the old sense of the word it is. Forty-seven years have passed since Frederick Jackson Turner wrote his great essay on the impact which the passing of that frontier would have on our social and economic institutions. Yet the National Resources Committee maintains today that one vast region of the United States "still has some of the aspects of the frontier."

This region is the Pacific Northwest, stretching in timbered majesty from the Continental Divide to headlands that break off into the Pacific Ocean. It covers 11 percent of the country's area, but has only about 3 percent of the people. Seven times as large as the State of New York, it has a population about half that of New York City. Malheur County in Oregon, for example, encompasses more territory than New Jersey, yet is inhabited by fewer souls than the single New Jersey community of Ridgewood.

The Pacific Northwest represents an opportunity to build a society that will, in the opinion of President Roosevelt, "avoid some of the mistakes and wasteful exploitation of resources that have caused such serious problems in other parts of the country." The Northwest, which consists of Washington, Oregon, Idaho, and that section of Montana west of the crest of the Rockies, has yet to fall into the old patterns that jar the mind and eye in so many regions. Its destiny is still to be shaped. It can build a new civilization without having to rehabilitate a civilization already founded.

The most important resource in the Pacific Northwest is the Columbia River. This waterway, the second mightiest river on the continent, contains in the main stream and its tributaries 42 percent of all the latent hydroelectricity in the United States. The Columbia pushes through the Cascade Mountains with a ponderous strength that is beyond computation. It snaps at granite cliffs with talons of white-capped water. It surges inexorably against basalt battlements and sandstone bluffs. And now it tosses fitfully at the foundations of two enormous dams—Bonneville, a $75,000,000 Goliath at tidewater, and Grand Coulee, biggest structure ever built by man, located in the heart of the Inland Empire.

These two huge undertakings will produce more power than the 14,082,282,000 kilowatt-hours turned out by the 260 electric plants in the State of New York. Obviously all this staggering supply of energy cannot be used in the farms and homes of the Northwest. New industries must absorb a great portion of it. Will these industries be scattered all over the region or will they be concentrated near the source of power, clustered like pup tents about the dam?

In September of 1937 the President dedicated Bonneville Dam. Standing beneath the dark crags of the Columbia Gorge, he delivered a speech which has been forgotten in the mad welter of wars, foreign crises, and political emergencies. Yet it was an important speech from the standpoint of America's future, and particularly important to the future of the Pacific Northwest. The President said the Northwest should not be a land of new "Pittsburghs." And then he added:

"It is because I am thinking of the Nation and the region 50 years from now that I venture the further prophecy that as time passes we will do everything in our power to encourage the building up of the smaller communities of the United States. Today many people are beginning to realize that there is an inherent weakness in cities which become too large and inherent strength in a wider geographical distribution of population.

"No one would suggest that the great cities of Portland and Tacoma and Seattle and Spokane should stop their growth, but it is a fact that they could grow unhealthily at the expense of all the smaller communities of which they form logical centers."

This speech went further in the direction of what John Chamberlain calls a "free, decentralist economy" than any other utterance by Mr. Roosevelt. The policy it inaugurated in the Northwest has also been in that direction. "Postage-stamp rates" govern the cost of power from Bonneville Dam. This means that the rates are no higher at the end of the transmission line than in the immediate vicinity of Bonneville. The necessity for new "Pittsburghs" is obviated. Two factories built to make use of Bonneville power—the Aluminum Co. of America and the Sierra Iron Works—are under construction not in Portland or Seattle, but in the much smaller community of Vancouver, Wash (population, 15,766). The Pennsylvania Salt Co. has an option on land in the Oregon hamlet of Cascade Locks (population, 1,135).

Near both Vancouver and Cascade Locks are grassy slopes and timbered swales where people can cultivate small farms. When the country was in the worst throes of the depression, some unemployed families from the cities trekked to Yacolt Mountain, not far from Vancouver. They cleared land, built cabins, and tilled gardens. Today they are still there, living off the soil. The Northwest is not yet blanketed with cities, towns, roadways, and factories. All its territory has not been taken up. The Federal Government owns half the region.

With thousands of men and women struggling with submarginal farms in the Middle West, with the metropolitan areas of the Atlantic seaboard crowded and jammed, the Pacific Northwest is a national safety valve. It is the one section of America capable of absorbing more population. Maj. Roy F. Bessey, of the National Resources Committee, announces that "with a reasonable development program, from one million to two and a half million additional people could readily be absorbed in the Pacific Northwest within a generation. Migration toward the region during recent years seems to indicate that the population increase may approach the higher figure."

The Northwest is vast and expansive. The population increase to which Major Bessey refers should be spread throughout the region and not concentrated in a few localities. This is not alone the hope of President Roosevelt. CHARLES L. MCNARY, senior Senator from Oregon and Republican candidate for Vice President, has often advocated the development of the whole river basin. He thinks every home ought to have a "kitchen garden." Several years ago Stuart Chase proposed that the Northwest be stabilized by having industrial workers there live on small farms that would serve as "anchors to windward" if the jobs threaten to give out.

The most important development now taking place in the Pacific Northwest is the construction of Grand Coulee. This stupendous structure, today nearing completion, will be the world's major source of hydroelectricity. It also will irrigate 1,200,000 acres of land, an area almost equal to all the farms in the State of Connecticut. This will not be soil that yields its bounty grudgingly. It will be rich, fertile land on an alluvial plain land capable of growing pears, peas, strawberries, apples, and the other prize fruits and vegetables of the Northwest.

The Coulee section will not be allowed to become either an overpopulated metropolitan area or a feudal domain of corporate farms. Congressman CHARLES H. LEAVY, of Spokane, has pointed out that the purpose of Grand Coulee is to take care of as many families as possible. Accordingly, land ownership at the great project will be restricted to 80 acres for a family and 40 acres for a single man. Combines and other large-scale operations will not be permitted. Land held in defiance of this limitation will be denied water from the Government canals and ditches.

At the same time that the dam itself rises above the murmuring river, the Bureau of Reclamation and the National Resources Committee are working to bar from the agricultural area the mistakes which are a blight in so many sections of the country. Jammed towns and crowded communities will be taboo. Recreational centers, schools, rural parks, warehouses, markets, public buildings—all will dot the entire 1,200,000 acres rather than become concentrated in any one place. An effort will be made to secure truck gardens even for the men and women living in the villages and hamlets. The land will be the basis of the whole society. And, as the St. Louis Post-Dispatch has claimed, the troublesome dilemma of agricultural surpluses will be largely avoided if most of the food raised at Grand Coulee is thus used for home consumption.

Irrigation and reclamation projects are the hope of the Northwest. Secretary of the Interior Ickes has estimated that besides Grand Coulee, smaller irrigation enterprises can reclaim 104,491 acres in the region. Such undertakings are bolstering the population total. One county in Oregon has increased 75 percent in inhabitants since 1930. This is due exclusively to a busy sugar-beet industry made possible by irrigation dams. The farms are not large, but they have been successful and are supporting hundreds of families. Many of these families are migrants from the Dust Bowl and other dried-out agricultural areas.

It is not without significance that the population rise in the Pacific Northwest in the last 10 years has been predominantly in the rural and suburban districts. The decade just closed was productive of events that sent 200,000 people trekking to the State of Washington, 175,000 to Oregon, and 85,000 to Idaho. They have not rushed to the cities. "In the past few years," says Arthur Langlie, the mayor of Seattle, "there has been a trend of population away from the cities to the suburban areas." And augmenting his statement, the Seattle Post-Intelligencer observes, "Seattle folk are demanding and getting lebensraum."

Seattle is the biggest city in the Northwest. Since 1930 its population has changed only slightly, yet the surrounding countryside has filled up like a mushroom patch. Suburban communities dot numerous roads and highways. Groves of fir trees have been cut down, and in their place are rural homes with small truck gardens. Most of these people work in Seattle, but they live outside Seattle in the adjacent rural districts. Seattle itself has had the smallest proportionate census increase in 60 years, yet the Pacific Northwest as a whole reports extensive gains.

Consider what has happened in Oregon. Portland is the only community of metropolitan proportions in that State. Since 1930 the Portland population has increased 2 percent. But the entire State has gained 14 percent, and the rural regions around Portland have soared 33 percent. Newcomers formerly rode into Portland on a train and took a lease on four rooms in an apartment house. Now they roll in on a wide highway, driving their coupe or sedan, and start making down payments on a bungalow and truck garden 14 or 15 miles from the city proper.

The eminent geographer, J. Russell Smith, once declared: "Basing my assertion on past history and economic and industrial conditions of today, it is in the Northwest where I expect American civilization, in many ways, to reach its maximum. Yes; I expect that it will outstrip New York—overcoming the advantage which the metropolis has had of an early start." Predictions of this sort are quite common in the Northwest. Why not? We live in an electric age, and any area with the greatest power stream on earth is bound to have the open sesame to future industrial development.

Although the people of the Columbia Basin want to fulfill J. Russell Smith's glowing prophecy and outstrip New York in some respects, they are not eager to outstrip it in others. Glittering word pictures of an industrial mecca have not been applauded in the region. The residents want new industries, new manufacturing, new mills, but they do not want crowded cities, densely settled factory towns, houses row on row like shoe boxes on a shelf. This attitude has been demonstrated many times.

Before President Roosevelt delivered his dedicatory address at Bonneville Dam, controversy over the disposal of the project's energy had been taking place for 6 months. One group wanted a vast factory community concentrated near the dam. The other faction maintained that factories should be scattered all over the Northwest, that power rates should not favor nearby industries and thus tend to build up new "Pittsburghs." The latter group won out. It attracted the support of most of the people. It defeated for reelection the Oregon Governor who had been the main advocate of the new "Pittsburgh" idea.

There is no doubt that the Pacific Northwest requires more industrial development. Today the region ships out raw materials—timber, wheat, salmon, copper, apples—and buys back finished products. This unfavorable balance of trade cannot continue indefinitely. Resources play out sometime. A Douglas fir can be sawed down in an hour; it took a couple of centuries to grow. Ultimately the Northwest must process and manufacture many of its raw products. But it does not want to trade the problems of a frontier, a frontier that may be even a colonial empire, if you please, for the more aggravating problems of a complex metropolitan area.

"Let our workshops remain in Europe," warned Jefferson. During the struggle over Bonneville power rates these words of his appeared in many rural papers: "I view great cities as pestilential to the health, the morals, and the liberties of man." Inasmuch as he had first sent Lewis and Clark westward, he was cited as the unquestionable authority on the region's destiny. The mandate eventually ordered for the same electric rates all along the transmission line—a line 275 miles long—was not a mandate against factories and industries per se, but against industries and factories compounded into places like Pittsburgh, Chicago, and Detroit.

Men and women in the Pacific Northwest have a chance to combine manufacturing progress with home life close to the soil. The region is still untrammeled and open, and the inhabitants have not lost their pioneering zeal. They would rather live bravely than hit the jackpot. "Stricken the region is now, its pioneering economy a wreck," wrote George Leighton a year ago, analyzing the collapse of the lumber industry. "But its people still are free." And free they are, choosing a frontier society to an imitation of the Atlantic seaboard.

"I think we must still continue," says E. B. MacNaughton, a forward-looking banker in Portland, "to make it possible for people who have been divested of their chance to be able again to strike their boots in and become self-respecting members in our communities and in our States." Unlike California, where the migrants are adrift on the highways, the Northwest has offered sanctuary to the wanderers from the middle-western drought regions. Many of them have found new farms; some have taken over old farms and made them yield pay crops.

The frontier is closed in the sense that Professor Turner considered it. No longer can a man wander into the Idaho wilderness and find land stretching to the horizon that will grow heavy stands of wheat. But in the Columbia River Basin conservation and development still can be used to reclaim some of the frontier. Dams and canals and tree breaks can provide new acreage. Hundreds of farms on the broad plateaus, thousands of truck gardens in the dales and valleys near Portland and Seattle indicate that all avenues of escape from the city are not yet barred. The Northwest remains.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LAWRENCE J. CONNERY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 21, 1940

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, it is with a great deal of pleasure that I offer for the attention of the membership of the House the tremendously interesting editorial which recently appeared in Yankee Doings, the official publication of the Yankee Division Veterans' Association.

I have the honor of being a member of this organization, which is composed of those who served in the famous Twenty-sixth—Yankee—Division for 19 months in France during the World War, the first National Guard division to land in France in 1917.

The authorship of the article, which genuinely reflects the sentiments of those brave men, may be ascribed to Philip N. Sanborn, one who gallantly served in the ranks.

The article follows:

In what dream world is this that we are living? What is this sense of unreality that pervades these deep summer days—this awareness of things felt but not seen—this fearful uncertainty of days to come—these wheelings and strange gyrations of those very stars of destiny to which our souls have become affixed—this trembling and quavering of those foundation stones upon which the structure of our lives has been built—which have, until now, seemed as eternal as the heavens?

From where this is written, peace lies like a gentle caress upon the green earth. A song-sparrow twitters in the sun-drenched vine. Air laden with the scent of new-mown hay riffles the pages upon which we write. A distant bell tells the hours of day. A newspaper at our right hand proclaims: "Hitler and Ciano perfect plans for final destruction of England." The sweet air is laden with the portent of impending doom—not England's doom—not America's doom—but the doom of all that part of all men which was created in the image of God.

As in the final moments of some ethereal dream, where we are wafted on wings of light over fields of bay and laurel to the shores of a shining sea, only to know as the subconscious reluctantly returns to its prison cell that another inexorable world awaits our opening eyes. Are these poignantly beautiful days of midsummer, when each riotous bower of roses against a white New England doorway beneath its arching elms, when each slow-drifting snow-capped cloud across the blue, when each joy-lit childish face at play pierces the heart with the thrust of a dagger and sears the scul as a burning brand—are these hours when each joy is too dear to bear without tears, the closing moments of such ethereal dream? Shall we too not awaken to an inexorable tomorrow in whose thunderous and anguished hours these things will have no place?

Is there even one who reads these words who even dreams of the price which must be paid by the race of man before these days come again? Look upon them; drink of their sweetness, if you can, without your heart crying out in a bitterness too deep for tears. Then close the page. The dream is passing. The inexorable tomorrow is here. The price must be paid. There are none to pay it but we ourselves. We may not taste the cup too long nor too deep. The brew it holds ends in nirvana. It must be thrust aside while still brimming over. In some far day men and women and children again may dream. For us in our time dreams are done. Close the page.

Yes, we say, we'll fight, we'll sacrifice, we'll suffer to save America and what it stands for. But will we? How much and how long? How many of us? Will you? Will I? Will we toss into the insatiable jaws first the luxuries we have learned to love, our hours of relaxation and amusement, our cars, radios, movies, and the rest? Probably most of us will ungrudgingly. Will we then follow with our savings, our homes, our life insurance, all our securities against our own future? Will we consent to live on the bare necessities? Not some of us, but each and all of us? These will be but preliminaries. Will there be steel in our souls and the strength of God's hand in our hearts to live on, to fight, to kill, to destroy, to desecrate the face of the earth with foulness and horror when all that seems worth living for is gone? When we have seen our children and our wives slain before our eyes. Will human nerves stand the racking torture of hell's inferno, imminent death, or—worse—imminent dismemberment or disembowelment, when the future holds no beacon light to guide us on. No new life which some day will be ours again. Only the knowledge that our life has been lived—that what we live for is no longer ourselves but those who shall come, that life shall not be given up in vain, that happiness shall know us no more? Can we do these things? What man knows? But the stars in their courses say that we shall be called upon to do them. And when we are, no less will suffice.

Our enemy is not a nation nor a man. It is not the efficiency of modern machines of destruction, nor the supreme ability of tacticians, strategists, and diplomats, the ablest the world has ever seen. It is a way of life, a design for living, a philosophy of existence. Let us understand it so. Trapped in a forest fire, bankbooks in your pocket cannot help you. Beset with a world conflagration, our wealth as a nation is nearly as useless.

Let us look at this enemy with our blinders off. Enemy, you say? As surely as the stars wheeled over our sleepless eyes last night, our enemy it is. The utter antithesis of all that makes life livable as we have known it. The nadir to our zenith. We are as truly at grips with this enemy as if our own Nation were in the visible fray. His way of life is at grips with ours—call ours England if you will.

What is his "way of life"? In briefest essence it is based on a fundamental belief in the worthlessness of individual human life. We read of the utter amazement of the French at the complete—even cheerful—disregard of their own individual fate with which the enemy soldiers at Sedan rolled forward in wave after wave, only to fall upon the piled-up bodies of those who had fallen before. And let us understand also this.

This disregard for individual life is not the philosophy alone of those who direct the destinies of this new power, nor of those who order them forth to die, but likewise of those who must do the dying. From lisping infancy they have learned that it is nobler to die than to live. They believe it—no, believe is not the word—they instinctively do not question it. Of what avail is desire to live in a contest against willingness to die? Many Americans in the pages of history have been willing to die. Many have died that the Nation might live. Never, however, has the Nation embarked on a policy of training every child—boy or girl—born beneath its flag to be prepared to die, to expect to die, yea, to hope to die. It is as contrary to the very instincts of our souls as it is inherent in theirs. Can two such forces ever meet evenly matched? There is the problem away from which those who would defend America turn unwilling eyes. Not dollars, not guns, nor ships, not tanks, not planes, not food, not oil, not men—but that which is stronger than all of these—the immortal spirit which God planted in human breasts—the will to conquer at whatever costs, not the will of the few but the instinctive will of all. Can we meet that challenge? The hour approaches. Can we meet it?

Civilizations rise and fall. Security, prosperity, contentment, happiness, conveniences, and luxuries breed decay. Those who can and will do with less have always conquered those who cannot or will not. Is history now to do an about-face? No. History will do no about-face. Those who can and will do with less, who will sacrifice first the luxuries, then the comforts, then the essentials, and finally life itself—unquestioningly and universally—will conquer as before. Who shall it be?

Our enemy—as truly so today as he will literally be tomorrow—has had a full generation to inculcate the philosophy of sacrifice into his people. We have but a few short months. Our enemy had the pliable and unformed minds of children upon which to work. He needed merely to implant a philosophy. He had over 20 years to do it. We have first to uproot in the minds of men and women already grown the desire to live individual lives before the doctrine of sacrifice can have space to grow. We have but a few months. Our enemy had a people with everything to gain and nothing to lose. We are a people with nothing to gain and everything to lose. If America can meet such a challenge as this, then she is as great—aye greater—than our boasts.

Let us hang red lanterns on a few of the pitfalls. The first—and it will be the most persistent—will be the overwhelming desire in all our hearts to maintain the world as we have known it—for ourselves in our time—to compromise with destiny for another hour of sunshine. Munich is no longer simply the name of a city; it is a symbol, even as that other name of unutterable tragedy Calvary. There will be no more hours of sunshine in our time. That is not our question. Our question is: Shall there ever be another sunlit hour—for those to come. The second pitfall will be a readiness to believe what we long to believe. Are we not right now longing to believe that America will be spared? Are we not longing to believe the antichrist when he says, "We have never sought to interfere with the affairs of the Western Hemisphere; therefore, your protests are without point"? For God's sake, do not believe these things. Who of us, when he reads even a rumor of a possible early peace, can quell the feeling of ecstacy in his heart? But it must be quelled. There can be but one peace. With diabolical cunning this enemy plants rumors of peace so that his enemies may look back once more longingly on the world they have known, and weakened with sorrow and nostalgia, become divided and resistless.

How then? say you. Is the game worth the candle? If America, if democracy, if Christianity, if belief in life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, if all must die to live again, what does it all matter? If to meet this foe on even terms we must sacrifice, even before we start, the things we are engaging to preserve, what is the sense? That, my countrymen, is exactly the way they want you to feel. It makes unified defense utterly impossible.

Let's leave posterity out of it for a minute. Let's see what the world will look like to us, ourselves, if we fail. Here are Hitler's own words:

"There will be a ruling caste, a historical caste tempered by battle and welded from the most varied elements. There will be the great hierarchy of the party. * * * And there will be the great mass of the anonymous, the serving collective, the eternally disfranchised, no matter whether they were members of the old bourgeoise, the big landowning class, the working class, or the artisans. * * * Beneath them there will still be the class of the subject alien races; we need not hesitate to call them the modern slave class."

From the echoing corridors of history we hear the voices of bewigged gentlemen assembled at Philadelphia: "Any government derives its just powers from the consent of the governed." And the drawl of a lank Kentuckian: "* * * and dedicated to the principle that all men are created equal."

But what are the ominous words, which follow: "* * * testing whether that nation or any nation so conceived and so dedicated can long endure."

There lies our choice. No one yet is even dimly aware of the steel that must be in our souls if our cause is not to ignominiously fail.

It must not fail. It must triumph. When latter comes to pass, be it known that some day, somewhere upon this earth, perhaps a hundred years hence, perhaps 500, man's soul will again emerge and claim its own immortality. What God has given no man can take away.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN

STATEMENT OF HON. STYLES BRIDGES, OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, appended hereto is a statement by the Honorable STYLES BRIDGES, issued August 20, 1940, which is an accurate, concise characterization of the methods of this administration:

"Honest" Harold Ickes' radio apology for President Roosevelt cost the Democratic National Committee around $7,500 last night. It would cost us nearly $4,000 for a reply with only half the time. Nothing Harold ever said or that Charlie Michelson could write for him could be worth that much. Refusing to chisel funds from New Deal business victims with a campaign handbook racket, we must save our funds for worthier purposes.

The keeper of the White House umbrella rushed to his master's aid against the challenge of Wendell Willkie for free and open joint discussion of the issues before the Nation. Is Franklin D. Roosevelt too proud to discuss the distressing economic issues facing the Nation?

Adolph Hilter rose to German power a few months before Roosevelt took over the American Presidency. Hitler's plans were known. They were published. The secret reports of our foreign agents concerning German rearmament were not pleasant news. So they were filed in the White House waste basket until election year. And the Congress and the people were kept in total ignorance of the dreadful portents on the European horizon which President Roosevelt alone could have disclosed. Along with Blum, with Baldwin, and with Chamberlain, Roosevelt slept as Germany armed. With 18,000,000,000 blank checks which he could spend wholly at his own discretion he built with these funds not one battleship, not a plane, not an antiaircraft gun, nor a single tank. He squandered it recklessly as he wished. Is it possible that the President has not the courage to face Wendell Willkie and be confronted before the American people with that irresponsible record for which he and he alone must answer?

Since when has Ickes defended the "dignity of the Presidency?" Since when has the Roosevelt family upheld the dignity of the White House? Like a small boy hiding behind his mother's apron strings, the New Deal has sought protection behind the dignity of an office that long ago vanished under crass commercialization by the Roosevelts.

Who is this Ickes who talks so big—at a safe distance—about Hitler? In his own right Ickes is a Hitler in short pants. Like Hitler he hates the newspapers and freedom of press and speech and would ruthlessly control them. Like Hitler he is a professional rabble rouser who never succeeded at anything else; who is a political hatchet man. The New Deal regime that Ickes schemes for is nothing but an American form of nazi-ism. Like Hitler he is a common scold puffed up by high office. The resemblance is closest in their attitude toward the truth. Who is Ickes to make faces at Hitler? Doesn't he own a mirror?

"Fifth Column" Murders and Wrecking Plots in Plants Reported

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LELAND M. FORD
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 21, 1940

ARTICLE FROM THE LOS ANGELES TIMES

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Los Angeles Times of August 16, 1940:

[From the Los Angeles Times of August 16, 1940]

DIES HUNTS SABOTAGE RING HERE—"FIFTH COLUMN" MURDERS AND WRECKING PLOTS IN PLANE PLANTS REPORTED

Charges involving murder and organized sabotage in airplane factories have been made against persons in Los Angeles, and if these charges can be substantiated by investigations criminal indictments are expected to follow.

Painting a picture of so-called "fifth column" activities in southern California as he understands them, such is the statement made late yesterday by MARTIN DIES, chairman of the House Committee on Un-American Activities.

SECRET TESTIMONY

Sitting as a subcommittee, DIES opens a series of hearings at the Biltmore Hotel today.

"It depends upon what information I get how long the hearings will last," he said. "Very grave charges have been made against some people in Los Angeles. If substantiated, they should result in criminal indictments."

The leader of the House Committee on Un-American Activities, while refusing to give details, said his statement was based on sworn secret testimony already in the records of the committee.

MURDER CHARGES

"The charges involving the murders and giving names and dates are already a matter of record," he declared.

"Certain persons here have indicated that they will come forward with other details if their names are kept secret, and I intend to interview these persons in the next few days.

"In some instances the murders were committed, I am told, when certain persons refused to carry out instructions from abroad."

SAYS "COLUMN" ACTIVE

Dies made his statement as he asserted that his committee had found that "fifth column" conditions were particularly bad in American big cities and selected Chicago, New York, and the west coast metropolitan areas as outstanding examples.

"This country is in worse condition today from subversive activities than the countries that were overwhelmed by Hitler and Stalin," he commented.

Returning to the local situation he declared that he has the names of many agents for foreign governments working in southern California.

CITES CRASHES

He also intimated that his information will probably lead to an investigation of recent airplane crashes in this vicinity, in the belief that they were caused by saboteurs.

The committee chairman asserted that a relatively large number of potential enemy aliens were employed in key industries here and made the outright declaration that the shipping industry is controlled by agents of Moscow.

Pressed to elaborate on this, he said that the shipping industry is in the clutches of unions whose leaders are Communists.

BRIDGES NAMED

He cited Harry Bridges, west coast C. I. O. leader, as an example.

"Which do you consider the worst—communism, nazi-ism or fascism?" he was asked.

"One can't make much of a distinction between different kinds of poison," he replied.

DIES indicated, also, that his committee may hear further testimony about communistic activities in Hollywood.

WITNESSES HEARD

He remarked that his committee is familiar with the testimony of John L. Leech, who testified before the Los Angeles grand jury that more than a score of film celebrities were members or subscribers to the Communist Party.

DIES refused to comment upon the impression Leech had made upon the Dies committee but said that his group had heard four or five other witnesses upon the Hollywood situation.

MAJORITY PATRIOTIC

"I believe, however, that most actors and actresses, writers and directors are patriotic citizens and that only a small minority are involved," he declared.

Asked the most effective defense against "fifth column" activities, DIES said he is convinced that full exposés of the conditions so that the public may be informed is most effective.

WARNS OF HYSTERIA

"At the same time care must be taken not to involve the names of innocent persons," he declared. "Nor do we want to create a hysteria in this country. The condition can be met without resorting to the methods of undemocratic countries."

DIES was accompanied to Los Angeles by his wife, Mrs. Myrtle Dies, and their three children, Martin, Jr., 18; Bobby, 12; and Jackie, 4. Wynne Pearce, 11, a friend of the family, was also in the party.

"What Willkie Did Not Say"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RAYMOND S. McKEOUGH

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 21, 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. HAROLD L. ICKES

Mr. McKEOUGH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address entitled "What Willkie Did Not Say," delivered by Secretary of the Interior Harold L. Ickes, from Washington, Monday, August 19, 1940; broadcast over the facilities of the National Broadcasting Co. blue network, under the sponsorship of the Democratic National Committee.

On Saturday last, Mr. Willkie gave to the American people what he called his personal keynote.

It was reminiscent of Alfred M. Landon 4 years ago. As I listened carefully, I came to understand why he had not lived up to his advance build-up. A man cannot make an effective assault upon the New Deal when he accepts the New Deal in principle. He cannot make political capital out of the foreign policy of the administration when he agrees with that policy. It has aptly been said that he agreed with Mr. Roosevelt's entire program of social reform and that it was leading to disaster.

However, on several important points, Mr. Willkie arose above partisanship and, for this, as an American citizen, I thank him.

I thank him for his denunciation of intolerance at home and abroad. And I hope that he will have the courage to tell the Coughlinites, the bundists, and other Fascists who are rallying to his support that he does not wish their favors.

I thank him for saying plainly that our interests and our way of life would be adversely affected by the loss of the British fleet, and for standing squarely with the President for aiding with our material resources those peoples who are resisting Hitler's aggression.

I thank him for recognizing the incompatibility of the Nazi way of life and our own. I thank him for standing with the President for some form of selective service.

However, I deeply deplore the fact that Mr. Willkie felt compelled to toss a sop to the bitter anti-Roosevelt isolationists by his ill-considered and demagogic attacks upon the President's conduct of our foreign affairs as "deliberately inciting us to war," and as "unscrupulously" misleading other nations. Those were contemptible remarks for you to make, Mr. Willkie, with reference to the President of the United States.

Let Mr. Willkie remember that Franklin D. Roosevelt has become the world's symbol for fearless support of democratic principles, the emblem of the world's faith in freedom, the substance of the world's hope that right will prove stronger than might.

By what warrant does Mr. Willkie presume to accuse the President of the United States of issuing inflammatory statements and indulging in manufactured panics? By what grasshopper leap of the imagination does this candidate conclude that the President has not taken the country into his confidence on foreign policy? Have the dangers against which President Roosevelt repeatedly warned failed to materialize? Is the Hitler attack on England a manufactured panic? Does not Mr. Willkie remember that, time and again, the President sought to arouse the American people to the danger in the European situation, only to have his request for defense appropriations attacked again and again as excessive and unnecessary; only to have his warnings met again and again with jibes and jeers from Mr. Willkie's new-found friends, and to be accused, as Mr. Willkie shabbily accused him on Saturday, of inventing war scares for selfish political purposes?

This sort of demagoguery cuts to the heart of Mr. Willkie's assumptions of statesmanship. Barely a year ago, Mr. Willkie himself was denying that the administration's plans for mobilizing power resources in the interest of defense were in any way justified, and he consistently refused to acknowledge the paramount importance to the national defense of the T. V. A., although this was later singled out as indispensable by the Defense Commission.

Mr. Willkie criticizes the Blum government in France and holds it responsible for the defeat of France. Has he never heard of Bonnet, Flandin, Laval, and other highly placed pro-Nazi personages in France? Has he no criticism of England's pro-Munich government, with its policy of appeasement? Has Mr. Willkie no realization of the fact that America faces today, not only a world war but a world-wide social revolution? Does he not know that the New Deal in America has made this country the only one on the face of the globe where it appears probable that the vast agglomerations of economic power and special privilege can be modified without resort to violence? Does not the Republican candidate know that our last line of defense, which is right here in America, is being thoroughly organized and is strongly held, thanks to the New Deal reforms? Has he not the candor and the courage to admit that Roosevelt in America, like Churchill in England, warned the people while the Nation slept?

Today Mr. Willkie accepts the New Deal reforms in principle. He is for curbing monopoly; he favors collective bargaining for labor; he stands by the Wage and Hour Act; the Public Utility Holding Company Act; the Securities and Exchange Act; the social-security measures; farm relief; the rural-electrification program; and the work-relief methods by which the New Deal has remembered the forgotten man.

We would like to take him at his word. But first we must ask him, since he proclaims that he is a liberal, Where was he when the battle for these measures was being fought by us of the New Deal? Where was he when his newly possessed party was whittling down the W. P. A. funds and hamstringing the relief administration? Where was he when we were struggling for a decent farm bill; when we were trying to force a reactionary Rules Committee in Congress to act on the wage and hour bill? Where was Wendell Willkie when the Republicans were fighting tooth and nail against all of these measures which he now says that he supports?

All through this period, he was doing his very able best to prevent the most dynamic and hopeful project of the whole New Deal—the Tennessee Valley Authority—from functioning.

On Saturday Mr. Willkie admitted that by 1929 the concentration of economic power had gone further than it should ever go in a democracy. Yet in 1935 he testified before the Committee on Interstate Commerce of the United States Senate, as follows: "If you think these corporations are large enough as they are, stop the matter where it is, but don't dismember them, and deal with all in that way no matter what the degree of size."

It was in 1929 that Mr. Willkie went to New York to give his services exclusively to a giant utility holding company which was just being formed by Wall Street promoters to control local operating systems in 11 different States. When President Roosevelt proposed that we should emancipate the regional operating systems from the control of such giant holding companies, Mr. Willkie was the first to protest. And, despite the enactment of the Holding Company Act more than 4 years ago, the billion-dollar Commonwealth & Southern Corporation, under Mr. Willkie's management, still clings tenaciously to its control over its regional operating properties.

Whatever last-minute conversion on the subject of public power Mr. Willkie may later confess to, the record that he has made as a private-utility magnate stands in all its unashamed opposition to the public interest. Part of this record may be found in his address before the Economic Club of New York on January 21, 1935.

Here is what he said:

"I do not like to make personal references (sic), but I want to say to you that no duty has ever come to me in my life, even that in the service of my country, which has so appealed to my sense of social obligation, patriotism, and love of mankind as this, my obligation to say and do what I can for the preservation of public utilities privately owned."

Thus spoke Willkie, the rich man's Roosevelt; Willkie, the simple, barefoot Wall Street lawyer.

If Mr. Willkie spoke honestly on that occasion, and one of his boasts is his frankness, is he by any chance running for President of the United States in order to "do what I (he) can for the preservation of public utilities privately owned"?

Mr. Willkie loves to boast that he learned his liberalism at the feet of the elder La Follette. Here is what La Follette's Progressive, a publication which continues to carry on the fight of the great Wisconsin liberal, has said of him:

"There is one thing about it. If Willkie should * * * be elected, the country would then have a President who could teach the American farmers how to water the stock and shear the sheep."

In his speech of acceptance, Mr. Willkie challenged the President of the United States to a series of joint debates.

One cannot challenge the President of the United States to go about the country barnstorming, after the preradio fashion of the past century, without laying himself open to the charge that he is indulging in cheap bravado. The gravity of Mr. Willkie's offense consisted of the fact that he was reflecting upon the dignity and striking at the prestige of an office which, as a candidate himself for the Presidency, it ought to be his zealous duty to uphold and defend. The President cannot adjourn the Battle of Britain in order to ride the circuit with Mr. Willkie. We must realize that the Battle of Britain is the battle of the Atlantic Ocean. The Presidency of the United States is no job for a mountebank.

At that, Mr. Roosevelt has been effectively debating the Wendell Willkies of this country for years and will continue to do so.

If Mr. Willkie is so eager for a debate in order to hold his audience, I suggest that he challenge his running mate, Senator McNary, with whom he is at greater variance on domestic and foreign issues than his speech of acceptance shows him to be with the President.

The Roosevelt record of the last 7 years is an open book. The people know what President Roosevelt has done, and they know what he will do.

For a time, Mr. Willkie thought and spoke like a lion; then the weasel, which has replaced the elephant as the Republican symbol, asserted itself. Like any other professional politician, he twisted about awkward issues by the use of glittering generalities. He talked about "wider horizons," "a new companionship in industrial society," "unlimited production," "full production and reemployment by private enterprise," "hardship, sacrifice, and suffering." Here he seems to have gotton his bottles mixed. Up to this point he had been talking about regaining prosperity, increasing relief, and reducing spending.

Mr. Willkie talked like the Republican platform until it seemed to those who heard him that the Republican Party had better change its tune from "God Bless America" to "Pop Goes the Weasel!"

When the meandering platform of the Republican Party was promulgated, we were assured that Mr. Willkie would clarify it. If that gentleman's speech in Elwood means anything, it means that it is now necessary for someone to clarify Mr. Willkie.

The only clarification so far offered is the personality and record of Mr. Willkie himself. He talked about free enterprise and finding jobs for everyone. Yet his whole history negatives any interest in free opportunity. The country knows him as a holding-company executive. The opportunity that he has given to free enterprise has consisted in cutting the throats of small independent power companies. This has meant less economic opportunity for the average man and a greater concentration of economic power in Wall Street.

The American people want to know specifically, with chapter and verse cited, how the minority party's candidate proposes to do more to preserve the blessings of American liberty in the modern world than our President is doing. They want to know whether Mr. Willkie's "new life" means the New Deal for the common people or a "new life" for the Old Guard. No glittering generalities about the candidate's belief in collective bargaining will quiet labor's fears so long as the labor-baiting Weirs and Girdlers remain unrebuked. No fine words about the candidate's foreign policy will quiet fears as to what will happen if, in the event of Republican victory, HIRAM JOHNSON becomes chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs and HAMILTON FISH chairman of the House Committee on Foreign Relations.

The American people are worried about the stage settings which are constantly being arranged for the minority candidate. And the American people have a right to ask what it is all about.

I would like to explain to you why Mr. Willkie's acceptance speech was staged at or near the town of Elwood, Ind. Customarily, a candidate invites the people to his home. After all, one cannot give a front-porch speech from the tenth floor of 1010 Fifth Avenue, New York City, where Mr. Willkie actually lives. It is many years since Willkie lived at Elwood, Ind., and most people had forgotten that he ever lived there. It is legitimate to infer that his going to Elwood was for protective coloration. He wanted to dissociate himself in the public mind from his banking and utility connections.

The people are being encouraged to forget Willkie, the Wall Street lawyer, the utility executive, the director of one of the principal banks affiliated with Morgan & Co. This explains the effort to put him across as the barefoot farmer's boy.

Mr. Willkie has had much to say in condemnation of political machines, especially those in the cities. I wish that he had explained just when he developed his moral fervor on this subject. At the Philadelphia convention he might have repudiated the votes of those Republican machine delegates from the southern States who, every 4 years, from time immemorial, have been bought and sold on the auction block. This particular Republican machine constitutes the greatest scandal in American politics.

No one ever heard Mr. Willkie lift his voice against any political machine until after he had been nominated for President. It was the present Federal administration that sent Boss Pendergast, of Kansas City, Mo., to the penitentiary. It was new dealer Mayor LaGuardia who cleaned up New York City despite Tammany Hall, of which Mr. Willkie is a member. It was the Federal administration which sent to the penitentiary the notorious Moe Annenberg, one of the most corrupting influences in American political life. However, Annenberg was not put behind the bars until he had circulated among the Republican delegates at Philadelphia, urging them to greater endeavors against the New Deal. And his paper, the Philadelphia Inquirer, is today vigorously supporting the candidacy of Mr. Willkie.

Mr. Willkie poses too late as a champion of political purity, especially in view of the record of public utility companies within his control. He has always enjoyed association with political machines. He was a regular Democrat in Indiana, he was a regular Democrat in Ohio, and he has been a regular Democrat in New York. He never joined in any fight on any political machine anywhere at any time. His policy has been to "join 'em." He attended conventions as a regular Democrat, and he always went along with the majority.

After Mr. Willkie had put on his shoes and become a resident of New York City in 1929 he lost no time in becoming a member of the Tammany organization. He joined in 1930, and he has not resigned to this day. Along about 1936 or 1937 there was a primary fight in which the braves of Tammany Hall were bitterly engaged. A new and young group was trying to drive out the old guard. Here was an opportunity for Mr. Willkie to show his zeal for political reform. But he didn't.

Mr. Willkie fought in the ranks of Tammany Hall, which sought the defeat of Fiorello LaGuardia, the courageous and incorruptible administrator of a great city, whose record as mayor will serve as a model for right-minded men for all time to come. Here was another chance to fight a political machine. But he didn't.

As a crusader for political purity I wish that Mr. Willkie would tell us something about the forces that make political machines corrupt. Venal politicians do not bribe themselves.

Public utilities have been among the principal corruptors of public officials in the country. I was somewhat familiar with the situation in my own city of Chicago and State of Illinois (to which I had gone as a barefoot farmer boy from my birthplace in Pennsylvania) and I knew, as did others, of the corruption lavishly indulged in by utilities under the domination and control of the late Samuel Insull. This corruption is a matter of public record.

I mention Insull because I was shocked to discover that in Mr. Willkie's speech before the Economic Club of New York he referred to Insull as a "forceful, dynamic, and attractive figure." There are many thousands of people in this country who execrate Insull as the man who ruined them. By them he is remembered as the unscrupulous manipulator who induced his employees, his customers, and even his friends to invest in his utility stocks. They remember him as a man who bribed public officials whenever he needed them; who was indicted by a Federal grand jury; who had eluded the hand of justice and had been brought back to his adopted land as a craven fugitive. But to Mr. Willkie, Mr. Insull was an "attractive figure."

I have thanked Mr. Willkie for the flash of decent statesmanship in his Elwood speech. I have criticized him for his unpatriotic demagoguery and for his unpardonable references to President Roosevelt. I have raised some questions as to his record.

But I insist that Mr. Willkie has not been specific and definite in telling the American people how he proposes to meet the challenge of our domestic situation, the menace of Hitlerism, and the threat of world revolution.

We can defend America only if we hold fast to the principles of national unity and social solidarity. I defy Mr. Willkie, who claims to be a student of history, to name any like period in the history of any great nation when so many and so great steps have been taken for social betterment with so little bitterness and dislocation. I defy Mr. Willkie to tell his fellow citizens if there has ever been a time when those who were deprived of even a little of their powers and privileges for the common good, did not protest loudly, deeply, and very bitterly. Jefferson, Jackson, Lincoln, Theodore Roosevelt, and Woodrow Wilson were hated by those whose privileges they attacked. So is Franklin D. Roosevelt hated by those whose privileges the New Deal has curtailed.

If, indeed, as he says, Mr. Willkie has no hate in his heart, there is a great deal of missionary work for him to do among his "Hate Roosevelt" followers.

Mr. Willkie's current party contains the loudest and bitterest of those who protest against farm relief, work relief, collective bargaining, fair wages and hours for labor, taxation based on ability to pay, religious freedom, racial toleration, and measures necessary to check excessive concentration of control over other people's savings and other people's lives.

The Republican Party in 1940 contains the equivalent of England's and France's pro-Nazi Munich appeasers of 1938—the men with the black umbrellas. Mr. Willkie's current party contains the men who think that they can appease Hitler by making a deal—the big-business men who were caught conferring in secret with a notorious Nazi agent, Dr. Westrick. Mr. Willkie's current party includes the men who think that they can ward off social reform by calling the reformers "reds." Mr. Willkie's current party includes the men who think that big business should be allowed to capitalize a grave national crisis for its own private profit; that, somehow or other, the country will muddle through if only the party of big business and appeasement is given an exclusive right to handle the defense program.

What has Mr. Willkie's current party to offer America but more Munichs, more appeasement abroad, and more defeatism and more reaction at home?

President Roosevelt and his New Deal administration have given America seven and a half dynamic years of defense of democracy. President Roosevelt has made America the symbol of light in a darkening world. Under President Roosevelt we are going forward to complete the mighty tasks which must be achieved if America is to be defended and democracy preserved.

The Third-Term Tradition—Fact or Fantasy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. BARNES

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 21, 1940

ARTICLE BY HAMILTON TREADWAY

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Hamilton Treadway:

President Roosevelt has been renominated by the Democratic National Convention to be a candidate for a third term as President. As will be shown later, President Roosevelt is not the first President to seek that office in three successive elections, but he is the first President, having served two terms, to be a candidate for a third successive term. The cry that tradition opposes a third term is already abroad in the land. It is therefore altogether fitting that we should explore the facts behind this most illogical argument which will be used against the reelection of the President.

In the coming weeks the people will be told by the opponents of the President that there is a tradition, well established, against any President of the United States serving more than two terms. We need not pause here to determine who these opponents are. Suffice it to say that they are the same persons who opposed the election of President Roosevelt in 1932 and 1936. Neither do we need to scrutinize the reasons for their opposition. However, it is appropriate that we examine their argument.

The proponents of the anti-third-term tradition usually rely first on the proposition that the framers of the Constitution intended that the length of service of the President should be limited. To answer this contention one need only turn to the notes of James Madison made on the floor of the Constitutional Convention. In order that the expressions of the delegates to the convention on this question may be better understood, a short review of the background of the proceedings of the convention will be given.

The Constitutional Convention of 1787 was presided over by George Washington. The sessions of the Convention were closed and no official record of the debates was made. However, notes of the debates were made by several of the members, the most complete and reliable of which are those of James Madison. After the Convention opened, Edmund Randolph introduced a series of resolutions which suggested the formation of a Federal Government consisting of a legislative, an executive, and a judicial branch, and embodying the doctrine of the separation of powers. The Convention proceeded by a committee of the whole to discuss these resolutions.

These resolutions provided for a single term for the Executive and provided that he be ineligible for reelection. Considerable debate arose over the length of the term, and the question of reeligibility of the Executive. There were among the delegates proponents of a single term, but even among those favoring a single term there was no unanimity of opinion regarding the length of such term. The fight for a single term was led principally by George Mason, of Virginia, and two obscure delegates from North Carolina, Richard Spaight and Hugh Williamson. On the other hand, the proponents of indefinite reeligibility were found among the leaders of the Convention. Such men as Roger Sherman, James Wilson, Gouverneur Morris, James Madison, Rufus King, and William C. Houston were numbered among the proponents of reelection. In ascertaining the intention of the Convention on the question of a third term, the expressions of these delegates are most pertinent.

In considering the resolutions of Randolph (known historically as the Virginia resolutions) Mr. Houston moved to strike the provision "to be ineligible a second time." Mr. Sherman seconded the motion. Gouverneur Morris thought, "the ineligibility proposed by the clause as it stood tended to destroy the great motive to good behavior, the hope of being rewarded by a reappointment." Later in the debate Morris, in discussing the effect of the proposal to make the Executive ineligible for reelection, said, "It will destroy the great incitement to merit public esteem by taking away the hope of being rewarded with reappointment. It may give a dangerous turn to one of the strongest passions in the human breast. The love of fame is the great spring to noble and illustrious actions. Shut the civil road to glory, and he may be compelled to seek it by the sword. It will tempt him to make the most of the short space of time alloted him, to accumulate wealth and provide for his friends. It will produce violations of the very Constitution it is meant to secure. In moments of pressing danger the tried abilities and established character of a favorite magistrate will prevail over respect for the forms of the Constitution." Morris felt that all of these disadvantages of a single term for the President would be eliminated by placing no limitation on his reeligibility to that office. Roger Sherman was "against the doctrine of rotation as throwing out of office the men best qualified to execute its duties." He thought, "If he (the President) behaves well he will be continued; if otherwise, displaced on a succeeding election." Rufus King remarked "that he did not like the ineligibility." He thought "there was great force in the remark of Mr. Sherman, that he who has proved himself to be most fit for office, ought not to be excluded by the Constitution from holding it." James Madison noted that "he was much disposed to think that in such cases the people at large would chose wisely." The motion to strike the expression "to be ineligible a second time" carried. Thus, the Constitutional Convention expressly rejected the principle that the President should be ineligible for reelection.

The question of whether the President should be limited to a single term was tied up with the length of the term and the mode of election. The whole problem was referred to a committee of 11 for their consideration to reconcile the views of the Convention. David Brearly, reporting for the committee, proposed a 4-year term with no limitation on the reeligibility of the Chief Executive. This proposal was eventually written into the Constitution as follows:

"He shall hold his office during the term of 4 years, and, together with the Vice President, chosen for the same term, be elected, as follows."

Thus we find that as adopted the Constitutional Convention left to the people for all time the decision of how many terms any individual President was to serve. The writers of that great document felt that the people would choose wisely. They could hardly have reached a more logical conclusion.

Those who would contend that the founding fathers intended to limit the number of terms any President may serve may gather solace from the delegates who argued for a single term. Mr. Gerry thought the President "ought not to be reeligible." Edmund Randolph thought "he should not be left under a temptation to court a reappointment." Mason said, "that the great officers of the state, and particularly the Executive, should at fixed periods return to that mass from which they were at first taken, in order that they may feel and respect those rights and interests, which are again to be personally valuable to them." However, in considering these expressions of the minority, we must not lose sight of the fact that they were made in the discussion of the Virginia resolutions, which contemplated appointment of the President by the Congress. These delegates who favored ineligibility of the President for reelection feared that in courting the favor of the Congress he would become its puppet. When this fear was removed by the proposal of the committee of 11 for election of the President by electors, chosen by the people, their opposition was removed. In the final action of the Convention on the adoption of the 4-year term with indefinite reeligibility we find only a dissent from the obscure delegates from North Carolina. The opponents of President Roosevelt, who are at this time also the opponents of the third term for the President, cannot hoodwink the people by advancing the views of this minority of the delegates to the Convention as indicative of the intention that the founding fathers were against a third term. The facts do not support them.

Those who oppose a third term rely on a second proposition equally unsound. They say that, even though the Constitution is devoid of a prohibition against a third term, nevertheless there is a tradition against any President serving more than two terms, which is an unwritten amendment to the Constitution. To meet this contention it is hardly sufficient to state the self-evident truth that a written constitution does not admit of unwritten amendments. To refute this contention, however, one need only turn to the authorities on which its proponents rely for its establishment.

The opponents of the third term contend that the so-called two-term tradition was established by Washington. Whatever solace they are able to gather from the fact that a tired and feeble old man, feeling that his work was done, retired after having served two terms as President, must be dispelled when they read the following sentences from his Farewell Address delivered in 1796:

"The acceptance of, and continuance hitherto in, the office to which your suffrages have twice called me have been a uniform sacrifice of inclination to the opinion of duty and to a deference for what appeared to be your desire. I constantly hoped that it would have been much earlier in my power, consistently with motives, which I was not at liberty to disregard, to return to that retirement from which I had been reluctantly drawn. The strength of my inclination to do this, previous to the last election, had even led to the preparation of an address to declare it to you; but mature reflection on the then perplexed and critical posture of our affairs with foreign nations and the unanimous advice of persons entitled to my confidence impelled me to abandon the idea."

If the act of retirement of Washington is to be regarded as establishing an anti-third-term tradition, how can such interpretation of his retirement be reconciled with the fact so well stated in his Farewell Address, that he had reluctantly been called from retirement to accept the first term and that he had desired to retire at the end of that first term? If an argument that Washington intended to found a tradition remains, it is effectively refuted by the views he outlined in a letter to Lafayette written April 28, 1788. In that letter Washington said:

"There are points on which opinions would be more likely to vary, as, for instance, on the eligibility of the same person for President after he should have served a certain course of years. Guarded so effectually as the proposed Constitution is in respect to the prevention of bribery and undue influence in the choice of President, I confess I differ widely myself from Mr. Jefferson and you as to the necessity or expediency of rotation in that appointment. The matter was fairly discussed in the Convention and to my full convictions, though I cannot have time or room to sum up the arguments in this letter. There cannot, in my judgment, be the least danger that the President will by any practical intrigue ever be able to continue himself one moment in office, much less perpetuate himself in it, but in the last stage of corrupted morals and political depravity; and even then there is as much danger that any other species of domination would prevail. Though, when a people shall have become incapable of governing themselves and fit for a master, it is of little consequence from what quarter he comes.

"Under an extended view of this part of the subject, I can see no propriety in precluding ourselves from the services of any man who on some great emergency shall be deemed universally most capable of serving the public."

These words of Washington were his final judgment on the question of whether the services of a man to his country in the office of President should be limited. In these words we can find no expression of the maxim that two terms are sufficient. These facts do not make Washington a proponent of the so-called anti-third-term tradition.

This conclusion of Washington is sustained by the history of other nations and civilizations. Space will not permit an enumeration of instances. An illustration is the experience of the Athenians. The city-state of Athens in Greece was the first great democracy of the ancient world. In Athens the service of a man in the government of his country was limited to a single tenure in any office. The number of great men in any generation is naturally limited. As a result, the Athenians soon exhausted the supply of those capable of leadership. The greatest civilization of ancient times, thus precluded by its laws from the service of capable leaders then living within its borders, fell an easy prey to the ever-pressing hordes of barbarians then, as today, moving across Europe. Decay and destruction followed. We may well profit by the example of Athens. We should not preclude ourselves at any time in our history of those leaders who may at the time prove universally most capable of serving the public and of preserving our democratic institutions.

Jefferson favored a single term of 6 years for the Presidency because he feared the establishment of a monarchy. One hundred and fifty years of history have proved the fallacy of that fear. We need not discuss it further. Yet in a letter written to John Taylor in 1805, Jefferson had changed his views somewhat. In that letter he said:

"I had intended to declare my intention, but I have consented to be silent on opinion of my friends, who think it best not to put a continuance out of my power in defiance of all circumstances. There is, however, but one circumstance which could engage my acquiescence in another election, to wit, such a division about a successor as might bring in a monarchist."

That circumstance never occurred, for Jefferson himself enjoyed such political prestige and power he was able to perpetuate his policies in the Presidential office for 16 years by the simple expedient of naming his successors. Thus Jefferson was never faced with the practical question of a third term. He cannot be said to have founded a tradition against a third term when the facts show that he was willing to accept it if he should prove unable to name his successor.

These are the authorities on which the proponents of the anti-third-term tradition rely. We must conclude that the so-called tradition is a fantasy—not supported by fact. It is a political hobgoblin used against a particular man at a particular moment in our history. This point cannot be too strongly emphasized. It is aptly illustrated by the fact that one of the strongest opponents of the third term for President Roosevelt is the Chicago Tribune. Yet in 1912 that paper was a backer of Teddy Roosevelt, a candidate at that time for a third term. Of course, no one overlooks the fact that the Tribune opposed the election of President Roosevelt in both 1932 and 1936.

One fact which is given no publicity by the opponents of the third term is that twice the people of the United States voted for the same man for President in three successive elections, and both times gave that man a popular majority. In 1824 Andrew Jackson received a popular majority, tied in the electoral college, and was defeated in the House of Representatives for President. In 1828, and again in 1832, he was elected President. In 1884 Grover Cleveland was elected President. In 1888 he again received the popular majority but lost in the electoral college. In 1892 Cleveland was again elected President. Three times the people wanted Jackson and Cleveland and so expressed themselves. Incidentally, both men were Democrats.

There are no facts to support the so-called anti-third-term tradition. It is a false issue, a scarecrow erected by an office-hungry party. It is an argument without weight, unsupported by fact, devoid of plausibility, refuted by the authorities on which its proponents rely. America is a young country, unfettered by tradition. It boasts today of being the last of the great democracies in a world of dictators. The third-term issue—if it can be called an issue—is incompatible with a democracy and the right of the people to choose their President.

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Los Angeles Times of August 14, 1940:

LEGION HAILS PLEA TO OUST HARRY BRIDGES—FITTS CALLS FOR FORCIBLE REMOVAL OF UNIONIST IF OTHER METHODS FAIL

SAN DIEGO, August 13.—Forcible removal of Harry Bridges from the United States, if all other methods fail, was urged to 2,000 wildly enthusiastic California American Legionnaires here today by Buron Fitts, Los Angeles County district attorney and past State commander of the Legion.

"Why pussyfoot with Bridges?" he asked in a fervent address to the second day's session of the State department convention. "Let's put him on a boat and send him home. We must demand America for Americans."

Conscription

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. DELANEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 21, 1940

LETTER BY RT. REV. JOHN B. GORMAN

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter written by the Right Reverend John B. Gorman, rector of St. Teresa's Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., which was published in the Brooklyn Tablet:

MONSIGNOR GORMAN FAVORS CONSCRIPTION

DEAR SIR: I have very carefully read the front-page editorial, "The Peril of Conscription," in the July 27 issue of the Tablet, also the editorial in last week's issue. I regret that I cannot see eye to eye with you on this subject.

In view of all that has happened abroad it does seem that it would be far wiser for our Government to overdo preparations rather than to underdo them. If unexpectedly our country is forced to meet a sudden attack it would undoubtedly conserve the lives of our soldiers and noncombatants if they were trained and prepared rather than if they were scrambled together helplessly endeavoring to meet a crisis.

The program as outlined for training through conscription appears to me to be reasonable in principle. Open discussion in Congress and otherwise may suggest some modifications of the program. It does seem that we can safely trust the American people. If any abuse does arise the people can readily rise in their might to adjust matters.

According to reliable reports, this proposed program for citizen training through conscription is not due to any failure of volunteers to meet present demands. Volunteers have responded to the extent that they have been urged to do so. Nevertheless, there is some doubt that a sufficient number of volunteers could be gathered together promptly to cope with a possible crisis. Past experience indicates that with the program of volunteers our own people have responded entirely out of proportion to their pro rata representation of population. Others have held back until compelled to participate. With universal conscription in limited numbers over a period of time, it would compel all, without exception, to share the burden as they enjoy the benefits of American citizenship. Besides, it is contended, with reasonable justification, that by the suggested method of equitably limited conscription, assignments could be made to such branches of service where qualifications, aptitude, or previous experience would best qualify for effective service.

Nothing in the history of our Nation indicates that our officials or our people are a saber-rattling type. We have never shown symptoms of aggression. Fear that the proposed conscription will lead to aggression on our part is less risky than the fear that we may not be prepared to preserve our liberties and form of government if we are suddenly attacked and found unprepared.

Finally, the wholesome living and training of a good cross section of the youth of our country; the commingling and mutual understanding and respect engendered in the flower of our young manhood throughout the Nation, should do much to restore a discipline which would benefit our generation and help to dissipate the softness which tends to corrode our age.

Sacrifice that is voluntarily accepted through conscription is preferable to that which is forced by the heel of a conqueror. France was far better prepared in equipment and trained manpower than we would be, even with conscription, for a long time to come. Belgium, Norway, Denmark, and Holland desired nothing but to mind their own business. But France was hollow within from dry rot, materialism, radicalism, and unjustified self-confidence. The spirit of sacrifice was dulled and the pursuit of pleasure and a false sense of security lured on to the dance of death. Now, in defeat, France will be united, pay the price, and make far greater sacrifices than would have been called for otherwise.

One thing that always commended your own program and policy to thinking people is that you did something. Your friends did not always agree with you 100 percent. Sometimes it was quite clear that, like the rest of us, you made mistakes. But you did something. You did not fritter away time in endless, fruitless discussions or wait until it was too late.

Thus it seems to me that we as a nation need to do something. Not merely to provide equipment, but also to be prepared to use it. We need a united nation that will put everything we have promptly and effectively into our preparation and promote a wholesome respect for our ability to repel disastrously for our enemies any attempt to destroy our principles of government or invade our country. It is now as plain as a pike staff that if the axis powers, united with Japan and Russia, once get the notion that they have half a chance, through South America or otherwise, to make us sue for peace our cause is lost.

There is no perfect plan. But there must be some reasonably adequate plan adopted immediately. It is essential that any such plan have Nation-wide support, be nonpartisan, and truly patriotic.

"When a strong (trained) man armed, keepeth his court, those things are in peace which he possesseth. But if a stronger (better trained) than he come upon him and overcome him, he will take away all his armor wherein he trusted and will distribute his spoils."

Rt. Rev. JOHN B. GORMAN,
Saint Teresa's Rectory, Brooklyn.

Food for Civilian Populations in Europe

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. DELANEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 21, 1940

ARTICLE BY RALPH INGERSOLL

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Ralph Ingersoll, which was published in PM magazine.

[From PM magazine]

II. ON IMMEDIATE ISSUES

STARVING THE CONTINENT OF EUROPE

The proposition: Shall we organize to feed civilians in the countries laid waste and conquered by treachery and "blitzkrieg," or shall we support the British blockade which aims to sap the strength of the German terror by starvation, to prove to the German people that in the long run there's more satisfaction in making butter than in making cannon?

This seems to me as open and shut a proposition as sending destroyers to convoy aviation gasoline to the men who are shooting down the Stukas.

The Germans already have a new name for the continent of Europe. It means German Europe. It means that as long as Hitler is in power there is no France or Belgium or Norway—there are only provinces and protectorates of the great, great, great Reich. It means that from the German point of view, to feed a Frenchman is to feed a vassal of the German state.

The newsreels last week showed pictures of Germans sending their French prisoners back to the fields to grow food for them to eat. For the people of the United States to send food to Europe now would be for the American "relief" administrator to put on a German Army uniform, cooperate with the German high command in the most vital of all army functions—service of supplies.

In this country the leading advocate of feeding German Europe seems to be ex-President Herbert Hoover. He has a world-wide reputation for being a humane man. It is based on his having fed the Belgians when the Belgians were our allies. It is curious how reputations stick to people. In 1920 Herbert Hoover fed the Belgians. In 1931 the American veterans marched to Washington asking food and he met them with American bayonets at Anacostia and he burned their miserable shacks over their heads. Now his heart bleeds again for the hungry. Not the American hungry. Dear me, no! He is the bitter enemy of the one man who has fed more hungry Americans than any other man in the history of the country: Franklin D. Roosevelt. He wants us to put our food on ships and send it to the Continent that has been conquered by our enemies. He was very efficient about distributing food in Belgium in 1920. He won't have to bother about distributing our food for us this time. The Germans are as good organizers as he. They will see to it that the food gets to the right places—the right places to see to it that none of the vassal states revolts against its now master, the right places to see to it that there's plenty of food left over on the Continent of Europe so that the total war can go on until the phrase is not German Europe, but German world.

The Amazing Story of How America's Hog Raisers Were Legislated Into Legalistic "No Man's Land"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL E. MUNDT

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 21, 1940

ARTICLE FROM THE SIOUX CITY TRIBUNE

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, I have frequently addressed this House about the injustice which has been done the hog raisers of America by withholding from them the refunds of hog-processing taxes which they paid, which the courts have declared they are entitled to reclaim, but which the New Deal administration has persistently and consistently refused to repay. Legislation providing the means for making these repayments is before both Houses of Congress but the administrative control of the committees is so rigid and so complete that they refuse to report these bills out so we can vote upon them. Consequently, America's hog raisers continue to be the "forgotten men" and are deprived of refunds to which they have both a legal and a moral claim.

In order to give Members an opportunity to do something more for these farmers than to merely extend them their sympathies, I introduced petition No. 25 to discharge the Agricultural Committee of the House from further consideration of this legislation and to bring the hog tax refunding bill before us for a vote. Many of you have now signed this petition. Others must still sign it, however, if justice is to be done the farmers of America. I again call on you, therefore, in the interests of fair play and justice to sign petition No. 25. America has the established policy of refunding taxes illegally paid or unfairly collected. The hog raisers of America are entitled to the same consideration under this policy which has always been given corporations and to rich individuals who have made unjustly excessive tax payments. You and I have an obligation to see to it that the farmers get this traditional consideration.

The accompanying article from the Sioux City (Iowa) Tribune indicates that Secretary Wallace, himself, has been one of the biggest stumbling blocks stopping our farmers from getting the tax refunds to which they are entitled. I hope every Member will read this article. Having read it, I also hope that the sense of fair play which prevails in this House will cause Members to sign petition No. 25 and join those of us who are trying our utmost to adjust the wrong which has been done to the hog raisers of America through collecting illegal taxes from their pockets and then refusing to follow the edicts of the courts by refunding these taxes to the people to whom they legally and morally belong.

[From the Sioux City Tribune of August 12, 1940]

HERE'S AMAZING STORY OF HOW AMERICA'S HOG RAISERS WERE LEGISLATED INTO LEGALISTIC "NO MAN'S LAND"—HOW FARMERS WERE BILKED OF PROCESS TAX TOLD

(EDITOR'S NOTE.—How the American hog producer has been legislated into a "legalistic no man's land" and deprived of his constitutional right of redress in the matter of recovering processing taxes, which the United States Supreme Court ruled were collected illegally, is glowingly told by A. I. Birch, of Marcus, Iowa, in the following article. It is a glaring tale of New Deal political chicanery.)

(By A. I. Birch)

September 5, 1933, the United States Government, through the Agricultural Adjustment Act, levied a tax on all hogs for slaughter. The packers were authorized to collect the tax to pay it to the United States Treasurer.

During the summer of 1935, eight rice millers of Louisiana brought action to test the legality of the act. At the same time the collectors of the tax posted a bond and impounded the tax from that time up to the time the Supreme Court declared the law unconstitutional, which was January 6, 1936. The amount impounded was $98,000,000. The total amount collected was $361,230,867.47. The amount turned over to the United States Treasurer prior to impounding by the packers was $263,230,867.47. The total amount of all the tax being illegal, the Court decree called for an act of Congress to legalize return of the money to the source from which it came.

On June 22, 1936, the Revenue Act of 1936 was passed by Congress and signed by the President. The act contained the two pieces of legislation that legalized the movement of the processing tax.

Title III or unjust enrichment tax, also known as the windfall bill, taxed 80 percent of the amount held by collectors to the Treasurer of the United States. The other 20 percent was allowed the collectors (packers) for their trouble of collecting.

The White Packing Co. made a test case of this act. The finding of the courts was, that the packers had shifted the tax burden and so, of course, had to comply with the law.

SET UP COURT

Title VII of the Revenue Act of 1936 provides for the refund of the tax back to the source from which it was taken. A special court was set up under this bill taking all these tax claims from the natural channel. The United States Court of Claims plainly stated that no refund shall be made or allowed, in pursuance of court decisions or otherwise, of any amount paid by or collected from any claimant as tax under the Agricultural Adjustment Act unless the claimant establishes to the satisfaction of the Commissioner, in accordance with regulations prescribed by him, with the approval of the Secretary, or to the satisfaction of the tribunal court or the board of review in cases provided for under section 906 as the case may be.

Section 906 provides that all claims for refund must be filed with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. Also establishing in the Treasury Department a board of review composed of nine members who shall be officers or employees of the Treasury Department, designated by the Secretary of the Treasury.

RIGHT OF APPEAL

If the claimant is not satisfied with the allowance of the Commissioner, he has the privilege of appealing to the board of review and then to the United States courts of appeal and to the United States Supreme Court if desired.

Thus the bill takes all such claims from the natural channel, the United States Court of Claims. Since the year 1855 all citizens had a right to a redress of a wrong. Prior to that time all claims against the United States were passed on by Congress.

Section 903 provides that claims must be filed, after the enactment of this act, which was June 22, 1936, prior to July 1, 1937.

The decision to the claims of hog producers by the Commissioner was that bill title VII provided a recovery to a processor but not to producer unless the producer was a processor and had also paid the tax into the Treasury.

Title VII rules all of these tax claims out of the United States Court of Claims and the commissioner of the first court under title VII ruled the producers out of court; that the act, plainly stated that was the only method that recovery would be allowed.

PASSED BY THE SENATE

Resolution 66 was presented in the Senate in 1939. Resolution 66 amends and corrects the mistakes of title VII of the Revenue Act of 1936, giving the same rights to a producer of hogs as is provided for a processor, providing a new 1 year of filing claims and 18 months to present evidence. This resolution passed the Senate the 1st of last August without a dissenting vote; then was passed on favorably by the House subcommittee and was referred to the Committee on Agriculture August 5, 1939.

This resolution 66 was voted out of the House committee a short time ago, 11 to 9—20 of 25 Members being present. The opposition then rounded up the 5 absent members and then moved not to report it out and carried 13–12. I found while in Washington that the opposition in the committee was the New Deal members.

Representative KARL MUNDT, of Madison, S. Dak., presented petition No. 25, which required the signatures of 218 House Members in order to force a bill on the floor of the House. I am here quoting a letter written by Mr. MUNDT on April 1, 1940:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., April 1, 1940.

DEAR COLLEAGUES: Have you signed discharge petition No. 25?

If you are among those who have not yet signed this discharge petition, will you give me 2 minutes of your time to suggest reasons why, in justice to the farmers of your own district and to the taxpayers generally, you should sign this particular petition?

Petition No. 25 simply would bring Senate Joint Resolution 66, which passed the Senate last August, before the House for a vote. Senate Joint Resolution 66 provides for a refund to American hog producers of the processing taxes which they illegally paid before the Supreme Court declared this tax unconstitutional. An appropriation of $58,000,000 was subsequently paid to refund taxes illegally collected, and of this amount $31,000,000 still remains available and appropriated for repayment of hog processing taxes. Senate Joint Resolution 66 simply provides a method for our hog producers to establish their claims for this refund which both the Supreme Court and the United States Treasury have stated were unjustly and illegally paid by the American hog producers.

It has always been a cardinal principle of American taxation that taxes illegally collected shall be refunded to those who pay them. Income taxes are refunded when they are overpaid; the taxes paid by the hog processors were refunded from the above appropriation when the tax was declared void; taxes collected under the Bankhead Cotton Act of 1934, the Kerr Tobacco Act, and the Potato Act of 1935 were also refunded. It now remains for this Government to keep faith with the American hog producers by refunding taxes illegally collected from the producers themselves.

America cannot afford to establish the dangerous precedent at this late date of refusing to refund taxes illegally collected. Such a despotic stand would be a long step backward from our traditional policy of fair dealing with all types of honest taxpayers. More important than the money involved and the refunds due the farmers is the importance of maintaining this Government's honor in dealing with taxpayers. To deny justice in this case would place a blot on our national honor that in future years might spread to equal injustices to those who erroneously or unjustly overpay income taxes or other levies. Your signature to petition No. 25 will help Uncle Sam keep faith with John Taxpayer.

KARL MUNDT, M. C.

MR. WALLACE KNEW

In January 1937 there was released a Wallace telegram of warning: "I wish to state emphatically that there is no provision in law which directs, authorizes, or allows any refund of processing taxes to any producer unless the producer himself was the actual processor and himself paid the processing tax to the collector of internal revenue and did not pass the tax on to the consumer * * *." Such warning was placed in offices of the livestock commission houses of Sioux City.

Also in the early days of March of the same year the officials of the Agricultural Department released through the press the following notice:

(By Paul May)

"WASHINGTON.—There is no authority under the law to refund any processing taxes to a producer unless that producer also was a processor and paid such taxes directly to the collector of internal revenue, Representative HARRINGTON was advised by the Department of Agriculture Wednesday.

"Department officials issued a statement following an investigation made on complaints of operators of a farm at Remsen, Iowa, that an agency at Marcus, Iowa, was attempting to sign up farmers for refunds of processing taxes:

"'Statements to the effect that a farmer, who did not process his own products but who sold them to the packer or millers, is entitled under existing law to obtain refunds from the Government are false and misleading, and farmers should be warned against paying money to those who make such statements,' Department officials said."

These warnings plainly showed that Mr. Wallace, our Secretary of Agriculture, knew even before a decision was made by the special court, that title VII of the Revenue Act of 1936, not only had taken the producers out of the United States Court of Claims but had legislated him where he had no place to go for a redress of this wrong. I can find no evidence that our Secretary ever raised a hand or voice to correct this injustice, but on the contrary he used his position to discourage those producers who had been unjustly and illegally taxed, also to intimidate others who were making an effort to correct this wrong.

VOIDS BILL OF RIGHTS

This piece of legislation I believe to be the most discriminating and unconstitutional ever passed by Congress—there never was before an act of Congress that legislated a group of its citizens into "no man's land" by depriving citizens of their most valued constitutional rights—a court for redress of a wrong. Oh, yes; we have our Bill of Rights, free speech, free assembly, free press, and the liberty of worship, but what do they amount to if you have no court of redress against those who should deny one of these rights.

The correction of this is, to my opinion, one of the biggest issues at the present time. No Congressman should be considered that does not so consider this issue. The spirit of "can't" and "I don't believe" never gave birth to any nation or corrected mistakes made, nor can a nation be returned or perpetuated in this manner. No; we must use cooperatively the spirit of "shall" and "will be" in correcting anything that tends to destroy equality and general welfare. This is not only our constitutional rights, it is a citizen's duty.

The effort to correct this situation should be supported by every hog producer and every businessman and should be opposed by no American citizen.

Willkie's Remarkable Address

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAMPTON P. FULMER
OF SOUTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 21, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE COLUMBIA (S. C.) STATE

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker, we have heard a great many remarks about the Willkie speech at Elwood, Ind., some days ago.

I am inserting in my remarks an editorial carried in the State, an outstanding paper in my district, Columbia, S. C., which so completely and interestingly analyzes this speech. I am sure it will be read with a great deal of interest not only by the Members of the House, but by all the readers of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. Willkie, in referring to Washington, Jefferson, Jackson, Lincoln, Cleveland, Theodore Roosevelt, and Woodrow Wilson, forgot to mention some of the Republican president's, for instance, Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover. Perhaps he realized that if he should refer to them he would be calling to the memory of the people that we had it hard with Harding, cool with Coolidge, and hungry with Hoover.

[From the Columbia (S. C.) State of August 20, 1940]

MR. WILLKIE'S REMARKABLE ADDRESS

Mr. Willkie did not discuss, directly, the New Deal's place in history, but inferentially he gives to it a large and a favored place. Listen:

"I believe that the forces of free enterprise must be regulated. I am opposed to business monopolies.

"I believe in collective bargaining by the representatives of labor's own free choice, without any interference and in full protection of those obvious rights.

"I believe in the maintenance of minimum standards for wages and of maximum standards for hours. I believe that such requirements should constantly rise.

"I believe in Federal regulation of interstate utilities, of securities markets, and of banking. I believe in Federal pensions, in adequate old-age benefits, and in unemployment allowances.

"I believe that the Federal Government has a responsibility to equalize the lot of the farmer with that of the manufacturer.

"I believe in the encouragement of cooperative buying and selling, and in the full extension of rural electrification."

These policies in which Mr. Willkie states his definite belief are New Deal policies, some out of the very heart of the New Deal. Could any administration receive higher praise than for its chief opponent, in his address of acceptance, to approve of it? And Mr. Willkie approved also of aid to England short of war, and of selective service. Remove paragraphs of general denunciation from the address, and it might be used by Democratic campaign orators.

It was a strange political address. Old line, deeply sincere Republicans, the State imagines, suffered under it. Here was their man describing himself as a liberal Democrat. Isolationists also must have suffered, for here was their hope, the Republican candidate, doing precisely what they—and he—condemned the President for doing, denouncing and threatening foreign powers. And Republican logicians undoubtedly suffered because the address had in it so many contradictions. The New Deal declared Mr. Willkie "preaches the doctrine of division." That's not his doctrine, he said. But immediately after the impressive list of "I believes," that list of New Deal policies, the Republican candidate reached this conclusion:

"The purpose of all such measures (those he had approved) is indeed to obtain a better distribution of the wealth and the earning power of the country."

Mr. Willkie made no direct appeal to the rank and file of the Republican Party. He even avoided calling himself a Republican, and most of the former Presidents he praised, or seemed to admire, were Democrats. In one sentence he grouped Washington, Jefferson, Jackson, Lincoln, Cleveland, Theodore Roosevelt, and Woodrow Wilson. Not a word about the once idolized (by big business) Cal Coolidge. Not a word, and for good reason, about "Normalcy" Harding. Not even a word—was there?—about the only living former President, the relentless fighter against the New Deal, Mr. Hoover.

Probably Mr. Willkie believes the rank-and-file Republicans will go along, anyway, because they have nowhere else to go, and that his appeal must be mainly and pointedly to Democrats and to independents. This may be good strategy—if the regular party leaders do not become indifferent or resentful under the leadership of a man who does not do as they would have him do. If they do become indifferent, if the Republican organizations or machines fail to run smoothly, Mr. Willkie will lose millions of votes. Will he gain more millions by his departure from political technique? The answer will be known next November.

The sharpest summary of the Willkie address the State has seen comes from Mr. Norman Thomas, the Socialist candidate for President. "Mr. Willkie made a speech," said Mr. Thomas, "which was a synthesis of Guffey's First Reader, the genealogy of Indiana, the collected speeches of Tom Girdler and the New Republic. He agreed with Mr. Roosevelt's entire program of social reform, and said it was leading to disaster. The speech was a classic example of the time-honored principle of a stick of candy for everybody." That summary is more than sharp—it also is intelligent.

The address brought to mind some of those made by Mr. Landon, the Republican candidate in 1936. He, too, ran on a New Deal platform, from which he uttered hot criticisms of the New Deal. Mr. Landon gave the country no real issue in 1936. Mr. Willkie gives it none in 1940. Not yet, anyway. Perhaps as the campaign develops, there will arise genuine differences between the two major candidates on some important domestic matter or on foreign policy. But today these two splendid gentlemen are close together in foreign policy and in political philosophy, and they seem close akin even in personalities. There are differences, of course, one of which is that President Roosevelt has had thorough experience in public life. Also President Roosevelt is the tallest remaining symbol of democracy as a dynamic force that can take care of its own followers, and that is not afraid of its alien enemies.

White River Power Prospects

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FADJO CRAVENS
OF ARKANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 21, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE SOUTHWEST AMERICAN

Mr. CRAVENS. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the leave granted to extend my own remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Southwest American of Fort Smith, Ark., published under date of August 19, 1940:

[From the Southwest American of August 19, 1940]

WHITE RIVER POWER PROSPECTS

Congressman CLYDE T. ELLIS' announcement that development of the White River power possibilities has been given the green light by the President will be most welcome to north Arkansas. Development of water power on the White River has been one of Congressman ELLIS' chief interests since he went to Congress 2 years ago, and he has made a dent with it.

Speaking to the national-defense committee of the State planning board in Little Rock Friday, Dr. George C. Branner talked about this White River project, just a few hours before Congressman ELLIS made his announcement in Washington. Army engineers have described the White River in northern Arkansas and southern Missouri as equal in importance to the Tennessee River at Muscle Shoals, Dr. Branner said. He quoted three Army engineers' reports as saying that natural population growth and potential power development will absorb the output of two power projects at Bull Shoals near Cotter and Table Rock in Missouri.

With Grand River power already developed and waiting for a market in northeast Oklahoma, and White River power on the way in northern Arkansas and southern Missouri, this section of the world ought to get in on some of the billions which are about to be spent for defense industry, and the other billions which, in the normal course of events, should be spent in normal industrial development in the years ahead.

This section of the United States has much to commend it for a greater industrial growth than it has had. The lack of power has not been nearly so serious as the lack of effective markets for industrial products. A revision of the freight-rate structure, which removes the present discriminations against this area, will make possible the effective use of the extensive new power which we have and are about to develop.

Wendell L. Willkie

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN A. DANAHER

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 21 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM CLEVELAND PLAIN DEALER

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial from the Cleveland Plain Dealer of Tuesday, August 20, 1940, entitled "The Plain Dealer Supports Willkie."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE PLAIN DEALER SUPPORTS WILLKIE

The Plain Dealer supports Wendell L. Willkie for President of the United States.

We come to this decision with no regard either for party names or political considerations. Rather, our decision is based on the best analysis we can make of the moral problem confronting the United States of America. We have reached this conclusion, which seems inevitable to us, with the regret which decent people feel about breaking old ties.

For close to a hundred years the Plain Dealer has refrained from supporting for President any other than Democratic candidates. We say this in no spirit of apology or of boastfulness. On occasions we were probably wrong.

Now for the first time we depart from this century-old Plain Dealer tradition. We recommend the defeat of a Democrat who is seeking a third term to the Presidency.

If anyone reads into this an act of desertion, we insist that the result rests on the shoulders of Mr. Roosevelt and not on ours.

The Plain Dealer chooses to remain democratic. The Roosevelt administration, by contrast, has abandoned the democracy of Jefferson, Jackson, Cleveland, and Wilson.

The Plain Dealer elects to abide by the idea that the country should make social progress as fast as it can pay for it, whereas Mr. Roosevelt has attempted, not a liberal, but a radical goal. The only possible outcome of his policies, as we see it, is State socialism, followed inevitably by some form of fascism.

Under our system of government, if a sufficient majority can be obtained to amend the Constitution in a given direction, America may adopt any form of government, known or to be known, by man.

But we should proceed frankly and openly to such basic changes as these and accomplish them in the democratic way, by popular majorities on candidly expressed proposals. Never should we agree, if we hope to remain Democrats, to a subtle and unacknowledged transformation of our state of society.

Eight years ago we supported Franklin D. Roosevelt with boundless enthusiasm. Four years ago we supported him with some misgivings. The course of events since then, culminating in the President's ill-disguised and successful maneuver for a third-term nomination, force upon us the conviction that we can no longer support the President whom this newspaper helped twice to elect.

The Democratic national platform of 1932 was liberal, forthright, and courageous. Standing on that declaration of principles, Governor Roosevelt as a candidate for President was impregnable. Had the tenets of that platform been obeyed the United States would today be in a far better situation—financially, economically, politically—than it now is.

To most Americans the history of this period is too fresh in mind to justify repeating its lessons.

Instead of establishing policies of economy in government, Mr. Roosevelt inaugurated a regime of immense and largely uncontrolled expenditure. In a period when the United States was at peace he doubled the national debt. He sponsored a program of gold purchase at inflated prices, which resulted in cornering three-quarters of the world's supply, and burying it in the Kentucky hills. He subsidized the silver producers at public expense to the tune of more millions.

Contrary to experience and the lessons of economy, he used unnumbered millions in a vain effort to borrow and spend his way back to prosperity. He paid farmers for not raising crops. He killed pigs to improve the hog market. He punished business and said that he did it to help men whose welfare depends on business.

He campaigned on the class issue by denunciation of "economic royalists." He filled the ranks of his administration with radicals, leftist thinkers, and social experimenters. He obtained the support of John L. Lewis by abdicating much of his authority to labor. He kept Secretary Perkins in the Cabinet and remained deaf to complaints that she, Chairman Madden, and many other of his appointees were furnishing protection for radical elements on the labor front.

He tried to persuade a Congress, which proved wiser than himself, to pack the United States Supreme Court and bring it under the thumb of the Executive. Stooping from his high position as President of all the people he prosecuted a country-wide "purge" of Democrats who had refused to do his bidding.

Mr. Roosevelt's culminating offense against his party, his country, and the world-wide spirit of democracy stood clearly revealed in the hollow and theatrical circumstances of his third-term nomination at the Chicago convention. The talk of "drafting" the President for the run is veriest nonsense. His whole strategy for a year before the convention was to make impossible the convention's choice of any other candidate.

No other Democrat was allowed to get his head above the common level. Without declaring his candidacy the President swept primary after primary, each victory a triumph for officeholders thumbing another ride on the supposedly magical coattails. And then, having wangled the third nomination for himself, he forced a rebellious convention to name for Vice President a Cabinet member whom few in the convention really wanted.

The example of a President voluntarily retiring at the end of his second term was set by Washington. It was galvanized into a principle by Jefferson. It became an inviolable precedent by the wisdom of succeeding Presidents. It is almost as much a part of our fundamental law as the Constitution itself.

The situation Jefferson warned his countrymen against in 1821 has now come to pass. An ambitious executive, finishing his second term and wishing another, conjures up the Old World theory that he alone in all America is capable of leadership. Mr. Roosevelt paints the portrait of The Indispensable Man, and lo, the likeness is of himself.

These are perilous days in world history for any democracy to experiment with indispensable men. The German Republic tried; Italy tried it; Russia tried it. The pathway of government since the World War is strewn with the twisted remnants of democratic institutions wrecked by indispensable men.

Every modern dictator the world has known first persuaded his countrymen that he was indispensable to their welfare.

America cannot afford to take the risk. No man in this still free Republic is so wise, so strong, so exalted in character or so finely tempered by experience that the safety of the Nation requires his retention in the Presidency. America is not ripe for the advent of the indispensable man.

These facts are set down calmly by a newspaper appreciative of the fine qualities of human sympathy and social justice which inspired the earlier days of Mr. Roosevelt's performance. These achievements are part of the permanent record of the era. They will be remembered outlined against the dark background of economic fumbling and industrial failure.

Much of this achievement will survive, regardless of the result of the November election. The country is committed to its perpetuation. Opposition to Mr. Roosevelt for a third term implies no repudiation of this part of his record.

Opposing the President who seeks to violate the unwritten statute against a third term is Wendell L. Willkie, nominee of the Republican convention at Philadelphia. Unknown to national politics as recently as 3 months ago, this lawyer and businessman from Indiana has become since mid-June the hope of millions whose votes, in the good American way, make our Presidents.

Willkie was the surprise nominee of an unbossed convention. He had received no primary support, and had asked for none. His nomination came as the answer to a specific, if unspoken, demand for a man particularly trained to meet the problems which will face the administration at Washington in the next 4 years.

These are problems of business, of organization, of harnessing the vast forces of the Nation to meet the conditions of a world at war, perhaps to fight a war. These problems are too serious for endless economic experimentation; too vital to the national safety to be handled by a brain trust with leftist tendencies, or a candidate unappreciative of cost control.

The career of Willkie is typically American. From the beginning his success has been self-achieved. Born in a small town, educated in a State university, he began his professional career in a small city. From small beginnings, traveling the road common to average Americans, he has grown into the stature of successful leadership.

To a greater degree, perhaps, than ever before, the welfare of the country in the years at hand will depend on industry intelligently directed. Willkie is trained by hard knocks for his task. He has the confidence of industrial leaders. He possesses a record of fair dealing with labor.

With such a leader America can rise to the first need of the times, which is to arm itself.

But Mr. Roosevelt cannot persuade labor to efficient production. He and his advisers spent too many years helping it get more money for less work.

Mr. Roosevelt cannot expect business to cooperate with him except under compulsion, because his studied effort has been to harry business.

Only on rare occasions in American political history have conditions conspired to bring to the front a man particularly qualified to direct affairs in the crisis. Washington was, of course, a supreme example. Lincoln was one. Jackson was another.

Without suggesting similarities between men, it will seem to many that Willkie belongs in the galaxy of Americans mysteriously prepared for command in this critical period of the Republic.

By the logic of our two-party system the choice for President lies between Wendell L. Willkie and Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Even had the President achieved a flawless record of administration, which we have denied, the time is now at hand when he should retire. He cannot in sincerity say that Willkie is any less qualified than himself to direct the Government in the next 4 years.

That Mr. Roosevelt refuses to make this concession is a partial index of his character. It harmonizes with many Executive acts since March 1933. It is the trade-mark of one who has come to consider himself the indispensable man.

The Plain Dealer makes its choice without hesitation or qualification.

We solemnly urge the people to elect Wendell L. Willkie President of the United States.

The Ramparts We Watch

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. FLANNAGAN, JR.

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 21, 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. JOHN W. FLANNAGAN, JR., OF VIRGINIA

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a copy of the address I prepared for delivery at the annual reunion of the Counts family held at Dog Branch School House, Dickenson County, Va., August 11, 1940. At the last moment, due to official duties, I found it impossible to attend and deliver the address in person. It was, however, read by a distinguished member of the family, Mr. E. J. Sutherland, of Clintwood, Va.

The annual family reunion is a custom of our section that I would like to see observed in all sections of our country. Family pride is an asset that keeps alive many of the virtures of our ancestors that should be, and will have to be, preserved if our Republic lives on. I doubt if there is a purer Anglo-Saxon-American family in America than the Counts family. Would to God we had many more such families.

The address is as follows:

It is a delightful experience to be here today and talk to real Americans, the descendants of pre-Revolutionary stock, about some of the dangers that threaten our country.

I glory in the family that takes pride in its ancestry and annually meets to pay tribute to the dead and embrace the living. It shows that you who now carry on are not unmindful of the virtues of those who have passed and are anxious to preserve those virtues and pass them on down to the generations yet to come.

Among the virtues of the Counts family is a virtue inherited from their ancestors—a virtue common to all the families of the Appalachian region. That virtue, my friends, is an innate love for the country for which our ancesters fought and died to bring into being. And as they died that it might be born, so we, their descendants, ever stand ready to die that it may live. Let me here and now declare to the world that the same sword that brought this country into existence has ever remained unsheathed to keep it alive, and today gleams in the hands of the descendants of those who in the name of equality, freedom, and liberty first tore it from its scabbard, and in turn will be passed on to their descendants on down to the remotest generation. And I am persuaded that the same God that upheld the hands of your illustrious ancestors and their compatriots, as they struck the blow for equality and freedom and liberty, will uphold the hands of their descendants if the time ever comes to strike the blow to preserve that equality, that freedom, and that liberty.

A few nights ago in one of our theaters I witnessed the picture The Ramparts We Watch, which depicts the graphic form the causes that led us into the World War.

I am glad I saw that picture, because it got me to thinking about the ramparts in this country that should ever be watched.

It got me to thinking why these ramparts, which are part and parcel of our Republic, need watching.

It got me to thinking how these ramparts, which are dear to our hearts, should be watched.

And it got me to thinking about who should do the watching.

My friends, give me your attention while I briefly discuss what ramparts need watching, why they need watching, how they should be watched, and who should do the watching.

What ramparts? Asking the question, I know, instantly focuses your mind, as it did mine, on the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States, especially the first 10 amendments to that great document, which are commonly known as the Bill of Rights.

Oh, I saw the picture and I heard the actors speak their pieces, but I saw more. In my imagination, which but reflected my heart and mind, I saw emblazoned across the screen in letters of gold declarations and pronouncements of our forefathers defining these ramparts in bold unmistakable terms.

"We hold these truths to be self-evident: that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just power from the consent of the governed."

* * * * * * *

"We the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessing of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution of the United States."

And there were other ramparts supplementing these major ramparts, even as a great sermon supplements some great Biblical truth, that I saw:

The rampart of religious freedom, freedom of speech, and freedom of the press.

The rampart of peaceable assembly and of petition for the redress of grievances.

The rampart of a free people to keep and bear arms.

The rampart of the security of the home from the militia.

The rampart of the sanctity and security of the person, the home, papers, and effects from unreasonable search and seizure.

The rampart guaranteeing the accused a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of his district, that he be informed of the nature and cause of the charge, that he be confronted with the witnesses against him, and that in his defense he be given the assistance of counsel.

The rampart preserving the right of trial by jury in civil cases.

The rampart prohibiting excessive bail, excessive fines, and cruel and unusual punishment.

The rampart guaranteeing that the enumerated rights in the Constitution shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.

The rampart reserving to the States or the people all powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution nor prohibited by the States.

Yes, my friends, these are the ramparts—the bulwarks of a free people—that are sacred and dear to the American people and mean more to them than life itself. Without them life would not be worth living. With them we enjoy the sweetest, fullest life ever lived by a people since the dawn of time.

Why should our ramparts be watched? I am almost ashamed to ask such a question before the descendants of this simon-pure American family. And yet it is but right that we ask ourselves searching and fundamental questions sometimes lest we become lethargic and take things for granted. You know we Americans who have enjoyed equality and freedom and liberty since the foundation of our Republic ofttimes, I am afraid, just assume that these things, being among the foundation stones, were brought to us on a "silver platter" and will ever be served to us each morning on the same silver platter. Let me tell you we have no right to indulge in assumptions with respect to these God-given rights. They were purchased at a great price—the toil and sacrifice and blood of your ancestors and my ancestors—and the keeping price is just the same as the purchase price. Someone has said that "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty." Yes; and it is also the price of equality and freedom and every other prized and cherished possession. And when "eternal vigilance" calls for sacrifice, we must be prepared to make the sacrifice; when it calls for hardships, endure the hardships. It is the only insurance we can carry against becoming soft, and you know the nation, like the man, which becomes soft, becomes neglectful of obligations, unfaithful to trusts, and, in the course of time, like the man, becomes a derelict and is entombed over in the burying ground known as the cemetery of national derelicts.

Foundation stones, you know, need attention. For instance, when the water begins to seep through and undermine the foundation, if we fail to go to the rescue, trouble is in store. Ofttimes the owner of the structure that has permitted foundation seepage has neglected to go to the rescue until it was too late. When at last awakened from his lethargy he rushes forth to repair, only to find that, due to his lack of vigilance, the foundation has become so undermined that his effort to save only hastens its destruction. Uncle Billy Sutherland, whom I see sitting over there—a distinguished member of this great family—knows what sin seepage will do; that it will cause the loss of the greatest gift of God to man—eternal life; and I know, from the fullness of his experience, can testify that on more than one occasion, as he plead with men on their deathbed to accept salvation, he has heard them cry out in their distress and agony, "Too late; too late!" The same is true of nations. National seepage is as dangerous as foundation seepage or sin seepage. Witness the sad plight of France today. Poor, seepage-ridden France, once the proud, cultured, carefree nation whose democracy was obtained at a great price—the price of the bloodiest of all revolutions—now the helpless victim of neglect to guard the ramparts upon which her greatness rested. German bombs and tanks, my friends, did not destroy France. It was the seepage from within. When the German threat became imminent and France attempted to go to the rescue of the ramparts she cherished, and upon which her greatness rested, she found that, through neglect, her national foundation stones had been undermined. Her honest, eleventh-hour effort to save only hastened her own destruction.

From France may we learn this lesson: France was willing to make the sacrifices necessary to obtain democracy, but unwilling to make the sacrifices necessary to preserve democracy. She was willing to pay the purchase price, but unwilling to pay the upkeep price. The French people failed to watch the ramparts. My friends, your ancestors and my ancestors made the sacrifices necessary to secure for us this great democracy of ours. They purchased with their toil and sacrifice; yes, with their life blood, the equality, the freedom and the liberties we now enjoy, and bequeathed them to us as a priceless heritage to be guarded and preserved and passed on to our children and our children's children. Ours is the duty—nay, the privilege—to suffer every toil, to make every sacrifice that may be necessary, even to the laying down of our lives, to watch and protect these sacred, blood-bought, God-given ramparts and save them inviolate from the seepage of every influence foreign to our democratic system of government.

How should our ramparts be watched? Let me answer in one sentence: By living our democracy.

The more I ponder over our form of government, the more I contemplate the spirit and genius of the men who brought it into being, the more firmly I become convinced that our best governmental textbook is the Holy Bible. Our democracy as recorded in the Declaration of Independence, the Constitution, and the amendments thereto known as the Bill of Rights, is nothing more than governmental Christianity; that is, applying the principles of Christianity to the government of a people. Entertaining the views that I do, I am persuaded that it is just as much the duty of an American citizen to live his democracy as it is the duty of a Christian to live his Christianity. Proclaiming the Declaration of Independence, the Constitution, and the Bill of Rights by those whose lives belie their proclamations will no more save our Republic than psalm singing by a bunch of sinners will save the church. "By their fruits ye shall know them" applies to state and church alike.

Even if you forget every other thing I say today, I want you to remember this thought and carry it home with you. As long as we live our democracy, the American Republic will live. The moment we cease to live our democracy, that moment will mark the beginning of the end of our Republic.

We hear a great deal these days about unity. A democracy, like any other government, depends upon unity. Unity—forced unity—in an autocratic country is brought about by the iron hand of the dictator. In a democracy it is brought about by confidence and faith generated by the knowledge that the government is being administered in the interest of all individuals and classes alike, that in the enjoyment of our freedom and liberties we are all upon an equality. In one case the motivating cause is fear, in the other, love. The nation whose unity is brought about by fear is short-lived. The nation whose unity is brought about by love is enduring. The spirit of no nation ever has been conquered, and the spirit of no nation ever will be conquered as long as the people of that nation are united by a deep love for their institutions and a heartfelt desire to perpetuate them. And as long as the spirit of a nation lives, though overpowered and subjugated, that nation lives and her people ever look forward, with a confidence born of God, to her national restoration. And the only way to insure the continued love of our institutions and a united people in their defense is by living our democracy. And, my friends, ever remember that you are neither living your democrary nor promoting unity by crushing one class and granting special privileges to another class. Unity can only be brought about by equality of opportunity and equality of treatment.

If we live our democracy, there are certain things that will follow, even as the night follows the day, from our democratic living:

The man who not only believes in but who actually lives his democracy will never contribute to undermining governmental seepage. He will never be misled by the traducers of our institutions. I do not know of a more shining example of this statement than the citizenry of this great mountain section. Here where we find the purest Anglo-Saxon stock to be found in America; here where over 99 percent of our population is native-born, the great percentage tracing their ancestry back to the founding fathers; here where democracy is bred in the bone, we live the freedom that is ours, enjoy our liberties, and practice that equality that makes every man a king. Here we ever watch and guard our ramparts of freedom, of liberty, and of equality. And because we do, we are free from the cesspools of squalor where poverty and want breed distrust in our institutions and generate slimy undermining seepage. And we who live our democracy will ever strive to make our Government work in such a way as to clear up the cesspools by bringing to the unfortunates the blessings of a government operated in the interest of all.

We who believe in our democratic institutions to such a point that we live our democracy, will not tolerate those who are not in sympathy with our institutions and who, under the cloak of freedom of speech and freedom of the press, spread subversive doctrines. Oh, I believe in freedom of speech and freedom of the press, but I also believe in freedom of action in dealing with the traducers of our country. The man who attempts to undermine or destroy our freedom, purchased by the blood of our forefathers and guaranteed by our Constitution, by that attempt forfeits his own freedom and should never be allowed to escape the consequences of his act by invoking the protection of the very instrument he seeks to destroy.

We should watch and see that these subversive doctrines are not taught in our public schools and colleges by those in sympathy with such doctrines. While I believe in culture, while I believe in developing the mind to its fullest extent, I am against forcing the plastic minds of our young manhood, our young womanhood, to listen to this subversive "ism" or the other subversive "ism," this subversive ideology or the other subversive ideology, taught by sympathetic teachers. The man, the woman, who doesn't believe that pure, undefiled Americanism is the only "ism," the only ideology, for a free people, should not be permitted to teach in a single school or college in this country. While I would not let our youth grow up in ignorance of these strange and subversive "isms" and ideologies, I would require that those who impart the knowledge at the same time point out that these strange doctrines are repulsive to our philosophy of government and, if adopted here, would lead to the destruction of our free institutions. What I am against—and it is all wrong—is for our youth to be taught these strange philosophies by those in sympathy with them, and who are more anxious to make converts than they are to impart knowledge. Before I leave this point, permit me to pause for just a moment to pay tribute to our small church schools and deplore the passing of so many of them. The small Christian college, to my way of thinking, is our greatest educational asset. And the greatest educational loss we have suffered is the closing of so many of them due to lack of finances. Here old-fashioned religion and old-fashioned Americanism—and you cannot improve on either—is still taught, and old-fashioned American young men and women, the kind we need to keep America great, are turned out. Here we find teachers who still believe in the cleansing blood of the Saviour and in our free institutions which were purchased by the cleansing blood of our ancestors. I am not afraid of church school trained young men or women being misled by these "isms" and ideologies.

And watch these different fronts, such as the Christian front, etc. There is something wrong with the man who needs a front to hide behind. If you live your democracy, there is only one front you can wear, and that is an American front. You don't have to wear a placard to let people know you are living the democratic way. Your life will proclaim it. I am always skeptical of the man who wears a label in order for you to know who he is and what he stands for. Let me bring home to you just what I mean. There is not a man or woman, boy or girl, present here today that has to wear a label or hide behind some front to let you know that she or he is a simon-pure, unadulterated American of the highest type. Your Americanism is known by the lives you live. Most of the fronts that you hear so much about these days are either rackets that some scheming scoundrel is running to coin money or organizations set up by foreign influences to poison the minds of our people against our free institutions, and neither one can exist in the community where people actually live their Americanism. Why, one of these fronts wouldn't last in this section as long as a dewdrop on one of your sun-kissed hills would last on a cloudless hot summer morning. The dewdrop could not stand God's sunlight, and the front couldn't stand your American searchlight. We had better be watching these sections where they can last longer.

And we who live our democracy will watch this radical foreign element that we have permitted to percolate into our midst. I have only the highest respect for those who have come to our shores with the honest purpose of becoming a part of us, to share our fortunes and help us build a greater America. The element I speak of came with no such purpose. They came to stir up trouble, to undermine our institutions by derision and scorn. Yes; they came to scoff; and if they don't remain to pray, then I believe in giving them the works and sending them back where they came from so they can fry in their own fat.

Yes, my friends, if we are to preserve our democracy, we must live our democracy. There is no other way. The reason democratic institutions in other nations have crumbled—and I make the statement advisedly—is because the peoples of those nations no longer lived their democracy.

And we who live our democracy will ever see that we are prepared to meet any emergency that may threaten our country. While we do not seek 1 foot of territory held by any other nation, we do not propose to compromise our sovereignty by surrendering 1 inch of our soil or allowing the invader to plant a single footstep upon the land we love. The size of our Army, the size of our Navy, the size of our air fleet, the number of our implements of war should be measured by the danger, or the probable danger, confronting us. We should at all times keep our Army, our Navy, and implements of war up to the point that we will be able to successfully ward off the invasion by any nation or combination of nations. The best insurance policy for peace we can carry is a strong Army, a strong Navy, and a strong air fleet, manned by real Americans trained in the use of the implements of modern warfare. The dictator never wages war against the nation that he thinks his equal or superior. Like all bullies, he fights those he thinks his inferiors in physical strength.

Right now, as I see the situation, which has been brought about by madmen bent upon world conquest, bent upon destroying religion and freedom and bringing all men under their dominion and power, we are confronted with the further duty of protecting the Americas in order to insure our own protection. And, by the help of God and our own strong arm, let me tell the Hitlers and the Stalins and the Mussolinis if they want to find the end of their road they had better not head toward the Americas, because if they do they will find it just outside the international boundary line surrounding these great countries. While we do not propose to send our boys to fight on European soil, we are just as firm in our conviction that their boys are not going to invade the soil of the Americas.

Who should do the watching? Why, every American should be a watchman. This job of watching, protecting, and perpetuating our ramparts belongs to no particular American, it belongs to no particular class, it belongs to all Americans, rich and poor, humble and exalted alike.

Being the duty, the privilege of all, when the necessity arises, as it has arisen, to increase our armed forces in order not only to watch but protect our ramparts, the burden should be, as far as possible, equally distributed. This, in my opinion, can only be accomplished by passing a fair conscription bill that will distribute the burden in a fair and honest way among all classes. Equality! The philosophy of life of the true American. I have lived by that philosophy and I am willing to die by it. I make this statement knowing that my two sons—the younger a native of dear old Dickenson and the older of the adjoining county, Buchanan—will be called to the colors. As much as I love them, and they are as dear to my heart as your children are to your hearts, when the hour of watching arrives, when the hour of protecting arrives, I want them to take part in the watching and protecting. And it fills my heart with pride to be able to tell you I have talked the matter over with both of them and they share wholeheartedly my convictions. And, my friends, it will not be the first time that a Flannagan or a Counts helped do the watching and protecting, because both families did a good deal of the watching and protecting as far back as 1776. They were on the job then, have been on the job since, and I thank God for the privilege that they are on the job today.

It would be folly—absolute, unadulterated folly—to build up a great Navy, to build thousands of bombing planes and tanks, and then fail to provide the manpower. We have the manpower, the finest manpower on earth, and in endorsing conscription to obtain that manpower I am only following the American way of equality. I am only advocating that when America needs our boys, and she does need them, that when she reaches out and takes the boy from the cabin that the next reach will take the boy from the castle; that when she reaches out and takes the boy from the farm that the next reach will take the boy of the professional man; that when she reaches out and takes the boy from the home of labor that the next reach will take the boy from the home of the industrialist. Treat them alike. That, my friends, is Americanism. That, my friends, is living your democracy.

My friends, I must close. In closing let me say keep up the traditions of the Counts family by continuing to live your democracy and be of good cheer. I have no fears for America. We have too many Counts families scattered over our fair country who not only believe in democracy but who live their democracy to become alarmed. We have the production capacity, we have the manpower, and we still trust in the Lord. You cannot beat that combination. We are depending on all three to carry us through this crisis.

Back in July 4, 1776, we declared our freedom and independence. Since that eventful day the years have come and the years have gone, bringing in their wake the destruction and creation alike of kingdoms, principalities, and near democracies, but under our philosophy of government which is based upon the proposition that all governmental power rests in the people and an innate faith in the capacity of men to govern themselves through their chosen representatives, America has marched on, weathering every national storm, growing in power and prestige, and stands out today, as never before, as a challenge to the dictators that have sprung up in a crazed world, that if civilization is to be preserved the edict of the dictator must give way to the composite voice of the people as expressed through their duly chosen representatives.

Stick to that philosophy, prepare, place your faith in God, and America will continue to march on.

America's Prayer

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LEWIS D. THILL
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 21, 1940

POEM BY WILLIAM CHAPPELL, OF MILWAUKEE, WIS.

Mr. THILL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following prayer poem by William Chappell, of 2118 North Oakland Avenue, Milwaukee, Wis.:

AMERICA'S PRAYER
(By William Chappell)

Our Father who art above,
Instill in our hearts a greater love
For the glorious liberties we have today,
Before too late they are taken away.

Continue to give us our daily bread,
And grant us the power to keep our head
When radicals rant of a favorite "ism,"
With which they'd displace our Americanism.

Forgive us for seeming to disregard
The freedoms our forefathers fought for so hard
In the Civil War and the Revolution;
Our Bill of Rights and the Constitution.

Lead us not into war with the modern-day Neros,
That would cost the lives of American heroes,
And wipe out democracy, or, worse still,
Subject us here to a dictator's will.

Deliver us our Father who art above,
From the loss of those rights we cherish and love,
So that each night when we kneel and pray,
We can say, "Thank God for the U. S. A."

Mr. Bullitt's Warning

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LUTHER A. JOHNSON
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 21, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE WASHINGTON EVENING STAR

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks, I submit herewith an editorial appearing in the Washington Evening Star, on yesterday, concerning the radio address delivered by Ambassador William C. Bullitt, last Sunday evening, in Philadelphia, about the fall of France and also warning of the danger in which the United States is at this time.

The editorial expresses my views, and I believe the views of a majority of the American people upon this subject.

[From the Washington Evening Star]

MR. BULLITT'S WARNING

Ambassador Bullitt's frank statement of his conviction that America is in danger of German attack and his analysis of the reasons which brought about the collapse of French military resistance are, in a sense, a response to Wendell Willkie's demand that the administration take the people into its confidence concerning the true extent of the emergency which confronts us.

The remarks of the Ambassador to France undoubtedly had the approval of the State Department and probably of the President. The statement would have been more impressive and would have carried more weight had it come directly from Mr. Roosevelt, but even in that event the President would have had to depend to a considerable extent on information obtained from Mr. Bullitt.

Thus, if Mr. Bullitt in this instance may be regarded as an official spokesman for the Government, his remarks are entitled to serious consideration, and his opinions, especially as to the reasons for the collapse of France, should not be lightly disregarded in view of the fact that he has had a most favorable opportunity to observe that tragedy at first hand.

Mr. Bullitt may be mistaken—although the evidence abundantly supports him—when he predicts that Hitler, if victorious in Europe, would seek to attack the United States. He may be in error in urging that our own safety requires that we should follow the advice of General Pershing and extend aid to the British Fleet. He is well qualified by experience to speak on these matters, but they are, after all, expressions of opinion, and those who disgree are entitled to hold their own views. But it does not follow that Mr. Bullitt is subject to criticism for stating the case as he sees it. As a matter of fact, it was his patriotic duty to speak frankly, and it is disturbing in the extreme that he should be accused of conduct "little short of treason" for so doing. Yet that charge was made yesterday by Speaker CLARK of Idaho, and made on the basis of a distorted interpretation of what Mr. Bullitt said. His address did not "amount to an appeal to the American people to go into an unprovoked foreign war," as the Idaho Senator said. On the contrary, Mr. Bullitt stated that "it is as clear as anything on this earth that the United States will not go to war, but it is equally clear that war is coming toward the Americas." If it be treason for Mr. Bullitt to urge this Nation to prepare to meet a danger that he considers to be real, or to take reasonable measures to ward off that danger, the time has come when it is useless to talk about defending America.

Peacetime Conscription

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BURTON K. WHEELER

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 21 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. BURTON K. WHEELER, OF MONTANA, AUGUST 15, 1940

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by me on August 15, 1940, over the blue network of the National Broadcasting Co. on the subject of conscription.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I have said in recent weeks that the United States is marching down the road to war. Peacetime conscription is not only another step in that direction but it is the greatest step toward regimentation and militarism ever undertaken by the Congress of the United States. The General Staff has advocated it before, Secretary of War Stimson advocated it as far back as 1916, but the Congress never adopted it in peacetime.

Those who advocate peacetime conscription generally predicate their advocacy on two contentions. These contentions are, first, that large numbers of additional men are immediately needed for the Army and Navy and that this large number cannot be obtained by the traditional American method of voluntary enlistment; second, that conscription is the method of raising the needed men most consonant with a democratic form of government.

I challenge both of those contentions.

Note that these contentions are to some extent necessarily interrelated. If the Nation were in imminent danger and required 10,000,000 men for its defense, and only a half million came forward, it would doubtless be both necessary and equitable to select by lot the necessary number from among the available manpower of the Nation able to serve. On the other hand, if but 10,000 men were needed, and more than that number offered to serve, few people would argue that it is either necessary or desirable to insist upon impressing into the military service men who do not wish to enter.

Those who urge compulsory service at the present time contend that large numbers of men are immediately required for the Army and Navy to defend the Nation, and that the men required cannot be obtained without resort to compulsory service. But this contention cannot survive any sort of reasonably close examination.

That the military events of the last year and the existing world situation generally bespeak a need on the part of this Nation for increased and more effective defense, only the most foolhardy would deny. But common sense also dictates the magnitude and imminence of the dangers.

Nothing is so certain in the life of man as death. Because of this most of our citizens carry insurance against death; yet, despite its certainty, few of us deem it wise to purchase so much insurance that in order to pay the premium we must starve ourselves and our families. The people desire to take out and pay for an adequate amount of insurance against a foreseeable danger, but they do not wish to assume a load of obligation so heavy that it will bring about the very event they seek to insure against.

I believe that while avoiding hysteria and foolish excesses, adequate sums of money should be appropriated to provide the Army and Navy with the most modern and efficient equipment obtainable, in ample quantity, and that steps should be taken to ensure efficient production of military supplies by the Nation's industry. I believe, however, and on this all expert opinion is in agreement, that it is more important for our troops to be thoroughly trained and expert in the new mechanical warfare, and ably commanded, than that they be merely numerous. A small but expert force of Germans seized all of Norway; a small but expert Finnish Army held the Russian Goliath at bay for many months. But a large French army was quickly crushed—less by the enemy than by its own incompetent and in many instances, traitorous generals.

How large an army do we want? Today our Army stands at a strength of 255,000 officers and men and will soon be at its full authorized strength of 375,000. The National Guard stands at 230,000 men with the number increasing rapidly. The Navy has 146,000 men and officers and is increasing the number to 170,000. This does not take into consideration our other armed forces.

How much of an increase is desirable to provide for the national safety?

Outside the Army, all the most eminent military authorities—Hanson W. Baldwin, of the New York Times; Maj. George Fielding Eliot; Col. Frederick Palmer; Basil Walker; and many others—agree that a force of 400,000 to 600,000 would be entirely adequate.

In view of what has been printed in the press, it is surprising to find on turning to the statements of our highest Army authorities that their views do not differ materially from the quoted views of the military experts. At the recent hearings before the Senate Military Affairs Committee, General Marshall, Chief of Staff of the War Department, testified that the Army wanted a peacetime strength of 375,000 men.

When the full testimony of General Marshall is supplemented by the testimony of General Shedd, Colonel Twaddle, and Major Hershey, all of whom testified for the General Staff, the following facts are ascertained:

1. The General Staff and the War Department see no need for millions of soldiers and freely confess that it would be both unwise and impossible to attempt to induct into the Army any such huge force as the public is accustomed to hear named.

2. What the General Staff testified to was that it is necessary at the present time to increase the Army's strength immediately from 255,000 to 375,000—and to increase the strength of the National Guard from 230,000 to 400,000—a total increase of 290,000 men. Thereafter it may wish to step up the strength of the Army further to 500,000 in order to place the Army on a full war footing.

In other words, without conscription, we shall soon have an Army of 900,000 men. General Marshall definitely stated that they could be obtained by enlistment, but not, he thought, as quickly as necessary. I ask, For what purpose it is proposed to draft an additional 1,200,000 men?

It is indisputable according to the sworn testimony of General Staff officers that enlistment in the Army, instead of being negligible as is generally believed, has been running well above the Army's quota. During the month of June, when the Army was proceeding cautiously with its recruiting, approximately 27,000 men presented themselves for enlistment, of whom 18,000 were accepted. According to recent newspaper reports, enlistment during July has reached new high figures.

One should also bear in mind other factors which do affect enlistments in the Army—the minimum period for which a man may enlist, the salary received at the start, and the opportunity for advancement thereafter.

Do you know that the Army has refused to accept enlistments for less than 3 years, notwithstanding the law provides specifically that men may enlist in the Army for 1 year? The General Staff wanted them for 3 years, so they ignored the law.

It cannot be doubted that large numbers of young men who would be willing to enlist for 1 year—in order to get the training—are not willing to tie themselves down for a long 3-year period at $21 per month.

The conscription bill recognizes this fact, as it proposes to force them into the Army for 1 year.

The testimony of General Shedd and General Marshall brings home this astounding proposition. Our General Staff is recommending that there now be imposed on the men of this country, by compulsion, what they refused to allow them to do voluntarily. This may seem a strange paradox—devoid of logic—but this is the testimony of the General Staff. Although the Nation has been led to believe that the General Staff seeks conscription because it is necessary for national defense, the General Staff desires conscription whether or not the necessary men can be obtained by enlistment.

When we are considering the question of conscripting men for the Army, we should bear in mind that the pay of an enlisted man is $21 per month, approximately $5 per week, with little or no chance for advancement. As compared with these prospects, a young man weighing the benefits of enlisting in the Army will find that enrollment in the Civilian Conservation Corps for 1 year will pay him $30 per month to start, with fair possibility of advancing to assistant leader at $36 a month, or leader at $45 a month. Better still, if the young man wishes to enroll in the Navy, he will find that he will be paid $21 a month for the first 4 months, and by the end of the first year he will, in all likelihood, advance to seaman, first class, at $54 per month. It is significant that the Navy has 7,000 men on the waiting list.

But, it will be asked, what about the expense of such a program? At a time when Congress has passed defense bills which will require an expenditure of $18,000,000,000, approximately one-fiftieth of this amount, or $320,000,000 a year, does not loom very large. More important, the program of conscription would cost, at the General Staff's own estimate, a billion dollars per year.

I have mentioned the $18,000,000,000 we recently appropriated for increased armaments. I was one of those who voted for these bills because our Army and Navy men pleaded, "What good are men without arms?" Now the Military Affairs Committee turns around and, in recommending conscription, says, "What good are arms without men?" What sort of circular reasoning—what sort of strange logic are we being subjected to? First, we are begged to give arms to our men—then men to our arms. For the arms we actually have we have men waiting aplenty. If you do not believe me, read the accounts of the current First Army maneuvers in New York—see the pictures of men drilling with pipes instead of guns, with trucks instead of tanks, and with birds instead of planes.

I believed that the testimony of the General Staff itself and the figures I have quoted definitely disprove the first and major contention of the proponents of conscription—that only by conscription can the men needed to meet the demands of national defense be secured.

But we are told that another reason why we should abandon all American traditions and adopt peacetime conscription is because it is so fair and so democratic.

How can one say that conscription constitutes the essence of the democratic concept and is at the same time the chief hallmark of all those dictator regimes from which democracy has been completely and shamelessly banished. Where is conscription found in its fullest flower, where is it ennobled and glorified as the highest honor of the citizen, if not in those lands where militarism and totalitarianism have blanketed the populace and stifled democracy most completely?

Every nation must defend itself from invasion—that is the universal law of self-preservation. Every inhabitant of a land must be ready to contribute to its defense—even to laying down his life if need be.

To say, however, that every resident of a country must be prepared to defend the country from invasion, even at the cost of his life if need be, is something very different from the proposition to turning over to one man the power to compel free citizens to spend part of their lives in the army, when men are available who are perfectly willing to make a career of this work.

To use a homely illustration, no one can doubt that keeping the streets of our cities clean, free from pestilential and disease-breeding dirt, is a matter of the most immediate and vital concern to the inhabitants of every city, and to the State. No one would dispute, either, that if some unforeseeable emergency arose every citizen in the city or State affected would be commanded to clean them if necessary to safeguard the public welfare. Yet, because this obligation is inherent in citizenship no one has come forward to advocate that it is undemocratic to permit our streets to be cleaned by those who are willing to make this their work—nor would it be contended that street cleaning should be performed by citizens conscripted for such purpose.

What has been said of street cleaning is, of course, equally applicable to the occupations of firemen, policemen, transport workers, and the like. The performance of all these tasks is vital to the functioning of our society and the welfare of our Nation—in the absence of volunteers they would fall upon the general body of citizenry, but we have never found it necessary on democratic grounds to require every citizen to spend a year of his life cleaning streets.

The democracy which we hail in our country, and which we all seek jealously to guard, no doubt means different things to different people, but it is certain that to everyone of us democracy means at least the right to choose freely our own occupations and to conduct our lives with the greatest amount of freedom consistent with the general welfare. I recognize that where the defense of the Nation and the public weal are concerned, the rights of the individual must yield. But conversely, I believe that if the public necessity does not require, the essence of democracy is to leave the individual unmolested in the enjoyment of "the inalienable rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness."

It is significant to point out here that the English guard their liberties more jealously than we do. In the World War, it was not until after the Battle of the Marne that England resorted to conscription. And while they were at war Australia and New Zealand defeated conscription in a public referendum. And today, Canada and Australia only resorted to conscription months after they entered this war—and even then with the provision that no conscript could be sent out of Canada or Australia.

Certainly, to many millions of Americans it will seem that if conscription in peacetime is democracy—then democracy has reached its fullest flowering in lands across the waters which surround us—in Japan; in Germany; in Italy; and in Russia.

Many sincere persons who view conscription with mistrust and dislike, nevertheless withold their opposition on the ground that "it does not seem right that only the jobless and the low-paid worker should be obliged to join the Army." General Shedd probably referred to this aspect of the question when he said "they (the principles of conscription) spread the requirements of military service over the entire personnel in such a just and proper way * * *."

In almost the next breath, however, General Shedd was explaining that if we had the compulsory selective service recommended by the General Staff it would be designed to select the "unimportant" men, while the important ones would not be inducted into the Army.

Said General Shedd, I quote, "Well, I believe it (voluntary enlistment) would tend more to disrupt the country, because you cannot pick and choose the unimportant man. I do not mean unimportant from his point of view but unimportant in the whole economic life of our country."

During the last war, after Congress had enacted the Selective Service Act, it also passed a resolution stating what categories of men would be chosen first and what classes would be deferred. It is interesting to note that in class I those to be called first were married men who have habitually failed to support their families, married men dependent on wives for support, unskilled farm laborers, and unskilled industrial laborers.

Is there anything democratic about a conscription law that grabs the unimportant man, the unskilled farm laborer, and sends him off to the trenches at $21 per month while the skilled man or the important man gets from $15 to $20 a day in the factory or draws down huge bonuses as president of a corporation? The son of a captain of industry is obviously "important" to business; he must prepare to take over his father's place. Mrs. Jones' son, an unemployed worker, is important only to the Army. It is to Mrs. Jones' son that the Army looks for recruits now, and it will be to him they will turn for conscription. The only question is, Shall young Jones be induced to join the Army voluntarily by offering him a decent rate of pay and a fair chance of promotion or shall he be forced to join the Army at $21 a month whether he likes it or not? If there is any doubt about what the answer is, just ask young Jones.

But another reason for conscription was advanced by Secretary of War Stimson. Said Mr. Stimson:

"Conscription is necessary to impress upon the country the gravity of the world situation."

For Secretary Stimson it is not enough that the American people should arrive at its opinion of the world situation on the basis of free, open, and rational consideration of the situation—it must be stampeded into a militaristic frame of mind, and made ready for any adventures the Secretary thinks necessary.

"Government by persuasion," said Secretary Stimson, "is very much slower than government by arbitrary force." So the Secretary is attempting by this bill to remedy the disadvantage by giving us "government by arbitrary force." There are, however, still a few of us who believe "government by persuasion" still has virtues for which increased speed cannot compensate. Maybe Hitler made the trains run on time, but the German people are now paying the price in tears and blood and life.

I have suggested the reasons why the General Staff wants conscription. From the beginning of time the general staffs of every country in the world have wanted conscription. That is part of militarism. I now ask, Why do high administration officials and financiers with international connections urge it upon us? I am afraid that only the future will reveal this to us—but I say to you now that it is not because they believe our shores or skies are in danger of invasion. For these men there is an entire hemisphere to be defended. When men begin to envisage the defense of their country in terms of entire hemispheres, then, of course, millions upon millions of men are necessary.

It was in the name of defense of Germany that Hitler invaded Czechoslovakia. It was in the name of defense that Hitler invaded Poland, Belgium, Holland, and Norway. In the name of defense Russia invaded little Finland. To what corners of the world is it now proposed or intended to send these millions of our men—in the name of defense?

Enact peacetime conscription and no longer will this be a free land—no longer will a citizen be able to say that he disagrees with a governmental edict. Hushed whispers will replace free speech; secret meetings in dark places will supplant free assemblage; labor and industry, men and women, will be shackled by the chains they have themselves forged. And all this, mark you, while this last great democracy is still at peace. Is this the sort of society for which our forbears shed their blood? Is this the goal for which we strive?

Some Senators say the people want conscription. I challenge them to go to the country on that issue. I would like to have the New York lawyers, the Army General Staff, and any others who are advocating the passage of this bill, stand before the farmers, the workers, the mothers and fathers and tell them what a fine thing peacetime conscription is for their boys. I would like to see a national referendum on the question of conscription. I would like to see those who will have to do the fighting and the dying decide this question.

The original Burke-Wadsworth bill recited in its preamble that—I quote—"the Congress hereby declares that the integrity and institutions of the United States are gravely threatened." The Military Affairs Committee has stricken this clause from the revised bill. I deeply deplore its omission from the present bill.

For I say to you, and I say it to you with all the solemnity of which I am capable, the integrity and institutions of the United States are indeed gravely threatened—and it is the bill now before Congress—and the hysteria which bred it—which creates that threat.

If this bill passes—it will slit the throat of the last democracy still living—it will accord to Hitler his greatest and cheapest victory. On the headstone of American democracy he will inscribe, "Here Lies the Foremost Victim of the War of Nerves."

Religion—America's Indispensable Ally

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DAVID I. WALSH

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 21 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. DAVID I. WALSH, AUGUST 20, 1940

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I ask permission to have inserted in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a speech delivered by me on Tuesday evening, August 20, 1940, through the public telephone address system, to the delegates of the national convention of the Knights of Columbus at Indianapolis, on the subject of Religion—America's Indispensable Ally.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I regret that the pending in the Senate of an amendment to exempt ministers and divinity students from the training and service provisions of the conscription bill now before the Senate compelled me to remain here in Washington to support this amendment. Under the circumstances I know you will forgive my absence in person from your banquet tonight.

You assemble at a time when our country is faced with grave and stupendous problems—problems that require for their satisfactory solution patriotism and fortitude of a high degree, as well as the application of all the aid and assistance that the spiritual resources of the Nation can command.

What is this crisis? Is it the result of the war in Europe? Is it the danger of our participation in that war? Yes; and even more it is. What will be America's tomorrow?

We are living in a world that is in no way the world in which our generation was born. Confusion, doubt, and uncertainty stalk throughout the land. In most parts of the world all spiritual forces are latent, and only the rumblings of gigantic war machines are heard.

Here in America we are assailed by propaganda on every side. Propaganda to go into war, propaganda to stay out of the war, propaganda to surrender our old theories of American life and thought and to substitute laws and customs heretofore alien to all American ideals. Though we are not tonight in the conflict of war, we are certainly in conflict with dangerous proposals, new theories, the adoption of which may make our plight worse than that of war.

We are strengthening our shields and sharpening our swords to build up a great national defense. We intend to leave nothing undone to make our defense on land, in the air, and on sea impregnable. We propose to fight to the last drop of our blood those who seek to invade our land and rob us of the possession of the great natural resources the Almighty has so bounteously bequeathed upon us and the free institutions that have come down to us through the sacrifices of the founders.

But there are other defenses America needs in addition to navies, armies, and airplanes. There is something more needed to preserve America than a strong military machine. America needs a national-defense program that will build up the Nation's morale, the Nation's character, the Nation's soul to combat the forces that are assailing American institutions.

In Europe tyrants and demagogs have rallied the people by force under the claim of national unity. "The people," they cry, "must stand as one" and the one must follow the dictator. While Europe is organizing to serve the objectives of the dictators we must organize to support and defend Americanism by reinculcating the real American philosophy of life and democracy in the souls of the American people.

Shall we Americans remain as were our fathers and forefathers, content with the forms and standards of our free institutions or shall we, driven by rising winds of discontent and materialism, cast overboard the ballast of tradition and surrender our individual liberties? Shall we accept the political philosophy which makes the state the complete and final arbiter of our lives or shall we hold the Christian and democratic belief that the individual citizen shall be taught, guided, and led by his own conscience, with the least restraint from the state as possible, into the making of a better political, economic, and social order? This is an urgent, pressing question to which Americans must soon make answer. If we do not defend and support the democratic philosophy of government and apply it to the problems of our day, then others will import an alien philosophy, the consequences of which will be more serious to our religious and political rights.

It is a fight against the right of the state to dominate the lives of the individual. Against this doctrine of state dominations stands the Christian doctrine that man, as individuals, must be taught the principles of justice and charity so that there will be no social injustice of man against man, class against class, nation against nation. Against the communistic and totalitarian doctrine, "make the state so powerful that it would force all men to do its will," religion proclaims: Make men better so that they will desire to give, as well as to have, economical, social, and political equality.

For more than 150 years the people of the United States have lived by the political doctrines with which "man has been endowed by God," and proclaimed in the Declaration of Independence. We have grown large, powerful, and great as a result. Until recent times, when economic conditions here enjoined it, the oppressed and downtrodden of all the world have found haven here because of those doctrines. While we have been living under these doctrines peacefully, happily, and prosperously, the rest of the world has shifted from one form of government to another, has gone from one dictator to another, from one revolution to another, from one philosophy to another.

Why have we not been engulfed? Because for the past 150 years we have held the fortress of our essential liberties impregnable against all attacks by placing our reliance upon God; because we have sought to protect and strengthen ourselves by the application of spiritual ideals and because we have maintained unfaltering faith in the political principles of the founders. Why is there reason to fear that we shall not maintain the philosophy and progress of the last 150 years? Because the selfishness and greed of many of the possessions of wealth have led them to worship money and pleasure, and the poor have become cynical, distrustful, and disconsolate because of man's injustice. In America our problem today is to discover how we can solve this inequality and injustice while holding to our constitutional forms. Religious insistence upon justice and charity applicable in every relation of life to the individual is the sole solution.

Only recently the Catholic University of America set up a commission on American citizenship which gives promise of making an exceedingly great contribution to the solving of the social, economic, and political problems here in America. The Christian concept of Americanism and the preservation of it will permeate through the textbooks published by this commission into every Christian school. It will do much to reawaken in the soul of America and in its future citizens an appreciation and understanding of the political truths that America almost alone proclaims today in this drab and war-torn world. Other religious groups are carrying on, and will gladly carry on, similar activities.

There are many immediate and grave problems confronting the Nation at this very hour that call for the exercise of calm, dispassionate and unprejudiced judgment and I plead for the members of your order to make such a contribution.

The first and foremost obligation, as I look out upon the world scene today, is for the United States of America to avoid involvement in all the wars originating in Europe, Asia, and Africa; to remain officially neutral and to resolutely set our minds against the propaganda that would drive us into the cataclysm in Europe on the pretense of helping America by helping certain belligerents. There is only one way for America to act in this crisis and that is to think first and last of America and the future welfare of our people and our institutions.

All religions teach us that the taking of life, even on the field of battle, is only justified when it is the only means of repelling attack. The Christian program of peace excludes all bitterness and hatred. It is a program of justice tempered by warm charity. It recognizes that the natural laws grant to individuals and to citizens the right to resist the attack of an invader with physical force, and because of this we believe it obligates the people to make every sacrifice in order to make our resistance so strong that no aggressor can succeed or will even dare to attack us.

America cannot fulfill her noble function either to her own citizens or to the world unless she is at peace. War is the destroyer of the best things that mankind has produced and inherited; it is the enemy of civilization. Therefore it becomes all Americans to avoid war as one would the sting of death, for unless it is war in defense of our own country it may become the end to all we hold dear.

Finally, let us not forget the cause of present war conditions. Fundamentally, it is because God, the natural law, and Christian revelation have all been thrown into discard. Under existing world philosophy man is to decide what is right and wrong and man will make the final judgment on all things. This is the philosophy of the modern supreme state. In place of God the state is worshipped. Liberty, justice, religion, even life and death now hang, in many parts of the world, upon the whim of the man-made authority of the state. When major disputes and differences arise among the nations there is, therefore, left as the only recourse, physical conflict or war, for most nations today recognize no spiritual authority.

The American founding fathers were the inheritors of a glorious past built upon Christian philosophy. We today stand as their heirs and upon no group of citizens does the responsibility of interpreting our American philosophy of government rest more than upon Catholics.

Americans are groping everywhere for a clear definition of American philosophy of life and government. We must not let the alien and godless philosophies define the terms of Americanism and decide the civic rights of citizens. We must join with religious men and women to preserve our political heritage. This is the challenge that confronts all religions, and in a special manner, you Knights of Columbus. It can be found only upon returning to the fundamentals, to the philosophy of the founding fathers, to the truths and beliefs of Christianity. We must not fail to meet that challenge.

Selective Military Training

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD R. BURKE

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 21 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. EDWARD R. BURKE ON ADVANTAGES OF SELECTIVE COMPULSORY TRAINING PROGRAM

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a radio address delivered by me last evening over station WMAL on the subject The Advantages of a Selective Compulsory Training Program Over the Volunteer System.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SELECTIVE COMPULSORY MILITARY TRAINING VERSUS THE VOLUNTEER SYSTEM

An adequate national defense is the desire of every patriotic American citizen. If there be those opposed to such a program, their number is infinitesimal, their reasoning faulty, their motives subject to question. Your will is being carried out by a Congress which has voted appropriations of billions of dollars for the construction of ships, planes, tanks, and all the instruments of a modern, mechanized, military establishment. That part of the task which you have assigned to Congress is well under way. The progress is satisfactory. It will rapidly improve.

There is one further step. An adequate national defense is an impossibility without manpower, suitable in number and thoroughly trained. There may be honest differences of opinion as to the number of men required, and as to the length of training that is necessary. Surely, under such circumstances, reasonable men and women will look for guidance to those who have devoted their lives to their country's service in this particular field.

There is a surprising unanimity of opinion on this subject on the part of all those best qualified to speak. I need mention only General Pershing; the Chief of Staff, General Marshall; the joint Army and Navy committee which under the direction of Congress has for years studied the question of manpower; the Secretary of War; the Secretary of the Navy; and the Commander in Chief of our armed forces.

The opinion of these qualified experts is that 1 year of training is the absolute minimum. Fifteen or even eighteen months would be better, they are sure, but a passable job can be done in twelve.

As to the crucial matter of the number to be trained and organized into units these same military experts testify that at the earliest possible moment we should have a force of approximately 1,300,000 enlisted men. There may be those within the sound of my voice who are sure enough of their own opinion to assert that number to be too large or too small. I have found that those most ready to criticize and boldest in their expression of opinion are usually the least well-informed. For myself, I freely accept the figures presented with supporting evidence by those charged with responsibility. I have no doubt that the country will do likewise.

We proceed to analyze our situation. Here are the facts. The enlisted strength of the Regular Army is now, roughly, 280,000. The National Guard is to be mobilized, and this will account for 220,000 more under arms. That means a total of 500,000. Our problem, then, is to bring forth for training and organizing into units at the earliest possible date an additional 800,000 enlisted men. Keep that figure in mind. We must have quickly, if we are to have an adequate national defense, 800,000 additional trainees.

The bill now pending before the Senate proposes to do that by the selective compulsory process. It will require all male citizens, with very few exceptions, between the ages of 21 and 30, inclusive, to present themselves for registration. These 12,000,000 registrants will be classified according to physical fitness, their status with reference to dependents, their present importance in essential industries, and all other facts bearing upon the advisability of selecting the particular individual for a year's training, or, in the alternative, placing him in a deferred classification.

Out of class A–1 there will then be selected by lot the increment that will first be called to the colors. The process will be repeated as quickly as preparations can be made until the full number of 800,000 trainees will be organized into units for training purposes. An equitable allocation will be made to all sections of the country. Full credit will be given to each community for all volunteers, thereby reducing its quota to be selected. Rich man, poor man, proud and humble, the eager and the backward, all classes will share alike this liability to submit to training for the national defense.

There are two groups of opponents to this system of selective compulsory training. First are those who protest on principle such a program in time of peace. They admit that if an enemy were at our door, if war were actually declared, the draft would be justified. There is a fatal weakness in their argument. Not yet have they given a satisfactory guaranty that such an enemy as we may have to face would patiently wait without while we feverishly rushed through ap rogram to bring our men under arms and properly train them. They do not seem to realize the full significance of the statement that "service without training means slaughter and disaster."

More formidable is the second group of protestants. They do not object on principle to selective compulsory training in time of peace. If it can be shown to be necessary, they pledge their support. That is a fair requirement. I propose to meet it now fully and completely. This group has rallied behind the substitute offered by Senator MALONEY, of Connecticut, one of the ablest and most conscientious Members of the Senate. It is the contention that it has not been demonstrated that the volunteer system is inadequate. They urge, therefore, that all action for selective compulsory training be postponed at least until the 1st of January. If by a 30-cent-a-day raise in pay, a shortening of the enlistment period to 1 year, and an intensive recruiting drive the required number of trainees has not then been secured, they will be willing to give their support to the selective compulsory program.

I need not emphasize the frightful responsibility that must be assumed by those who would unnecessarily delay by many months the certain calling into training of the required number of our defenders.

Nor need I further detail the obvious fairness of the selective system, built as it is upon the solid premise that the duty of defending our free institutions rests not alone upon the eager patriot who is ready to make every sacrifice that he may be prepared to protect his country; it is an obligation that bears with equal weight upon every male citizen.

I proceed to the specific answer to the question that will determine whether we are to have an admittedly adequate program now or countenance months of delay. What reason is there to believe that if Congress should postpone the effective date for the application of the selective compulsory program there would come forward within the time required an additional 800,000 volunteers to submit themselves to a year's training? Consider this fact: During the year ending June 30, 1940, the net result of voluntary recruiting for the Regular Army was that its enlisted strength increased by 72,870 men, or at the rate of about 6,000 per month.

Make what allowance you will for the fact that during part of that period the rate of recruitment was restricted by limitations on appropriations and authorized strength; that beginning pay was $21 per month and 1-year enlistments were not encouraged; that the rate of enlistments has increased until the net gain for June was 16,177 and for July 23,234.

Here is the exact situation. To obtain the new men required within the time limits established by those who speak with the greatest knowledge and authority, the net increase in strength per month for the 7 months' period beginning September 1, and ending next April 1 would have to be, not the average of 6,000. Not even the great showing of 23,000. It would have to average 114,000 per month. As a matter of fact, since there would be many vacancies to be filled through the expirations of enlistments, withdrawals, and for other causes, the gross rate of enlistment must be not less than 130,000 per month. In other words, the net increase per month would have to be nearly 20 times as great as the average net increase per month during the last fiscal year, and more than five times as great as the high-water mark set in July.

The record of voluntary enlistments during the World War fully substantiates the folly of relying upon that system alone. We were then at war. A highly organized emotional recruiting drive was put on throughout the Nation. No one would wish to have that repeated today. Even with all the patriotic fervor that was developed, enlistments had fallen off by September to 24,367. As I have shown, we must have 5 times that number, not for 1 month, but for 7 consecutive months, in order to bring into training the manpower required for our national defense.

In conclusion, permit me to say that virtually every competent authority, including the Chief of Staff, testifies that the volunteer system is wholly inadequate to meet the problem with which the country is now faced. The pending bill does not disturb volunteer enlistments. They are made more attractive by specific reduction of the terms to 1 year. Under these circumstances let those who have been inclined to favor the Maloney amendment remember the solemn warning uttered by a great statesman: "Better to be despised for too anxious apprehensions than ruined by too confident a security."

We dare not gamble when the stakes are the security of our free institutions and the welfare of our Nation. There should go forth from the hearts of the people of this country tonight such a prayer and demand for prompt and thoroughgoing action in aid of the national defense that all doubts would be washed away.

Profits Above Patriotism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BENNETT CHAMP CLARK

OF MISSOURI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 21 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ARTICLE FROM THE NATION, AUGUST 17, 1940

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, in connection with the Lee amendment, consideration of which has been deferred by a point of order, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial from the current edition of The Nation, entitled, "Profits Above Patriotism."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From The Nation, August 17, 1940]

Although big business has not hesitated to conjure up the most extreme forms of nationalism in defense of the profit system, its own patriotism has been notoriously lukewarm. Britain has never been in greater peril, even in the days of Napoleon, yet its capitalists are intent on squeezing the last possible cent of profit out of its distress. Sir William Firth, recently ousted as chairman and managing director of the $100,000,000 Richard Thomas Steel Co., has brought to light a scandal in the English steel industry. At the annual stockholders' meeting he charged that the company had obtained a contract to supply steel shells at a price yielding the company the fantastic profit of $45 a ton. As a result of his protests the price was lowered to $20 a ton. This may explain why Sir William is no longer managing director. The economist demands an investigation of the financial battle by which the British Iron and Steel Federation obtained control of the Thomas company and now permits it to operate at only two-thirds of its huge capacity. The empire may founder, but British big business holds to its profit margin as if it were, we were about to say, a Maginot line.

The news from Britain makes it easier to understand the attitude of our own defense industries. Secretary Stimson's testimony that the Army has been able to sign contracts for only 33 of the 4,000 planes for which funds were appropriated in June confirms I. F. Stone's story on aviation's sit-down strike, of which we publish the first instalment in this issue. Secretary Stimson declared at a congressional tax hearing that the fault did not lie with the Army or with the Defense Advisory Commission and that "the representatives of the industry have been earnest" in their desire to cooperate. Like their British cousins, they seem "earnest" only in trying to make as enormous a profit as they can out of the defense emergency. The amortization question, as Mr. Stone shows, is not a life-and-death matter for industry, though delay may prove a life-and-death matter for the country. "In the last war," C. F. Hughes pointed out in the New York Times of August 11, "producers built their own plants and, except for a few final additions, these paid for themselves many times over." The determination of the plane and armorplate companies to take no risk whatever in a great national emergency is truly subversive, and we hope the Senate will take note of it and refuse to join the House in repealing the power granted the Secretary of the Navy on June 28 to commandeer the plants of the recalcitrants. Commandeering a plant will not make it produce without profit, but the mere threat should be enough to make it produce.

As serious as the sit-down strike in aviation and armor plate is the situation revealed by Assistant Attorney General Thurman Arnold. A grand jury in New York City has been investigating charges that German ownership of patents and international cartel arrangements between American and German firms have been throttling American capacity to produce essential war materials. This Federal jury is also looking into the transmission to foreign companies of American military secrets under these arrangements and the price restrictions and collusive bidding that grow out of them. Patents are a privilege accorded inventors by our Government, and there is no sound reason why this privilege should be extended to foreign concerns, even indirectly, at the expense of restricted production, delays, and higher prices on defense materials. The investigation is aimed particularly, according to Mr. Arnold, at industries engaged in the production of aircraft, naval equipment, electrical supplies, and metal alloys. The German corporations involved include the Krupp steel firm. In several of the industries manufacturing defense products the agreements provide for pooling of American and German patents in one international cartel.

The case of the Bausch & Lomb Optical Co., which came up earlier this year, provides an illustration of the situation. This company had an agreement with Carl Zeiss in Germany for the use of patents for special artillery range finders, and the agreement affected not only prices here but American ability to compete with German exports in other countries. Bausch & Lomb agreed not to sell outside the United States. In the case of ships built here for use abroad, the American company was to supply the range finder only with Zeiss permission and at a price agreed upon by the two firms. In case Bausch & Lomb was forced to bid on a contract moving outside the United States, it agreed to mark up its bid 20 percent and to remit the 20-percent overcharge to Zeiss if the contract was awarded Bausch & Lomb despite the mark-up. The American concern first pleaded not guilty and then nolo contendere to the indictments against it. A plea of nolo contendere is virtually an admission of the truth of the facts alleged.

Our guess is that pressure will be brought on the Department of Justice to call off this grand-jury probe, which is being conducted under the antitrust laws. The fate of the pending action against the oil industry is important in this connection. Special exemptions from the antitrust laws to meet specific defense needs may be necessary, but blanket exemptions are another matter. If the oil companies are powerful enough to have the suit against them called off on the plea of national defense, other companies will ask a similar privilege. Should that happen, we hope some congressional committee will investigate these cartel arrangements. It would be shocking if an inquiry into international trust practices endangering our national defense were halted on the specious plea that we must do nothing to "rock the boat."

In Opposition to War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BURTON K. WHEELER

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 21 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. BURTON K. WHEELER, OF MONTANA, AUGUST 20, 1940

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by me last evening over the Columbia Broadcasting System under the heading Let's Go to War Now—An Answer.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LET'S GO TO WAR NOW—AN ANSWER

Since the present war began we here in America have heard the phrase, "All aid to the Allies short of war." Many honest, sincere people apparently think that this Nation, while still professing neutrality, can race at breakneck speed to the edge of the precipice and then suddenly slam on the brake and expect it to hold.

I have said that there is no such thing as "short of war." It doesn't make any difference who argues for aid "short of war"; it doesn't lessen the danger whether Secretary Stimson, Ambassador Bullitt, or General Pershing urge "short of war."

"Short of war" means war. The phrase is a smoke screen for those who want our country involved in this war. This smoke screen has now been lifted. Speaking on this radio network on the evening of August 10 last, William H. Standley, a retired admiral, said—I quote:

"On June 10 last, I, with some 30 other American citizens, signed a statement urging that this country 'immediately declare that a state of war exists between this country and Germany.' "

I admire the frankness of Admiral Standley. He said publicly what those who are hiding behind that smoke screen of "short of war" are thinking but dare not say. I do not share Mr. Standley's views that we ought to go to war. I do not believe the American people want to go to war. The Columbia Broadcasting Co. has asked me to reply to Admiral Standley, and I intend to do just that. But the American people will make the most effective reply. That is, they will if they have a chance.

The issue in America is not England or Germany. The issue is the preservation of our way of life here in America, and I submit that the last war proved that you cannot save democracy on the battlefields of Europe.

The United States was a small, weak confederation of poor States when it gained its freedom from the most powerful autocratic nation in the world. Since then—for a century and a half—we have protected ourselves and maintained the Monroe Doctrine without the help of any European navy. Since when has the British Navy been called upon to protect our shores from attack? When was it that a European power helped us preserve freedom and democracy here in America?

Gen. Hugh Johnson, commenting on this situation, points out how absurd is the position of those who insist we should give one-seventh of our destroyers to Britain.

We are told, says General Johnson, that the British Navy is our first line of defense and in the next breath that the British Navy can't live without the help of our destroyers. Then we are told that these destroyers are obsolete and worthless to America and therefore we should get rid of them. But then we hear these vessels are indispensable to the British and therefore we must send them. What sort of involved circular reasoning is this? Warships are warships, and if the British can use them so can we.

I am for defense of America; giving away our fleet tears down our defense.

It is well to remember the cold, hard, practical facts when somebody talks about our first line of defense being the British Navy. Our first line of defense is our own Navy and the expanse of ocean that separates us from Europe and Asia. After all men have swum the English Channel but nobody has tried to swim the Atlantic Ocean. Do you know that there are scarcely enough ships in the world to transport an army equipped to successfully invade this hemisphere.

Who are these people who so enthusiastically demand that this last great democracy be plunged into war? Let us see who it is that shouts, "Let's go to war now"; let us see what motivates this subversive un-American chant; let us see if it will be they who will risk their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor on the field of battle. Remember, it takes neither moral nor physical courage to declare a war for others to fight.

I quoted Admiral Standley a moment ago that 30 men and women met with him in New York—they always meet in New York—on June 10 and issued a statement which declared that the American way of life was threatened by the defeat of France and England. They urged that this country immediately declare war on Germany—and called on all citizens who agreed with them to petition the Government for a declaration of war.

Who were some of these 30 whom the press headlined as "notables"? Why, let us see: A 43-year-old author and newspaper editor who spent 5 years in London—he wouldn't be a conscript; a 51-year-old writer who has been a London correspondent and whose home even now is in England—he wouldn't have to serve in the American Army; a 41-year-old college president who was educated in England as a Rhodes scholar—he, too, wouldn't be doing any fighting and dying in this war he urges upon America; a 62-year-old New York lawyer of great wealth and with important clients—do you think he will shed any blood overseas when the war comes?—a 73-year-old economist whose services in the last war consisted of sitting at a desk in Washington—the draft won't touch him.

But why go on?—economists, social workers, writers, lawyers, college presidents, retired military men—these are the "notables" who boldly urge the American people to go to war. None of them has yet enlisted in this great cause.

Two months have gone by since their call, but there has been a noticeable absence of petitions from the American people demanding a declaration of war. So the retired admiral, puzzled at this lack of enthusiasm for war, took to the radio with a more fervent appeal. "Come," said the admiral gaily, "come to war. It's our war; we're already in it by the steps we have taken. Why stop now? Let's make an open declaration of war."

But the admiral and his 30 fellow notables overlooked one important thing—American enthusiasm for war was cooled by the memory of the last war, by the memory of the $40,000,000,000, back-crushing debt that it piled on them, by the memory of the bones and blood of 126,000 American boys left rotting in France, by the memory of 234,000 other American boys gassed, shell-shocked, and shot who to this day lie in narrow cots in hospitals that dot their land. No, Admiral, Americans learned a lesson. You can fool them once but not twice with the same old slogans.

Some of you well-meaning people are being hoodwinked by paid propaganda over the radio—by columnists, by blatant full-page advertisements; that to save democracy in America we must again enter this war and do it now.

You people ought to be wary of these fine phrases and fancy catchwords. Don't they have a familiar ring? Is it so hard to remember 1916 and 1917? Have you forgotten that then, too, Great Britain and the United States were sister democracies, that the Allies were fighting the battle of democracy against autocracy, that the submarine warfare meant we were in danger of German invasion, that we had to get into the war in self-defense, that if Germany won, our Monroe Doctrine would be violated? * * * Turn back to the newspapers of those days; judge for yourself.

Know this, the same newspapers, the very same newspapers, which the British in their official documents regarded as pro-Ally, are the newspapers which today are leading the fight to make this war our war.

Have you seen the advertisements of the Committee to Save America by Helping the Allies? Well, remember the men behind it are the ones who all but wrecked America up to 1929.

You Americans to whom Standley appealed—you citizens who are soon going to do the fighting and the dying, if men like the retired admiral have their way; you fathers and mothers who have sons to give in this cause; you young men whose blood and bones may soon fertilize more of Europe's acres; you Americans against whom the cards are being stacked—hear me; hear me while there still is time.

If it is war you people want, then at least go into it with your eyes open. If it is war that you want, then listen to the Pershings and the Bullitts and the Standleys. If it is war that you want, then think now—not afterward—of the death and the destruction, of the poverty and the misery that war brings. Realize now that war means the end of our democracy.

Do not let yourselves forget that war means dictatorship and the end of civil rights; that war means the end of all liberty for all time, in your generation and for generations to come. Forget, if you can, that your children and your children's children will curse you for your folly.

If, knowing these things, you still want war, then you ought to go to war now.

Delay in National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 21 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ARTICLE FROM NEW YORK TIMES, AUGUST 21, 1940

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, on the general question of congressional responsibility for any slow-down in the national-defense program, I offer for the RECORD the very able and significant article by Mr. Arthur Krock in the New York Times of this morning, and ask that it be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times of August 21, 1940]

IN THE NATION—A HALT TO DEFENSE WHICH COULD QUICKLY BE REMOVED

WASHINGTON, August 20.—Congressional and Treasury staff experts, working for the House Committee on Ways and Means, are still toiling over a draft of that tax bill which is indispensable to a real start on the defense program. The draft, it was said today, may be ready "Thursday or Friday," and possibly "next week some time" the legislation may emerge from the committee.

So Congress is fiddling once more while Rome burns, the reader may remark, especially if he has been influenced by the administration's attempt, most recently aided by Ambassador Bullitt, to blame all defense program delays on Congress. But if the reader makes such a remark to himself or publicly, he will, in this instance, as in many others, be ascribing to Congress guilt which fairly can be laid at the door of the President and his executive departments. For the continued postponement of action in this vital matter is simply the result of the President's insistence that an excess-profits tax must accompany changes in industrial depreciation allowances and the abolition of certain New Deal gross-earnings restrictions which have recently been imposed.

The tax and drafting experts, laboring long hours and making as swift progress as any men could, are having all their difficulties with the excess-profits section. This has proved to be as complicated as informed persons assured the administration it would be when the President suddenly demanded that it must be a part of the amortization bill. The committee hearings continued to disclose new perplexities, and more have arisen as the experts bent to their task.

The result has been to hold up for weeks action on the depreciation and earnings schedules which could have been written and passed long ago. Reliable observers of Congress have estimated that a joint resolution containing these essential changes could have been passed by both branches in 24 hours any time this summer. Since the lack of this legislation is holding up the defense production program at most points, and there is no need for haste in working out excess-profits schedules which necessarily will not apply until next year, the responsibility of the administration for this delay is as direct as it is grave.

The President has taken the position in conferences with congressional leaders that there must be excess-profits legislation at this session, and the only sure way to get it is to link it with the tax-relief items. Even those who question the wisdom or effectiveness of excess-profits taxes as the New Deal will write them—once again mixing social-economic reform with good Federal housekeeping—should find it simple to understand the President's insistence on these levies. From his standpoint and the color of his administrative record, it would be inconsistent in him to do otherwise.

But he has been told, and the best opinion in Congress supports it, that he need have no fear Congress will adjourn this session without passing excess-profits levies. The inexorable rules of the political game make it certain. To pass a bill for compulsory selective military service, as is the prospect even if its inauguration is deferred until there has been a new trial of the volunteer method, and then go home without "conscripting war profits" is something this Congress will never do.

Every Member of it who voted for the one and let the other slide would consider he had invited his own defeat at the polls. As voice after voice against the selective service bill asks why men are to be conscripted and not higher business earnings, the working of this political rule becomes more inevitable.

But the President and his executive New Deal advisers nevertheless have forbidden the separation of the items of tax legislation. The consequence is increasingly damaging delay in preparedness brought on by the very administration which keeps saying that "time is of the essence." It is the result of tactics on the part of the very administration which approved the wish of Mr. Bullitt and others to call publicly for the haste they sincerely believe to be requisite to national security.

This is merely another illustration of the halts between formulating major policy and taking the steps necessary to execute it which have steadily occurred since Mr. Roosevelt came to office. Much more frequently than not an essential move has been impeded by politics or conflict of method, and the whole present condition of national defense is only one of the consequences. This time, however, a deliberate attempt has been made to convince the public that Congress is responsible for what the record plainly shows is the fault of the administration itself.

Its supporters, while demanding that the depreciation-allowance changes and gross-earnings limits wait on the excess-profits bill, are not even united on the former. Many of them continue to refer to it as "industrial blackmail," to insist that what businessmen have sought solely to keep ruin from overtaking them if they go into defense production is an effort to make unjustified sums of money through war profiteering. The flaw in the present Government's handling of defense is basic. The immediate instance is typical.

Hitler's Power on the Seas

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 21 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ARTICLE ENTITLED "HITLER MAY CONQUER ON LAND BUT HE NEVER WILL ON THE SEAS"

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an article entitled "Hitler May Conquer on Land But He Never Will on the Seas," which article is one of a series published daily in the columns of the Washington, D. C. Times-Herald under the heading "The News."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The one great thing which Winston Churchill has done as Premier of England was his capture of the French Fleet.

This he did, of course, with the greatest reluctance, but with full realization of the necessity of such action.

The French Fleet was about two-thirds the English Fleet in power and tonnage.

And if it had been added to the German Fleet, the English Fleet would have been equaled if not surpassed in strength and the invasion of England made a certainty.

To be sure, the Germans had pledged themselves not to make use of the French Fleet, but such pledges are not to be relied upon in war.

Had not France sacredly pledged itself to England not to desert its alliance under any circumstances, but to fight to the point of utter destruction rather than yield?

Still when Paris was occupied, had not France surrendered abjectly?

France might have carried on a vigorous defensive warfare for months, which would have kept the Germans busy in Europe and delayed the attack on England long enough to give England ample time for defensive preparation.

She could have transferred her naval fleet to England in its entirety and her air fleet also, and thus have made the ultimate success of Germany impossible.

This would have meant severe punishment for France, but it would have been the strategic thing to do if the ultimate winning of the war had been the sole objective.

But France had not the stamina, not the intestinal fortitude, to fight to the bitter end.

She had not the heart to see "La Belle France" laid waste.

She chose to see her liberty destroyed rather than her property and her beauty.

The protective pact that she had lured England into was a protective pact for France only—not for England.

That should have been obvious to English statesmen from the beginning, and would have been conspicuously plain to anyone except the unseeing Baldwin and his purblind associates and successors.

Chamberlain realized the insecurity of such a league but had not the spinal strength to oppose it.

There were many strong men in England who, like Rothermere, felt the instability of the French alliance; but the attitude of England's radical Labor Party, which supported an alliance with Communist France and Bolshevist Russia, was probably a determining factor in the situation.

However, England had nothing to offer Russia except naval and military support, while Germany had the division of conquered territory to feed to the great bear's greedy maw.

Moreover, to be perfectly frank and accurate, England's pledges of support to Poland and Finland had never materialized, not even to the extent of one armored plane.

England's support to Norway had failed at the critical moment, and even England's support to Belgium will be seen to have altered to moves and measures for self-preservation merely, if ever American people shall be allowed to learn the content of King Leopold's letter to them, which President Roosevelt has arbitrarily and arrogantly suppressed.

So Russia counted not on vain promises but chose the plain material gain.

She took the cash and let the credit go.

This attitude and action should have been foreseen by intelligent English statesmen.

Even American diplomats, who are for the most part "saps" and innocents, knew enough to keep clear of the French protective pact, although they do not apparently know enough not to trust Russia.

There once was an Armenian gentleman who put his little son on the mantelpiece and, holding out his arms, said to the boy, "Now, Amyntas, jump."

So Amyntas jumped, and the papa let him tumble to the floor, saying:

"That will teach you, son, not to trust anybody."

And the papa was right.

At least in wartime do not trust anybody.

Every nation is looking out primarily for itself and the country which counts on the spiritual sympathy and loyalty of another is likely to find its confidence misplaced and to land painfully but informatively on the hard floor of material fact.

The United States must not be too trustful anywhere or regarding anything.

It certainly cannot depend on Russia, which has broken every promise it ever made to anybody.

It cannot depend on the bought cooperation of the South American countries.

It cannot depend entirely on the assurances of England.

But it can appreciate the plain fact that the acquisition of the French Fleet by England did diminish to great degree, and indeed did probably entirely dissipate any danger of invasion of this hemisphere by any European powers.

Not Germany, nor Italy, nor Russia, nor Japan, nor all of them together would now have anything adequate to invade the Americas with.

Even if by some improbable chance England should be overrun, the English Fleet would be transferred to Canada, and, combined with the United States Fleet, acting either independently or in cooperation, would be amply able to defend the Western Hemisphere.

America need not be overtrustful in any direction, but it can intelligently make a shrewd estimate of the advantage to itself in Winston Churchill's acquisition of the French Navy.

Hitler may conquer on land but he will never now conquer on the seas.

No lemmings can swim the Atlantic or Pacific Oceans, and no lemmings, no matter how venturesome, will ever try.

Let us make our defense in air as strong as our defense at sea, and we can rest in certain security.

"Orson Welles" Bullitt

OF

HON. BENNETT CHAMP CLARK

OF MISSOURI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 21 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

EDITORIAL ON AMBASSADOR BULLITT FROM ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD a very brilliant leading editorial appearing in Monday's St. Louis Post-Dispatch, entitled " 'Orson Welles' Bullitt."

I should like to read just a paragraph or two from the editorial in the hope of inducing the Members of the Senate to read the whole editorial.

The editorial goes on, in the latter part:

Of course, the fact is that Mr. Bullitt, as his record and previous statements make clear, is a prointerventionist. He is one of those who thinks we should get into the European war, and this is evident from his recommendation that we sell destroyers to England immediately. That this proposition would be an act of war should be known to Mr. Bullitt, and probably is known.

If not, we refer him to the recent address of Senator DAVID I. WALSH, of the Senate Naval Committee, in which he said:

The transfer of naval destroyers from our flag to the British flag, no matter by what method or device, makes mockery of our declared policy of neutrality and nonintervention. It is an act of belligerency and of war. Who, desiring to keep out of war, can deny that fact?

What are the standards which should govern the behavior and the public statements of our diplomats? For making a pro-Ally speech, James H. R. Cromwell, former Minister to Canada, was soundly rebuked by Secretary Hull. For saying that America should feed the starving people of German-occupied Belgium, Ambassador Cudahy was recalled to Washington and publicly scolded by Under Secretary Sumner Welles.

I may say, in interjection, that that apparently was before it was remembered that Mr. Cudahy was the uncle-in-law of Secretary Ickes; and when that fact was remembered the reprimand apparently was withdrawn.

The Post-Dispatch editorial goes on:

For, in effect, advocating the entrance of the United States into the European war, what will happen to Mr. Roosevelt's fair-haired boy, William C. Bullitt? He will probably be given a medal.

This great and powerful and intelligent Nation does not need the outpourings of the administration's boy scouts, of which Mr. Bullitt is the most notable and most juvenile example, to remind it in frenzied terms that the world is in flames. What it needs is strong, quiet administration of the colossal defense program voted by Congress. What it needs is something of the same indomitable spirit that infused the hearts of Americans when they fought the Revolutionary War, when they fought the War between the States, when they conquered the wilderness of the West. Those things were not done by radio oratory.

I ask unanimous consent that the entire editorial may be inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ORSON WELLES—BULLITT

Mr. Bullitt, the brilliant and erratic Ambassador to France, made a radio speech yesterday in the manner of Orson Welles announcing the arrival of Martian hordes in New Jersey. One of our great national heroes is Paul Revere, who roused the sleeping farmers of Middlesex on April 18, 1875, to repel the British invasion. The only excuse, however, for a speech like Mr. Bullitt's is that the American people are sound asleep; that they are deaf, dumb, and blind to the events in Europe.

Mr. Bullitt has been abroad for some years and perhaps can be excused for not being aware of the temper and alertness of the country. From the potato farmers of Maine to the sandy wastes of Arizona, the tidings have long ago gone forth that Adolf Hitler is a menace to the United States, so that Mr. Bullitt's excited beating of the tom-tom does not exactly come under the head of news.

Since when have the American people become so stupid, so lethargic, so unspeakably insensible to what is going on in the world that they must be talked to like a lot of kindergarten children, as Mr. Bullitt did yesterday? Perhaps the Ambassador has been so concerned with Europe that he does not know this is not the case.

While Mr. Bullitt was still in Europe this country, through its elected representatives, has been acting fast and decisively to protect itself. At the instance of the President, Congress has appropriated ten billions for defense with hardly a dissenting vote. Our factories, arsenals, and shipyards are being tuned up to the greatest preparedness drive in history. A plan for conscription of our manhood—the first peacetime move of the kind in our history—is in the making. On every front we are moving with the utmost speed to protect our shores from any danger that may confront us.

What we need now is calm, cool direction of this great national effort. In the years that our possible adversary, Hitler, was rearming, he did not try to frighten the German people out of their wits. He put them to work. But the effect of speeches like Mr. Bullitt's is to create an unwholesome fear psychosis; it is to produce the condition vulgarly known as "jitters." Is this the mental attitude desirable for a great defense effort?

Decidely not. Of course, the fact is that Mr. Bullitt, as his record and previous statements make clear, is a pro-interventionist. He is one of those who thinks we should get into the European war, and this is evident from his recommendation that we sell destroyers to England immediately. That this proposition would be an act of war should be known to Mr. Bullitt and probably is known.

If not, we refer him to the recent address of Senator DAVID I. WALSH of the Senate Naval Committee, in which he said:

"The transfer of naval destroyers from our flag to the British flag, no matter by what method or device, makes mockery of our declared policy of neutrality and nonintervention. It is an act of belligerency and of war. Who, desiring to keep out of war, can deny that fact?"

The Third Term

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. STYLES BRIDGES

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 21 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

NEWSPAPER ARTICLES

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD several newspaper articles on the third term. The first is from the New York Herald Tribune of Monday, April 4, 1938; the second from the Indianapolis Sunday Star of June 12, 1938; and the third is from the Indianapolis Sunday Star of May 1, 1938.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Herald Tribune of April 4, 1938]

FOUR BISHOPS JOIN IN OPPOSITION TO A THIRD TERM—DR. JONES, HEAD OF COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, ALSO VOICES DISFAVOR; PEOPLE OF UNITED STATES BELIEVED AGAINST IDEA

WASHINGTON, April 3.—Nine more church leaders, including Edgar DeWitt Jones, president of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, and four bishops of the Methodist and Protestant Episcopal Churches recorded themselves in a poll today as opposing a third term either for President Roosevelt or for any President.

Twenty-five clergymen, counting 16 announced a week ago, have taken this position. Joseph Leib, Washington political statistician, who sent out some 80 letters on the question to prominent churchmen all over the country, reports that not one answer has backed Mr. Roosevelt for another term. A few suggested that a war emergency might change the situation or that if Mr. Roosevelt chose to run again his patronage powers might bring him success.

POPULAR OPPOSITION SEEN

The replies follow:

Dr. Jones, minister of the Central Woodward Christian Church of Detroit and president of the Federal Council of Churches: "I cannot imagine the American people standing for a third term for any President of the United States unless a national emergency, coupled with general confidence in the President, should warrant the breaking of the precedent."

Ralph S. Cushman, Methodist Episcopal Bishop, Denver: "It looks to me that, if those who have received patronage from the Roosevelt administration should prove strong enough to threaten us with a third term there would, I believe, develop in this country such a reaction as Mr. Roosevelt and his supporters would not wish to experience."

E. G. Richardson, Methodist Episcopal Bishop, Philadelphia: "Entirely regardless of personalities, I am opposed to a third term for our President. You ask me whether I think that Mr. Roosevelt could be elected for a third term. This question, in my opinion, cannot be answered today. A year ago I would have answered it affirmatively. Today I am doubtful. A couple of years from now the situation may be entirely changed."

W. Bertrand Stevens, Episcopal Bishop, of Los Angeles: "My impression is that most of my acquaintances are not favorably disposed toward a third term though almost without exception they say that if the President runs they think he will be elected, though they themselves will not vote for him. My own feeling is that it would be unfortunate if Mr. Roosevelt were to be a candidate."

G. Bromley Oxnam, Methodist Episcopal Bishop, of Omaha: "You will recall that Theodore Roosevelt ran for office; and if he had been elected, in effect, that would have been a third term. Millions of people were willing to vote for him. My recollection is that large numbers would have supported Mr. Coolidge had he thought in terms of a third term. From all I can learn simply by listening to conversations and expressions of opinion, a very large percentage of American people would be willing to see President Franklin D. Roosevelt in office for a third term. However, there is a general feeling, I think, that two terms represent a tradition that is wise to keep."

AGAINST "AMERICAN SPIRIT"

Dr. William Hiram Foulkes, of Newark, N. J., moderator of the Presbyterian Church in the United States: "So far as I am personally concerned I deprecate and almost deplore a third term for any President on the ground that it contravenes our essential American spirit."

W. B. Riley, president of the First Baptist Church, Minneapolis: "The American people did not support Roosevelt for a second term; I hardly think they will for a third. The Government dependents, however, are the balance of power, and I think they would support him for any number of terms."

D. T. Gregory, of Dayton, Ohio, executive secretary of the Church of the United Brethren in Christ: "My own conviction is that the American people do not look with favor upon a third term for any President of the United States."

Luther Wesley Smith, of the First Baptist Church of Syracuse, member of the board of managers of the Northern Baptist Convention: "In my judgment no one can tell yet whether the American people would support President Roosevelt for a third term or not. Popular as he is, I do not believe that they would do so, for I do not believe that they would support any man for a third term except in the most extreme emergency. Whether the actual outbreak of war would provide that emergency is not at all clear in my mind. Personally I think it is unwise for any President to run for a third term under any consideration."

BOTH DEMOCRATIC, NEW DEAL EDITORS OF COTTON BELT OPPOSE THIRD TERM

(By Everett C. Watkins)

WASHINGTON, June 11.—Neither the new dealers nor the regular Democrats of the South want President Roosevelt for a third term, judging by the expression of the newspaper editors of several Cotton Belt States.

Comment from editors in several Southern States was obtained by Joseph H. Leib, political statistician in Washington, formerly of South Bend, Ind. Mr. Leib has attracted much attention here with his collection of opinions on many subjects through correspondence with the country's keymen in various activities.

"Both of the Charleston newspapers have been against the President's policies since the passage of the N. R. A. in 1933. We never flew the Blue Eagle or had anything to do with it," wrote Robert S. Manigault, publisher of the Charleston (S. C.) News-Courier. "But I have sense enough to know that our position makes no difference to the administration and will influence only a few South Carolinians as the State is thoroughly bought."

WANTS NO THIRD TERM

T. M. Hederman, editor of the Clarion-Ledger, Jackson, Miss., 100 percent pro-Roosevelt, is strongly against a third term, "regardless of who he might be."

"I think that President Roosevelt saved the country. Not a one of his critics or his opponents would be willing to go back to the conditions that existed when he became President," wrote Editor Hederman. "Great progress has been made. However, I would not favor a third term for the President of the United States, regardless of who he might be."

The Dallas (Tex.) Journal will determine its policy when and if it has to cross the third-term bridge.

"The conditions under which Mr. Roosevelt might seek a third term cannot be studied at this moment, and the quality, character, and form of the opposition are unknown. So it is for the future to decide what course we would take," wrote W. B. Ruggles, associate editor of this Texas newspaper.

SAYS NOTION INCREDIBLE

Curtis B. Johnson, publisher of the Charlotte (N. C.) Observer, said there are so many reasons why no man should serve a third term that he cannot believe President Roosevelt would entertain such a notion.

"It is my opinion," said the North Carolina publisher, "that President Roosevelt will not announce for a third term, nor do I believe he would be willing to accept one unless the situation became so extraordinary that, in his judgment, he would feel that as a civic obligation he would have to offer himself again. The Charlotte Observer would not be friendly toward the idea of his seeking to extend his term of office for another 4 years. Such action on his part would at least violate the unwritten law that no American President should serve more than two terms. To my mind there are so many reasons why such a thing is undesirable and fraught with danger, and since they all seem so obvious, I think it unnecessary to detail them."

"We would militantly oppose a third term for President Roosevelt or any other President, Republican or Democratic," wrote Fred B. Wachs, general manager of the Lexington (Ky.) Herald-Leader.

REFUSES TO GIVE OPINION

John D. Wise, publisher of the Richmond (Va.) Times-Dispatch, preferred to refrain from expression of his third-term views "because I do not believe President Roosevelt expects to seek a third term."

Clark Howell, publisher of the Atlanta Constitution, nationally known Democratic journal of Georgia, considered that only President Roosevelt himself knows his political plans for the future. However, the editor's inclination was to stand by the time-honored tradition that no President shall perpetuate himself in office—that two terms should be the limit.

"I do not think there is any living man—save possibly one—who can say whether President Roosevelt will run for a third term," Howell wrote to Leib. "My inclination is to support the time-honored custom which precludes a President succeeding himself for a third term. Conditions are so changing, however, that I cannot now say whether or not we would support President Roosevelt for a third term."

OKLAHOMAN COMMENTS

E. K. Gaylor, general manager of the Daily Oklahoman, of Oklahoma City, Okla., considers that the depression in the midst of the New Deal second term precludes any possibility of the people desiring a Roosevelt third term. This Democratic editor of the Southwest believes that President Roosevelt's prestige is decreasing so rapidly that there is little possibility of his being renominated and elected. Indeed, he considers that Roosevelt, if the depression continues, will be so weak politically that he won't even be able to dictate who the next party nominee shall be. He believes that a Democratic President will succeed Roosevelt, but that he will be a real Democrat rather than a new dealer who continually snipes at business.

OPPOSITION VINDICATED

The Oklahoman was a Roosevelt supporter in 1932, but advised against him in the 1936 campaign. In view of developments it considers that its opposition to Roosevelt even for a second term has been well vindicated. Gaylord wrote:

"I have been under the impression that a year ago the President was rather eager to seek a third term, but since the advent of the disastrous Roosevelt depression his hopes along that line have been greatly weakened. There unquestionably has been a great doubt in his mind as to whether or not it would be possible for him to receive the third nomination and follow it with a successful campaign.

"I doubt very much the possibility of his obtaining the nomination for a third term; if he should obtain such a nomination it is entirely too early to forecast whether he could be elected. If the depression continues another year he could neither obtain nomination nor be reelected.

"CAN'T RESTORE PROSPERITY

"I do not believe there is any legerdemain by which he can restore prosperity. Private capital is idle and will remain idle so long as it is frightened every week or two by threats from the White House. The Government is not in position to spend enough public money to offset the private capital which is idle and which would be employed if confidence were restored.

"It is my view that President Roosevelt will not be renominated; indeed, there is even grave doubt now that he would be able to name his successor as the Democratic candidate. It is likely the Democratic Party will remain in power, although its candidate for the Presidency may not be as enthusiastic for the New Deal as the present incumbent of the White House. We would not think of supporting him for a third term."

So it would appear that both partisans and opponents of the New Deal in the Democratic South are against any President, no matter the man or his party, serving 12 years.

[From the Indianapolis Sunday Star of May 1, 1938]

FARMER OPPOSED TO THIRD TERM—ROOSEVELT STRENGTH IN CITY AND NEW DEAL PLEASES C. I. O. MORE THAN A. F. OF L.

WASHINGTON, April 30.—Farmers are less interested in the Roosevelt New Deal than are representatives of organized labor.

There are no farm leaders who want Roosevelt for a third term; there are several labor leaders, though they are divided on the subject, who would be willing to cast aside the anti-third-term tradition.

Both farmers and labor consider that business would be given a better chance to function and provide employment with a revision of taxes.

The farmer especially appreciates that agriculture has a better chance to succeed if business is less hampered. Some of the farm leaders are completely hostile to the New Deal. It is apparent that President Roosevelt's strength is in the city, not on the farm. The farmer is too conservative to have confidence in the New Deal with its radical tendencies.

C. I. O. LIKES NEW DEAL

Members of the C. I. O., the John L. Lewis labor organization, are much more friendly to the Roosevelt New Deal than are those affiliated with the American Federation of Labor.

These views are indicated in letters received from farm and labor leaders by Joseph Leib, native of South Bend, Ind., who is here as the "inquiring reporter" with offices in the Claridge Hotel.

Joseph Vesecky, president of the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union of America, a farm organization with headquarters at Salina, Kans., wrote: "I am not only opposed to President Roosevelt for a third term but to any President having a third term."

D. M. Hildebrand, of Seward, Nebr., president of the United States Live Stock Association, places responsibility for "our present condition" squarely on New Deal policies, "unsound and unworkable."

"Farmers are beginning to realize more and more that reciprocal-trade agreements, made through power delegated to the President, merely sell the farmer 'down the river,'" writes this Nebraska farm leader. "In my judgment it is a matter of fear as to what will happen next that retards investment in business.

CITES UNITED STATES ATTITUDE

"The President, rather than keep things unsettled, should assure business that the Government will cooperate with it and help business to go forward, that the workingman may have a chance to get on a pay roll. I firmly believe that had the New Deal administration taken a firm stand to protect property (stop seizure of property in sit-down strikes) and insisted that radical labor recognize property rights, we would not have seen the slump that has taken place in the past year. I am fearful the A. A. A., in the long run, will prove a handicap to agriculture. Benefits will not take care of the net loss our farmers must suffer if they comply with the law as it is now written."

A Blissfield, Mich., farm leader, E. A. Beamer, president of the National Live Stock Marketing Association, thinks there is "danger" of a Roosevelt third term "if the administration keeps enough voters on the taxpayers' pay roll, through the W. P. A., P. W. A., and other spending agencies, until 1940." He considers that business is harmed through excessive taxes, and that labor disturbances, experimental projects, and lack of a definite, permanent administration policy contribute greatly to the present depression. He expresses hope that Congress will assert its constitutional power and put a halt on experiments that go wrong and cause harmful uncertainties.

OFFERS 90-YEAR-OLD BOOK

"Charles L. Hall, Madison, Wis., president of the National Dairy Association, recommends that citizens read Six Centuries of Work and Wages, a book written nearly 90 years ago.

"It is time to stop all experiments with economics. I recommend the reading of Six Centuries of Work and Wages, written about 1850. Reading this will cause citizens to realize that most of the experiments now carried on were tried and with bad results hundreds of years ago," wrote the Wisconsin dairy leader. "When Roosevelt was first elected, I was in favor of trying most anything, provided experiments were paid for by taxes as we went along rather than by sinking us into a debt that no one generation can pay. I am not for the A. A. A. restrictions-on-production program. I am speaking for myself, not attempting to voice the association's views. I think right now that Roosevelt could be reelected only because no one else appears to have a program. Republicans and many Democrats seem to be just 'agin' Roosevelt, but are at sea about what to do."

DAN CASEMENT AROUSED

Dan D. Casement, Manhattan, Kans., president of the Farmers Independent Council of America, well known in his State as a breeder of cattle, sheep, and hogs, wallops the Roosevelt administration as follows:

"The only way to get out of the slump is to encourage production by removing the heavy hand of government from business, by recognizing frankly that democracy cannot exist except as its citizens are permitted to function freely in a competitive economy. But we have gone so far on the wrong road now that I think it would be impossible to reverse directions. Responsibility for the present condition I place on the refusal of the administration to admit the authority of the eternal verities and on the futile efforts the New Deal has made to repeal the fundamental laws founded in those inexorable truths. As to a third term for Roosevelt, I think the country will be in political chaos before 1940 rolls around. So long as Congressmen indorse such a fool proposal as Roosevelt made over the radio on April 14 (pump priming), patriotism is dead and America will soon stink. To h—— with the whole kit and kaboodle of them."

LABOR BACKING SLIPS

On the other hand, a labor leader, Harold G. Crose, secretary of the Utah Federation of Labor, wrote as follows:

"The C. I. O. members of organized labor are still strong for Roosevelt. However, he is losing favor and probably would not, on present conditions, at least, have the support of a majority of the people of the State for a third term."

Albert J. Maag, president of the South Dakota State Federation of Labor, thinks that the "people of South Dakota are still with Roosevelt and would support him if he should ask for a third term."

T. R. Cuthbert, secretary of the Tennessee Federation of Labor, thinks it would help business, and labor wants business revival, with a revision of the undistributed-profits and capital-gains tax. Roosevelt, he thinks, would carry Tennessee should he seek a third term.

ARTICLE BY JAY FRANKLIN

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, I ask leave to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very brilliant article in connection with Mr. Bullitt's speech. It appears in the column of Jay Franklin in today's issue of the Evening Star, Washington, D. C.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Star of August 21, 1940]

WE THE PEOPLE—BULLITT'S SPEECH IS PRAISED AS MESSAGE OF TRUTH TO SET AMERICA FREE

[By Jay Franklin]

At long last, after weeks of indecision and silence, a brave man has spoken out to America. He has brushed aside the niceties and evasions with which diplomats and politicians veil the ugly facts. He has spoken from the heart in words that have the best of poetry and in phrases which rang like the Liberty Bell.

Set it down that it was not President Roosevelt who gave the country this message of urgency and action. The President was busy implementing the new leadership of the Nation by establishing the new Canadian-American Axis.

Set it down also that it was not Wendell Willkie who made the bravest political utterance in recent American history. Mr. Willkie spoke at Elwood, but his acceptance speech was lacking in that straightforward, downright tone his earlier utterances had foreshadowed. For his action in supporting the President on selective service, aid to Britain, and racial intolerancy, the Nation owes Willkie respect and gratitude, but for the rest of it, his Elwood speech was dished up in a way which showed the thumbprints on the political tureen of the many cooks who had had a hand in the broth. Like any other political candidate, Mr. Willkie is being pulled and hauled by powerful interests inside his own party.

WILLKIE COULD HAVE TAKEN ISSUE

No, the man who spoke the words America has been waiting for was Bill Bullitt, our Ambassador to France, speaking from the steps of Independence Hall in Philadelphia. If Wendell Willkie had spoken with equal boldness and feeling, he would have taken the defense issue away from Roosevelt and made himself, rather than F. D. R., America's Winston Churchill. If Roosevelt had uttered the words that Bill Bullitt used on Sunday, August 18, the President would have regained at a single bound all of his inherent powers of leadership in this crisis.

At last, however, someone has mustered the courage to sing bass, to name names, talk sense, and tell the country the truth.

What is that truth? It is that many of us are, often with the best will in the world, playing Hitler's game; that America is directly threatened by the Nazi "blitzkrieg" if England falls; that Hitler cannot stop until someone stops him; that we must let England have the destroyers she needs to hold the Channel; that we must adopt compulsory national service if we are to get ready to defend ourselves; that we cannot rely on the Atlantic Ocean for defense; that France fell because it was riddled with treachery and bemused by windy emotionalists who sowed the wind of selfishness masquerading as individual liberty and reaped the whirlwind of defeat and disaster.

These were the words which should have been spoken over 2 months ago, before France fell. This is the message which should have been delivered weeks before the battle of England. This is the truth which alone can set America free from the web of delusion, selfishness, and defeatism which many of our public men have woven in a petty effort to coin public ignorance and prejudice into votes.

TIME FOR TALK IS PAST

The time for talk has long since passed. The time to act is now. It is far, far later than we have been taught to think, and the long hand of fate's clock is brushing the 12 on the dial.

My hat is off to Bill Bullitt, of Philadelphia, for what he did in daring to stand up and tell America the truth. From now on, readers of my column are warned that I shall judge all men, all utterances, all parties, and all actions with sole reference to the question of how they affect national unity, social solidarity, and American defense.

For this reason this column selects the Bullitt speech as the speech of the month and the President's Canadian axis as the act of the year. Why have we been made to wait so long when the danger is so urgent and the facts so plain?

ARTICLE ISSUED BY THE IMPERIAL FASCIST UNION OF LONDON, ENGLAND

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my own remarks in the RECORD, I include an article issued by the Imperial Fascist Union, of London, England.

I shall not comment on this article except to say that the reference to Masonry, no doubt, refers to the Grand Orient Masonry and not to the English-American Masons as we know them in the United States.

INTRODUCTION

THE BASIC FACTOR IN POLITICS IS RACE

Those Britons who stand amazed at the defeatist trend of their country's politics; who begin to ask themselves whether our civilization is worth while; and who are puzzled as to how this state of things should ever have come about, will find explained in this pamphlet the cause of it all—the race itself is changing.

The great Persian, Greek, and Roman civilizations died out from this same cause. The dominant Aryan race responsible for their development became too weak by intermarriage with lesser races, until the product could no longer maintain Aryan standards.

Colonel Lindbergh, in 1936, left the United States of America for exactly these reasons; although individual Americans will continue to pull their weight in pioneering for humanity, yet the people of the United States can no longer, in the mass, maintain a decent enough standard of public conduct to protect him from unprovoked annoyance.

This pamphlet demonstrates the Jewish contamination among the titled families of Britain. It has been difficult to "dig out" the information; perhaps the most encouraging aspect in a depressing research has been the obvious desire on the part of most of the affected families to hide their Jewishness; only when it is discovered and dragged forward into the limelight do these families sometimes begin to assert that "they are proud of their Jewish blood!"

A similar phenomenon was observed by the Jewish compilers of the Who's Who in American Jewry (1926), who state in their introduction to the volume: "Some persons preferred to be omitted rather than associate their names with those of their racial colleagues. A few even rejected with indignation the proposal of being included in a volume where their Jewish identity would become a matter of public knowledge."

How completely the Jewish masonic teaching of racial equality has conquered Aryan thought in this country is perhaps best indicated by the absence hitherto of any literature dealing with the race change.

Although this booklet deals only with the titled aristocracy, a similar state of affairs could easily be demonstrated among the official, commercial, and professional communities. Possibly the least affected and most Aryan community is the agricultural one. That, incidentally, is one of the reasons why, in a Jew-owned land, it comprises only about 5 percent of the nation's workers.

Our case can be presented best, we think, by a consideration, first, of the examples of Spain and Portugal, where the process of Aryan racial degeneration has taken place not far away from us either in distance or in time, whilst a sufficient period of the latter has elapsed to prove that nations that have gone down from racial causes cannot rise again by their own unaided efforts.

THE NECESSITY FOR AN ARISTOCRACY TO SUPERVISE THE NATION'S POLITICS IS A FUNDAMENTAL TENET OF THE FASCIST CREED

In publishing this pamphlet we have no idea of attacking the aristocratic principle; we simply present evidence that, for racial reasons, our "aristocracy" has ceased to function in its duty as a protector of the people, and that the racial change taking place in it is symptomatic of a racial change affecting other parts of the community, a change which will destroy the British Empire unless it is rendered impotent to injure us.

FOUL BROOD—THE RACIAL TRANSFORMATION OF A NATION—ENFORCED MASONIC UNIVERSAL BROTHERHOOD

There is a disease of bees called foul brood, which, when it affects a hive, corrupts it irredeemably. An analagous malady is that which has destroyed the greatness of Spain and Portugal, and which has secured for itself a strong footing in Britain, where the symptoms are obvious enough, although puzzling to all who do not appreciate their racial cause.

Spain and Portugal bore the brunt of the early Jewish invasion into western European territory. The poison insinuated itself the more easily because racial differences were obscured by religious ones, so that it was comparatively simple for the Jew to accept Christianity outwardly, whilst remaining at heart a Jew and practicing Jewish rites in the privacy of his home; thus arose the Marrano community, or Crypto-Jecs, who at first avoided to some extent the extreme consequences of the hostility of those of the dominant faith.

In the fifteenth century, the Marranos or Secret Jews dominated Spanish life, occupying high positions not only in the administration, the universities, the forces, and the judiciary, but also in the church itself. Their outward conformity to the Catholic church, together with their accumulation of wealth, enabled them to penetrate by marriage to such an extent into the most exalted families in the land that it became difficult to find an aristocratic family in Aragon or in Castile which was not contaminated with the foul stream of Jewish blood.

The worm turned at last, and not only were all professing Jews expelled from Spain, or forcibly converted and later expelled from Portugal, but the inquisition attacked the Marrano community, the position of which was ever afterward insecure and hopeless.

The greatest period of Spanish history followed the expulsion; and Portugal built up her great colonial Empire subsequent to the riddance of the professing Jew. But in both cases, the curse descended upon the colonial possessions of these two nations; in Peru, the Jew held the commerce of the country in his hands, and it was impossible for a Castilian to succeed in business without a Jewish partner; the Jews purchased the cargoes of great fleets with fictitious credits which they divided amongst themselves, rendering large capital unnecessary. When the struggle between Portugal and Holland for the possession of Brazil took place, the Marranos worked for the Dutch enemy.

At home, the Spanish and Portuguese had, however, made the supreme mistake of imagining that any Marrano could be a substitute for a European. Absolute discrimination between white European Christians and the "new Christians" as the Marranos were called, was only insisted on by the best informed of the aristocracy, who kept a record of the new Christians so that intermarriage with them might cease. The racial quality of the people degenerated rapidly as the Jewish contagion spread by intermarriage.

Then, at last, the assault was deliberately made on the last citadel of racial purity. On St. John's Day, 1744, Frederick, Prince of Wales, grand master of English Masons, admitted the Portuguese Ambassador, Dom Sebastio de Carvalho e Mello to a London lodge; this gentleman, better known as Pombal, revived Masonry in Portugal on his return to that country.

On May 2, 1768, Pombal ordered the destruction of all registers of Marrano families, and ordered all the heads of the exclusive and race-conscious Portuguese families to arrange that any daughter of marriageable age must be engaged within 4 months to marry a member of one of the hitherto excluded Jew-contaminated families.

This horrible Masonic outrage made an end of the Portuguese as a great nation.

In Spain, discrimination between the Aryan and the non-Aryan gradually declined under similar influences, although the Corps of Cadets insisted upon an unsullied racial origin as a qualification for entry up to 1860, whilst in some parish churches, even in the nineteenth century, notices were still displayed warning the old Christians against intermarrying with the new.

To some extent, of course, in Spain the Moorish occupation had been responsible for a dilution of the Aryan and Mediterranean blood of the people, but this Moorish corruption was never subtle, and its power of penetration was therefore weak. On the other hand, the Portuguese, through their custom of intermarrying with colored people in their colonies and through the return of the resultant half-breeds to the home country, has suffered great contamination from non-Jewish races of color.

Both Spain and Portugal went down because their native peoples have sullied their blood with that of lower races to a toxic degree; "foul brood" has corrupted them beyond hope. Damage of this sort is permanent.

That being so, let our readers consider what is going on in these islands, and ask themselves how Britain can regain her proper place in the world without first recovering her race-consciousness, and how she can do that without accepting the remedy of the Imperial Fascist League?

OUR JEWISH ARISTOCRACY

It has long been one of the Jewish methods in the attainment of world domination to penetrate into privileged circles where political power is greatest; Edward the First, by expelling the Jews in 1290, saved us from too early an application of this process in Britain, but other countries were less fortunate and suffered the extinction of their nobility by Jewish women marrying into the Gentile aristocratic families.

In Britain a few "damped" (baptized Christian) Jews remained in the country when their synagogue-going brothers had been expelled. Some of these attained knighthood, for instance, Sir Edward Brampton, who became Governor of Guernsey. The first serious attempt, however, to penetrate the ranks of the hereditary titleholders of England seems to have been an attack upon royalty itself by that notorious character, Perkin Warbeck, who was a servant of the Jewish knight mentioned above. With characteristic Jewish effrontery, this man claimed the English throne.

Francis Bacon wrote in his Life and Reign of King Henry VII: "There was a townsman of Tourney that had born office in that town, whose name was John Osbeck, a convert Jew, married to Catherine de Faro; whose business drew him to live for a time with his wife at London, in King Edward IV's days. During which time he had a son by her; and being known in court, the King either out of a religious nobleness, because he was a convert, or upon some private acquaintance, did him the honor as to be godfather to his child, and named him Peter. But afterwards proving a dainty and effeminate youth, he was commonly called by the diminutive of his name, Peterkin or Perkin. For, as for the name of Warbeck, it was given him when they did but guess at it, before examinations had been taken."

How many of us at school realized that Perkin Warbeck was a figure in the Jewish world plot against Aryan sovereignty?

As everyone knows, Cromwell allowed the Jews to return and they flocked over here toward the latter part of the seventeenth century, the largest wave of rich Jews coming over with William III from Holland.

In 1718 the Attorney General, Sir R. Raymond, hammered another nail into his country's coffin, by deciding that Jews could hold land in England. Walpole had previously allowed the Jew Gideon to hold estates by a special act in his favor; this Jew had lent his "credit" to the government (!) which seems not to have realized that it had a lot of its own, and falsely posing as a Christian, for he never ceased his payments to the synagogue and died a Jew, he married a Gentile, his son being created a baronet and later Baron Eardley, a title now fortunately extinct. The first synagogue Jew baronets were Sir I. L. Goldsmid (1841), Sir Moses Montefiore, and Sir Anthony de Rothschild; these seem to have qualified for the British aristocracy by using their ill-gotten wealth in buying privileges for the Jews in this and other countries.

It was Sir Issac L. Goldsmid who led the movement for the admission of the Jews to our legislature. Once the barrier was down, the rest was easy. In 1858 legislation enabled the foreign "Baron" Lionel de Rothschild to take his oath in the House of Commons as a Jew. His son was raised to the peerage in 1885. The "damped" Jew Disraeli had of course obtained earlier honors, dying as the Earl of Beaconsfield.

Among the earlier Synagogue baronet creations were those of Sir George Jessel, Sir David Salomans, and Sir John Simon (no relation to the living Sir John Simon, who claims not to be Jewish).

Aryan peers sometimes made matters worse by marrying Jewesses, one of the most disastrous cases being that of the second Viscount Galway, who married as early as 1747 a Jewess called Villa Real, as a result of which countless fine old British families have had this Asiatic strain instilled into them. It was a Rothschild plan to marry superfluous daughters into the families of influential Gentiles; in the case of the Rothschild unions with Baron Battersea and the son of the fourth Earl of Hardwicke, the marriages were sterile, but a daughter of Mayer Amschel Rothschild married the fifth Earl of Rosebery, so that there is Rothschild blood in the present earl, one of whose sisters married the present Marquess of Crewe, himself with Villa Real blood; thus after many days, the blood of the Villa Real Jewess mingles with that of the Rothschild in the issue of this marriage of "British aristocrats."

The custom of mating with Jewesses has now become a common one; the instinct of the Aryan has been broken down by continued propaganda, and H. Belloc in his book on The Jews writes of the Jewish penetration of our great aristocratic families: "With the opening of the twentieth century, those of the great territorial English families in which there was no Jewish blood were the exception. In nearly all of them, the strain was more or less marked, in some of them so strong that though the name was still an English name and the traditions those of a purely English lineage of the long past, the physique and character had become wholly Jewish and the members of the family were taken for Jews whenever they traveled in countries where the gentry had not yet suffered or enjoyed this mixture."

A study of the "society" photographs in any copy of The Bystander will convince anyone that Mr. Belloc does not exaggerate. To those of us who believe that Aryanization is civilization it is incomprehensible that aristocrats of our race could succumb to the cunning Masonic and educational Jewish propaganda designed to cause them to forget their race. Nevertheless, the opposition to Jewish penetration into the great families has not been expressed in any decided way; Masonry is no doubt responsible for this. Queen Victoria herself had qualms about the granting of titles to Jews, because we know that when it was recommended to her that Sir Lionel Rothschild should be promoted to the peerage, she wrote as follows in a letter dated November 1, 1869, to Mr. Gladstone: "It is not only the feeling, of which she cannot divest herself, against making a person of the Jewish religion a peer, but she cannot think that one who owes his great wealth to contracts with foreign governments for loans, or to successful speculation on the stock exchange can fairly claim a British peerage. However high Sir L. Rothschild may stand personally in public estimation, this seems to her not the less a species of gambling because it is on a gigantic scale and far removed from that legitimate trading which she delights to honor, in which men have raised themselves by patient industry and unswerving probity to positions of wealth and influence."

Her sound instincts, or "prejudices" as they would be called nowadays in our Judaized press, were, however, broken down by Disraeli and we have now reached such a pitch that in 1932 the Jews were seriously planning to get the chief rabbi into the House of Lords, ex-officio. In 1915 a daughter of the fourth Baron Sheffield married the Jew Edwin Montagu, the disturber of Indian "pathetic contentment," and actually "embraced Judaism" also in a religious sense. There was more excuse for Lord George Gordon of the 1780 anti-Popery campaign, who adopted the Jewish religion, but died insane.

In the following review of our titled aristocracy, there are many errors of omission; working chiefly with Burke's Peerage, we find a reticence on the subject of Jewish "relativity" to our nobility; in other words, the volume seems designed to baffle the investigator as much as possible. For that reason, and also because the time at our disposal for this research is strictly limited, the review is far from complete, but it is sufficiently terrible to a racist as it is.

Every effort has been made to avoid errors of commission; we do not desire to hurt the feelings of anyone, but the British people have a right to know the truth; wherever we have insufficient evidence in suspicious cases, the benefit of the doubt has been given; we hope, in many future editions, to be able to make our lists more complete. The excellent library of the Society of Genealogists could not produce a single volume which was of direct help in collecting the material for this pamphlet, which we hope, therefore, will find a place on its shelves; but we think something will prevent it getting there. It may be of interest to mention that Debrett's Peerage is published by the same Jew firm, Odhams Press, Ltd., which runs the Daily Herald. Sir Sydney Lee (Jew) edited the Dictionary of National Biography, so we get little help from those. And the Jew, M. Epstein, edits the Annual Register.

We have omitted from our list certain cases where Jewesses have married into noble families in which the titles are now extinct or from which marriages there was no issue.

In our investigations we found that the statement made by J. M. Macdiarmid in The Deer Forests that the Leveson-Gower family was descended from "a London Jew money lender" is false; the name "Leveson" in this case has no Jewish application. Also, the statement made in the Jewish Daily Post, June 17, 1935, that the present Duchess of Norfolk has Jewish blood, is untrue; she is the second wife of the last duke and mother of the present duke; and it was the first wife of the last duke, who left no heir, who had Jewish blood. The Universe is in error in stating (Feb. 4, 1937) that the Marquess of Bute is descended from the Jew Treves.

Many Jewish titles, sometimes camouflaged, like those of Barons Wandsworth (real name, Stern) and Pirbright (real name, De Worms), are fortunately extinct. Extinct, also, is the baronetcy of Sir Edgar Speyer, which was revoked by a notice in the Times of December 14, 1921, on account of his unlawful communication and trading with the enemy during the war.

The effect of even a slight mixture of Jewish blood in an Aryan family is often very great. It alters the political outlook of the individual because it alters the instincts themselves.

"One Chink or Negro or even Jew ancestor a long way back will undo your Anglo-Saxon composition, of which you may claim an unbroken line of purely Essex stock, more thoroughly than if all your ancestors, from your parents back, had been Dutch, German, Swede, Dane, French, Russian, Portuguese, Italian, or any other easily assimilated Aryan race." W. Gerhardi in Memoirs of a Polyglot, 1931.

When a large number of individuals in commanding social or political positions are rendered partly Asiatic in instinct, the nation itself becomes the victim of these destructive instincts.

Referring to Colonel Lane's book, The Alien Menace, the National Review confirms this in the following words:

"English men and women are constantly asking themselves how it comes about that a twist is so frequently given to British policy that is clearly not in accordance with British interests. There is usually somebody in a position, at the psychological moment, to deflect our government, whatever party be in power, into some line of action that is unintelligible at the time and is fraught with disastrous consequences. * * * It is as though some hostile influence were steadily throwing grit into the machine. In every international financial arrangement we fare badly, and the whole story of reparations and war debts is humiliating in the extreme and calculated to make us the world's laughing stock as well as the world's milk cow. It is in this connection that such a book as Colonel Lane has written * * * throws a timely searchlight. It is in the higher ranks of society that the alien menace is formidable through the influence exercised in government departments, in Downing Street, and high finance by gentry of unmistakable foreign origin."

The repulsive physical appearance of the Hither Asiatic or Armenoid race is often passed on over many generations of a Jew-contaminated Aryan family.

Throughout this pamphlet, the word "Jew" is employed in its racial sense, implying Armenoid, Mongoloid, or Oriental blood. The appointments mentioned in connection with any individual are either past or present ones. The lists given below are of present titleholders only.

Sir D. Wernher, Bart., is son of a Jewish Mankiewicz.

Sir H. E. Yarrow, Bart., is son of a Jewish Franklin.

The Earl of Birkenhead is descended from an oriental called Bathsheba, described in a recent biography as a gypsy. Racially, it matters little whether it was gypsy or Jew. He married Baron Camrose's daughter, and his sister married Baron Camrose's son.

HALF-BREEDS IN THE MAKING

As though that were not enough, the following noblemen and baronets now holding their titles have married women of Jewish blood; their heirs, if by descent from these will be Jewish aristocrats:

(9th) Duke of Roxburghe married the granddaughter of a Rothschild.

(5th) Marquess of Cholmondeley's wife is a Sassoon.

(16th) Marquess of Winchester married a Jewess, Mrs. Claude Marks.

(7th) Earl Castle Stewart married a Guggenheim.

(2d) Earl of Inchcape married the Jewish Ranee of Sarawak's daughter.

(6th) Earl of Rosse married a Jewish Messel.

(1st) Viscount St. Davids married first a Jewish Gerstenberg; and secondly a descendant of the Jew Treves by whom is his heir.

(1st) Viscount Bledisloe married a Lopes for his first wife, and his heir is her son.

(1st) Viscount Dawson of Penn married the daughter of a Jewish Franklin.

(3d) Baron Crawshaw married the granddaughter of a Ricardo.

(3d) Baron O'Hagan married as first wife the daughter of a Jewish Braham, by whom is his heir.

(1st) Baron Passfield, formerly Sidney Webb, a Fabian Socialist, married the granddaughter of a "tall, dark woman of Jewish type," and his biographer states that Beatrice Webb, now Lady Passfield, inherited many of her characteristics. (See Sidney and Beatrice Webb, by M. A. Hamilton, p. 41.) This appears to be the daughter of John Aked. Baron Passfield himself is described by Mr. Hamilton as having Jewish features; he was born in Soho and his origins "he has never illuminated." Nevertheless, Mr. Hamilton says that the Baron is pure English; a curious phenomenon.

(1st) Baron Parmoor married Lady Passfield's sister.

(6th) Baron Plunket married a Jewish Lewis.

Sir L. C. W. Alexander, Bart., married the daughter of the Jewish Baron Cable.

Sir J. W. Beynon, Bart., married a Moses.

Sir J. H. Blunt, Bart., married a Goldsmid-Stern-Salomans.

Sir H. L. C. Brassey, Bart., married the daughter of a Jewish Ricardo.

Sir T. Colyer-Fergusson, Bart., married a Cohen as his second wife.

Sir T. E. P. Falkiner, Bart., married the granddaughter of a Ricardo.

Sir G. C. Hamilton married a Jewish Simon.

Sir L. J. Jones, Bart., married a Schuster as his second wife, but his heir is by his first wife.

Sir E. A. Lechmere, Bart., married the daughter of a Samuels.

Sir R. Leeds, Bart., married a Jewish Singer.

Sir C. E. Lyle, Bart., of the sugar-monopolist firm Tate & Lyle, married a Levy and his son married the daughter of Sir John Jarvis, conservative M. P. for Guildford.

Sir E. O. McTaggart-Stewart, Bart., married a descendant of the Jew Treves.

Sir A. Moir, Bart., married the granddaughter of a Jewish Franklin.

Sir Oswald Mosley, Bart., married a granddaughter of the Jew L. Z. Leiter; he is chief of British Union of Fascists.

Sir. P. G. J. Mostyn, Bart., married a Jewish Marks.

Sir J. Gordon Nairne, Bart., married a Costa Ricci.

Sir N. A. Pearson, Bart., married a Mond, but obtained a divorce.

Sir Giles E. Sebright, Bart., married the granddaughter of an Isaacs.

Sir C. E. Warde married a "de Stern."

We are convinced that if we could get proof of certain facts regarding the relationships of other titled families, we could more than double the above list.

Here is a "mixed pickle" of Jewish relationships which we print, not because these cases necessarily influence the titled people mentioned in every instance, as some of them may detest the connection, but to show how intimate the Jewish penetration has become:

(9th) Duke of Devonshire's brother married a descendant of the Jew Bernal Osborne.

(11th) Marquess of Tweeddale married a Ralli, stepdaughter of an Einstein.

(2d) Marquess of Milford Haven is brother-in-law to Cassel offspring.

(7th) Marquess of Londonderry's daughter married a Jessel. His heir is godfather to a Jewish Jessel.

(4th) Marquess of Salisbury's heir, Viscount Cranborne, married a descendant of the Jew Bernal Osborne.

(7th) Earl Beauchamp's daughter is godmother to the son of Hon. E. Jessel.

(5th) Earl Peel's aunt married Charles S. Goldman, M. P., and the Earl's uncle is a director in the Jew international bank of S. Japhet & Co.

(27th) Earl of Crawford's heir married a descendant of the Jew Bernal Osborne. Another son married the daughter of a Jewish Van Raalte.

(17th) Earl of Derby's daughter married the son of a Rothschild.

(7th) Earl Spencer's brother married a Jewish Blumenthal.

(7th) Earl of Orkney is nephew of Baroness de Samuel.

(4th) Earl of Verulam is brother-in-law of a Cassel.

(9th) Earl of Jersey's stepfather is a Jewish Slessor.

(6th) Earl Ranfurly's stepfather is a Jewish Lezard.

(2d) Earl Oxford and Asquith's sister married the cousin of a half-Rothschild. A distant relationship, but significant from a political standpoint.

(2d) Viscount Chelmsford's brother-in-law is a Jew Goldman.

(5th) Viscount Sidmouth's brother-in-law is a Jew Harris.

(2d) Viscount Scarsdale's daughter's godmother is Mrs. Simon Marks.

(3d) Baron Gerard's sister married the Jew Baron de Forest.

(4th) Baron Annaly is brother-in-law to Viscount Galway, of Jew descent.

(2d) Baron Aberdare is brother-in-law of Lord Rosebery, son of a Rothschild.

(4th) Baron Fermoy's daughter has a Sassoon as godparent.

(2d) Baron Hamilton of Dalzell's nephew, his heir presumptive, and himself son of a Ricardo, married the daughter of the second Baron Burnham (Lawson, Levi).

(1st) Baron Kemsley's son married a Rothschild.

(2d) Baron Phillimore's heir married a Pereira.

(2d) Baron Hothfield's heir married a Raphael. His brother married a Jewish Faudel-Phillips.

(7th) Baron Ravensworth's sister married a Speyer.

Sir E. J. P. Benn's (Bart.) heir married the daughter of the Jew Sir Maurice Hankey; and his daughter married P. Shinkman.

Sir H. M. Huntington-Whiteley (Bart.) (who married Mr. Stanley Baldwin's daughter) has a sister-in-law Cohn.

Sir J. D. Orr-Lewis (Bart.) is brother-in-law of a Stern.

Sir L. R. Phillips' (Bart.) heir married a Jewish Lehmann.

Sir A. C. Cory-Wright's (Bart.) heir married a Jewish Tree; another son married a Levy.

Sir B. G. D. Sheffield's (Bart.) son married a Jewish Faudel-Phillips.

Sir J. H. B. Noble's (Bart.) son married the granddaughter of a Jewish Goldsmid.

Sir R. Bonsor's (Bart.) sister married a Jewish Hambro.

Sir H. W. Hulse's (Bart.) son has a Jewish Lawson as godfather.

Sir C. G. E. Welby's (Bart.) son married a Jewish Gregory.

In many of the above cases, the heir to the title is involved. Once more, we must emphasize how incomplete the above list still is.

We do not know exactly how to classify—

Baron Strabolgi, formerly Commander Kenworthy, Socialist M. P., but the Daily Telegraph of April 16, 1934, is less cautious and includes him in a list of what it described as the "leaders of British Jewry." Lord Strabolgi looks Jewish, boosts the Jewish nation at every opportunity and reacts like a Jew, and once was a director of the European & Caucasian Export & Import Co., which, as the Patriot states, May 23, 1929, had a capital of £2,200 and "could be nothing but an intermediary between the Soviet that found the banking security and the manufacturers who sold the goods."

Lord Marley is another baron who appears to be a little shy as to his ancestry; Burke simply reveals him to be the grandson of George Joachim Aman, but Lord Marley's actions show that, whatever he may be, he cannot regard it libelous to be described at least as an "artificial Jew"; he spends much of his time boosting Jews and defending Jew interests.

There are scores of other "lords" who are far too shy to reveal even their mothers' names. Surely it is an important thing that the British Democrat should know something of the origins of, say, Barons Arnold, Passfield, and Snell, seeing that they hold prominent positions in the affairs of our country. Then there is Baron Ashfield, whose father changed his name from Knatries to Stanley; this fact is not given in Burke's Peerage, and we should like to know if he was a Jew. Have we not a right to know?

What is the use of a peerage reference book which does not tell where Jewish blood comes in?

A statement originally made by Mr. Shane Leslie, that Lord Curzon of Kedleston had a Jewish grandmother, and repeated by B. Falk in He Laughed in Fleet Street has, we understand from Mr. Leslie himself, been withdrawn by him. We do not know whether or no it should have been withdrawn.

"For over 14 years she had counted Lady Rothschild as her best friend," said Lady Snowden, on March 19 at the jubilee appeal for the Jewish Association for the Protection of Girls, at Grosvenor House, Park Lane.

The Earls of Listowel and of Warwick helped to direct the Jewish Daily Post of London, which has since gone into liquidation.

According to the Jewish Chronicle of May 10, Lord Winterton stated in the House of Commons, May 7, that although he was not aware of any Jewish blood among his ancestors, he would be very proud of it if there was. Faugh!

Lady Diana Cooper's child had as its godfather the late Otto Kahn, of Kuhn, Loeb & Co.

The Balfours, Cecils, Churchills, Lyttons, Russells, and Stanleys seem to have a sort of hereditary lack of Aryan good taste in favoring Jews.

Lady Patricia Moore, daughter of the tenth Earl of Drogheda, served as head of a committee of the British Association of Maccabees in 1933, together with the careerist, Mr. Randolph Churchill. This is an exclusively Jewish national organization and we do not know what these two were doing there.

Adultery with Jews accounts for certain cases where individuals of obvious hither Asiatic race suddenly appear in old Aryan families of nobility. The usual chain of circumstances in these cases was described in The Fascist of May 1934, in an article called A Side Line of Usury. It is the greater scandal that these cases may not here be advertised so that the Eurasian progeny might be chivied out of our British aristocracy, which they must permanently contaminate. These Jew-features cross-breeds often further betray themselves by their instinctive leanings toward Marxism and finance and by a preference and sympathy for Jewish company and Jewish causes. They often live under the perpetual shadow of Jewish blackmail.

Generally speaking, when people of Aryan family look like Jews, they are Jewish.

KNIGHTS OF ENGLAND

The list of Jewish knights which follows gives no real idea of the Jewish contamination of the once-prized honor of knighthood. It is far more difficult to get at the ancestry of holders of non-hereditary titles than it is of the others. It is easier for your Jewish knight to camouflage himself, and there is no doubt whatever that there are as many Marrano Jews today in this country working for Jewry under Christianized names and under the Christian religion as ever there were in Spain and Portugal. We include in the list below only names of living knights of undoubted Jewish blood; we know there are scores of others, and we may be able to add to the list in future editions, particularly if our readers will assist us in the business of identification.

Sir J. F. S. Coleridge's daughter married a Seligman.

Sir W. Monckton's wife's stepfather is a Cohen.
Sir Guy Standing's daughter married a Jewish Leon.

Some of the knights mentioned are themselves Jewish, but we have no proofs in these cases and therefore make no distinctions.

The following are women of Jewish blood bearing titles as being widows of knights:

Lady M. Barnard (nee Loewen).
Lady C. M. Chermside, daughter of 1st Baron Reuter.
Lady De Pass (nee Mercado).
Lady A. de Villiers, daughter of Simon Davis.

Lady E. Prince (nee Jonas).
Lady A. Z. Pringle (nee Levy).
Lady R. Samuel (nee Beddington).
Lady I. Snowden (nee Isaacs).
Lady F. Walston (nee Einstein).

So, there is something rotten in the state of Denmark.

We ask our readers to join us and to help to rouse what is left of the great British Nation to race-consciousness. No man or woman can escape the responsibility which the knowledge given in this pamphlet forces upon them. The task cannot be left to future generations, because every generation will be more Judaised than the one before it.

The great Jew-wise reformer, William Cobbett thus addressed the nobility of his day (about 1827) in his Letter to the Nobility of England:

"You feel * * * that you are not the men your grandfathers were; but you have come into your present state by slow degrees, and therefore you cannot tell, even to yourselves, not only how the change has come about, but you cannot tell what sort of change it really is. You may know what it is, however * * * when you reflect that your grandfathers would as soon have thought of dining with a chimney sweep than of dining with a jew or with any huckstering reptile who has amassed money by watching the turn of the market; that those grandfathers would have thought it no dishonor at all to sit at table with farmers, or even with laborers, but that they would have shunned the usurious tribe of loan jobbers, and other notorious changers of money as they would have shunned the whirlwind or the pestilence."

GENTLEMEN, YOU HAVE BEEN WARNED—KEEP TROTH

(Current engagements on going to press: The Marquess of Queensberry's daughter to Count Bendem, son of the new Jew Baron de Forest.)

Revised to November 30, 1937, enlarged with addition of new names and removal of others through death, and in three cases through error.

Examine This Plan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BENNETT CHAMP CLARK

OF MISSOURI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 21 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM ROCKY MOUNTAIN NEWS ON PROPOSED DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENSE

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial appearing in the Rocky Mountain News of Denver, Colo., on the 19th of this month, entitled "Examine This Plan," referring to a bill which I introduced to establish in the country a Department of National Defense, with a coordinate Division for Aviation.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senator BENNETT CLARK's bill to place all armed forces under one Department of National Defense, and to establish an air force equal in rank to the Army and Navy, should have a full and fair hearing. And without delay.

The stake may be nothing less than our collective neck.

We cannot afford to rely alone on the opinion of generals who feel at home only with their feet on the ground or a headquarters desk, or admirals trained to command from the bridge of a battleship.

Top-ranking generals and admirals, of course, are opposed to Senator CLARK's bill. Most of the top-rankers in the Army and Navy are men who started their careers back in the days when the Wright brothers were building and repairing bicycles. There was nothing about flying in the books they studied at West Point and Annapolis. Indeed, even today, the cadets at those two renowned institutions—the young men who are to be the ranking officers of the future—are not taught how to fly planes.

As long as we lived in a peaceful world and felt secure it was, perhaps, not important that aviation remained a stepchild of the military services. But in today's world, where security can be attained only through superior might, it may become vital.

It is at least questionable whether anything approaching real air power, of the caliber developed by Germany and Italy, can ever be achieved under the present system, where our Army and Navy each has an air force as an auxiliary branch—where, as Senator CLARK points out, there is between the two branches neither unity of command and tactics nor of design and procurement.

We can't afford to let air power remain a side line. Germany and Italy didn't. England was long in learning that—maybe too long.

Under Senator CLARK's bill, aviation would be promoted from a secondary to a primary arm of defense. The air force would be independent of, and equal in rank to, the Army and the Navy. The three services would be in one Government department, headed by a Secretary of National Defense—a sort of lieutenant commander in chief, taking orders only from the President, and directing and coordinating the activities and preparations of our armed forces, on land, at sea, and in the air.

We hope Congress will lose no time in examining this proposal.

Aviation's Sitdown Strike

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BENNETT CHAMP CLARK

OF MISSOURI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 21 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ARTICLE FROM THE NATION

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article from The Nation of August 17, 1940, entitled "Aviation's Sitdown Strike."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From The Nation of August 17, 1940]

AVIATION'S SIT-DOWN STRIKE

(By I. F. Stone)

The aviation industry is still engaged in a sit-down strike against the national-defense program. The purpose of this strike is to squeeze every possible financial concession out of the Federal Government. "This is no time," Congressman BARDEN of North Carolina lectured shipyard workers in Kearny's quickly quashed strike last June, "for labor to try and grab off 10 cents an hour more." No such petty stakes are involved in the aviation companies' sit-down. Their strike has forced the administration and Congress to lift the profit limitations imposed on airplane contracts only a few weeks ago by the revised Vinson-Trammell Act, and is obtaining amortization privileges that will give aviation greatly expanded cost-free plants when the emergency or the war is over. But these concessions do not satisfy the industry. It is also seeking to block or postpone the enactment of an excess-profits tax. A huge backlog of British orders obtained on the juiciest terms the companies could exact from England's desperate need has provided the funds necessary to feed the industry during its sit-down against our defense program.

"Treason" was the cry of Congressman Cox, of Georgia, when United States Steel's shipyard employees at Kearny asked a raise of 10 cents an hour. No such harsh accusation has been made against the aviation companies, though plane contracts to the value of $85,000,000 have been held up by their recalcitrance. Instead, the blame is being placed upon the administration in a propaganda campaign that is mounting in intensity. The sit-down strike may yet play a part in the coming election, and aviation hopes that its resistance may help to bring in a new President who can be depended upon to grant it everything instead of almost everything. It need hardly be added that in all these objectives the aviation strikers are being helped by sympathetic picketing from the other defense industries, notably steel, which is staging a sit-down of its own on armor plate.

Last May the financial editor of the New York Sun, appalled by the British excess-profits tax, thought it "difficult for many Americans to understand how Britain can expect anyone to make the tremendous extra productive effort required by war without some stimulus other than the vague one that it is necessary to save the country." Aviation has demonstrated that it agrees with him that a national emergency is too vague a stimulus to call forth its best efforts. The companies which the Nye committee found were helping to build up Hitler's air fleet in violation of the treaty of peace with Germany are in no hurry to build up our own. Pratt & Whitney, Curtiss-Wright, and Douglas Aircraft were the companies named in the Nye report of April 20, 1936. Pratt & Whitney, Curtiss-Wright, and Douglas Aircraft are among the leaders of aviation's sit-down strike.

The Wall Street Journal, which knows its big-business men, smelled a scandal of this kind coming a month ago and sent out a staff man to do a series of articles on industry and its relation to defense. It reported "with pleasure" that "these extensive investigations reveal that the armament program is progressing without undue delay and without sound basis for criticism." Its investigator, surely a descendant of Voltaire's Candide, found that "American industry is operating with its typical efficiency. If, in the future, delays inherent in the very size and scope of the program come to light, they certainly cannot be laid at the door of a fully cooperating private industry." On the contrary, the Wall Street Journal placed the blame on the War and Navy Departments, in spite of their readiness to speak for big business before congressional committees. "The difficulty of getting action out of the Government, and particularly the Army and Navy Departments" was cited as a principal cause for delay. But $85,000,000 worth of plane contracts cleared by Army, Navy, and Defense Commission are still waiting for the aviation industry to get into action. Since the President's call in May for 50,000 planes a year the industry has accepted contracts for only $900,378 worth of trainer planes. Barron's Financial Weekly, which cannot be accused of taking too implacable an attitude toward Wall Street, reported in its issue of July 29: "The attitude of some defense industries that they must be assured of a profit is souring many Washington dispositions, even in the probusiness War and Navy Departments."

The phrase "assured of a profit" is something of an understatement. No one expects the aviation industry to serve for $21 a month. The administration has been more than tender with it. When the national defense tax bill was rushed through the House on June 11, a gag rule was imposed to prevent amendments that would tax war profits or excess profits. "The most inequitable tax bill enacted by Congress in the last decade"—the words are Senator LA FOLLETTE'S—lowered income-tax exemptions, imposed a 10-percent supertax, enacted a long list of special sales and nuisance taxes, but added only 1 percent to the corporation tax and imposed none of the mounting profits that industry will soon be drawing from defense. Trouble began when the Senate Naval Affairs Committee on June 18 discovered that the Navy, without competitive bidding, had let a billion dollars' worth of shipbuilding contracts on the old World War basis of cost-plus-10-percent. The result was that Congress, just before the convention recess, revised the Vinson-Trammell Act of 1934 to lower profit limits on plane and ship contracts. The limit on the former had been 12 percent; on the latter, 10 percent. By the act of June 28, Congress reduced the profit limitation to 8 percent on the cost of competitively bid contracts and 7 percent on those negotiated privately. It was at that point that aviation's strike began.

These limitations governed not the return on capital but the margin of profit on the contract, and the profit allowed was clear profit. The Government agreed to pay the cost not only of the work done but of any additional plant necessary to do the work. If by some chance the contractor failed to make his full 8 or 7 percent he was to be allowed to make up the deficiency on other contracts during the succeeding 4 years. These conditions hardly seem confiscatory. The entire industry, nevertheless, lined up at the wailing wall. The United States News, edited by David Lawrence, accused the Treasury of harboring "a belief that patriotism rather than a desire for profits should motivate industry." The New Deal seems to have been innocent of any such subversive intention. The Wall Street Journal set out to show how ruinous the profit limitations could be—they might affect the raising of funds for expansion, research work would be cut. It applied the profit limits to the year 1939, admitting that the comparison was not quite fair because in that year production was not continuous or at capacity. Even on this basis the figures in the Wall Street Journal seemed less than disastrous. On the 7-percent basis the return on capital for eight major aviation companies would have ranged from 4.3 percent for Consolidated Aircraft to 28 percent for Lockheed. Lockheed's high return was due to its high capital turn-over in 1939, but all the companies will show a vastly increased capital turn-over with the defense program under way. Here are the Wall Street Journal's estimates:

	Percent
Boeing	21.5
Consolidated	4.3
Curtiss-Wright	9.8
Douglas	18.3
Lockheed	28.0
G. L. Martin	9.4
North American	20.2
United Aircraft	11.2

These rates of profit seem adequate, particularly in a national emergency, to "preserve and strengthen"—we quote from the National City Bank's July bulletin—"the system of private enterprise." Men in the trenches manage to sustain morale on a lower profit margin.

The bill embodying the new profit limits was signed by the President on June 28. On July 10 he surrendered to the sit-downers. The administration agreed to drop the profit limits. In addition it promised to enact legislation that would permit companies building new plant or installing new equipment to amortize these additions in 5 years. This means that 20 percent of the cost of this new plant or equipment may be deducted by the companies from their income before arriving at the net on which income taxes and excess-profits taxes must be paid. At the end of the 5-year period the companies would have plants completely paid off out of the sums received from the Government for planes. William S. Knudsen, head of the National Defense Advisory Commission, was jubilant. He emerged from the July 10 conference with the President to say that the tax and amortization agreement "would expedite many defense contracts with companies which have been reluctant to undertake such work." The Commission announced "the placing of contracts totaling approximately $100,000,000 since July 1 in a program under which negotiations have been conducted looking to the supply of 25,000 airplanes for our national defense." Louis Johnson, at that time Assistant Secretary of War, sent out a letter asking all plane manufacturers to begin work immediately on the contracts ready for them. He pointed out that the entire program would be delayed at least 60 days if they waited for Congress to enact the administration agreement into law. It was reported that the letter offered the protection of price revisions later if anything occurred to change the situation.

That the administration had the power to make good on its promise cannot be doubted. Any Congressman who refused to back the agreement could be accused of sabotaging the defense program. The companies decided to wait. "Although contracts for some 4,000 planes have been drawn and are awaiting signature," the Wall Street Journal reported, "it is understood that the industry has declined to accept the business until definite regulations are forthcoming on amortizing new plants. It was generally felt by Government officials—after an agreement between administration officials and Congressional tax leaders that new plants would be amortized over a 5-year period and the 8-percent profit limitation removed in favor of a new excess-profits tax—that contracts could be entered into immediately. However, the industry is reported to feel that it would be unwise to accept new business until exact regulations under whatever new law is passed are made known" The President was still hopeful. On July 16 he announced that replies to Assistant Secretary Johnson's letter "indicated that arrangements are being made now by the companies for tooling their plants to fill the orders, and in some instances they are proceeding with plant-expansion plans." These indications seem to have been slightly exaggerated.

The administration surrendered on July 10, but the strike was still on a month later. The excuse was that Congress had not yet written into law the promise made by the President and congressional leaders to repeal the limitation on plane profits and grant 5-year amortization. What really lay behind the continued strike was a struggle over the excess-profits tax. President Roosevelt coupled his announcement that he would back repeal of the profit-limit law with a pledge to impose excess-profits taxes on industry as a whole. The demand of the aviation companies for 5-year amortization gave the administration a bargaining weapon in pushing an excess-profits tax bill through Congress. Those who must pay the taxes naturally preferred a more leisurely pace—no action on excess profits at all, if that could be managed. The strategy of the aviation companies, acting in this respect as a spearhead for a drive by big business, was to sit tight, refuse to build planes, continue to cry for protection on amortization. If amortization could be rushed through Congress in a separate bill, it would be easier to delay or defeat an excess-profits tax.

Closely examined, the amortization issue itself is not a very real one. Under the Vinson-Trammell profit-limitation law, the cost of any additional plant or equipment is included in the contract costs before the profit margin is figured. Without any change in the tax law a measure of protection exists for companies which, for defense purposes, build plants that will be of no use to them in peacetime. The Treasury may allow for obsolescence, and a plant can become obsolete because there is no market for its products. Or an allowance can be obtained for the cost of turning it to peacetime uses. There will be a peacetime market for airplanes, perhaps a greater market than ever. If the companies are allowed 5-year amortization, they will have cost-free plants with which to build planes when the war is over.

Unless they obtain 5-year amortization the risk for the plane companies is that if at the end of the emergency they have no use for the plants, they may have no net income against which to take an obsolescence allowance. The allowance, of course, is an allowance against income or profits taxes. This risk is not very serious, particularly in view of the prices the companies are charging for planes. These should cover at least part of their capital expenditures. But even this slight measure of risk is more theoretical than real in the light of the way in which plant expansions will probably be financed. The case of Wright Aeronautical Corporation will illustrate the financial featherbed on which the companies may be wafted through this emergency.

Any plane company that needs a Government loan to finance plant expansion for defense will get it. Wright Aeronautical is the first to be offered such a loan, and the same terms are available to other companies. Engines are one of the bottlenecks in the plane program. United Aircraft and Wright are the only producers of high-powered air-cooled engines in this country. The Government began negotiations last May with the Wright company for the erection of a plant in Cincinnati to build these engines. Originally the Wright company was to be given a loan of $20,000,000 by the R. F. C. This was raised to $55,000,000 on June 20 and on July 26 to $92,000,000. The interest rate was reported to be 4 percent. The Wright company was to have an 8-year lease with the right to renew for another 8 years. The Treasury ruled that the Wright company could amortize the plant in 8 years. The Government was to pay the Wright company enough on the engine contracts to repay the loan in 8 years. At the end of the 8 years the Wright company could renew the lease for another 8 years with a cost-free plant, or it could sell the plant back to the Government, in which case the Government would pay for the plant twice. It cannot be said that under this arrangement the Wright company would be embarking on a speculative venture. But just to eliminate any possible risk the loan was offered as a nonrecourse loan, that is, the Government would have no claim against the Wright company if it failed to repay the loan. All the Government could do in that case would be to take the factory. Since the plant would be financed entirely by the Government, the Government would really be taking back its own property if the Wright company for some reason wanted to drop it. The amount of the loan also would provide a generous margin of safety for the Wright company.

The Wall Street Journal reported on August 2 that while the loan was for $92,000,000, "the cost of the proposed plant, and its equipment, is understood to be only $37,000,000 or $38,000,000." When asked by the Journal correspondent about this apparent discrepancy, Jesse Jones said, "We don't believe it would be in the public interest to break down that total at this time." As this is being written the Wright contract has yet to be signed. The company is now asking for 5-year amortization instead of 8. Incidentally, a vice president of this finicky company, T. P. Wright, was assigned to the Defense Commission on June 8 to help speed up production. The home office doesn't seem too cooperative.

At the risk of tugging at the reader's heartstrings I want to conclude with the Wall Street Journal's analysis of what excess-profits taxes might do to the aviation companies. The joint congressional committee has recommended a 40-percent tax on earnings above the average for the years 1936–39. The Treasury wants a sliding scale ranging from 25 percent of profits over a 15-percent return on invested capital to 50 percent on profits over a 30-percent return. The Wall Street Journal applied the Canadian excess-profits tax to six major aviation companies on the basis of their 1940 business, as shown by reports for the first 6 months of this year. Canada takes 75 percent of earnings over average earnings from 1936 to 1939. The net profit for the six companies, after deducting a 75 percent excess-profits tax, would range from a low of 14.37 percent for Curtiss-Wright to a high of 53.35 percent for North American. These are the Wall Street Journal's figures, not mine, and the Wall Street Journal is not one to underestimate the plight to which a national emergency has reduced the 100-percent—if they can get it—patriots of the aviation industry.

Editorials on Foreign Affairs

OF

HON. ERNEST LUNDEEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 21 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

FOREIGN POLICY EDITORIALS FROM WALLACE'S FARMER

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD several editorials on foreign affairs from Wallace's Farmer of Des Moines, Iowa.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Wallace's Farmer, January 29, 1938]

MORE BATTLESHIPS OR MORE A. A. A. MONEY?

Farmers are locking horns with the admirals and generals in Congress just now. Farmers are not satisfied with their $400,000,000 budget for soil-conservation expenses. They want at least $200,000,000 more to provide parity payments to help bring production under control on a voluntary basis and to assist in pushing farm income up.

The admirals and generals are not satisfied with the $600,000,000 they got annually for national defense in the period from 1923 to 1935. They want a 1939 budget of $991,000,000. Much of this increase goes to the Navy for new battleships.

Should the admirals and generals get their raise? If they do, it is pretty certain farmers won't get theirs.

Every farmer knows the argument for using parity payments to influence acreage and to increase farm income. But what is the argument for boosting Army and Navy expenses?

Two arguments are used. One is that we must have more ships for adequate national defense. The other is that spending this much extra money would help pay rolls and industry.

The second argument isn't worth much. If the Government wants to spend additional millions to stimulate business, let it invest the money in soil conservation, in bridges, schools, roads, or something else that has real value, instead of on battleships that will be junked in a few years. If we're going to spend money, let's spend it for something we can get some good out of.

The national-defense argument looks much stronger. Everybody is in favor of adequate national defense.

But adequate defense of what?

If we mean adequate defense of the United States, we have plenty of ships now. Our Navy is about the same size as Great Britain's, and far greater than that of any other nation. Naval experts tell us that for a foreign power to attack across the Pacific, and be strong enough to defeat our fleet in its home waters, it would have to have a navy twice as large as ours.

No foreign power, and no possible combination of foreign powers, has that large a navy.

But if, by adequate defense, we mean adequate defense, not of the United States, but of American investments all over the world, then our Navy isn't nearly large enough. If we want a navy big enough to protect our Chinese trade by defeating Japan in Asiatic waters, we should have a navy twice as big as that of Japan.

Congress cannot provide for adequate defense until it decides what the words mean.

For defense of the home country, the present Army and Navy and a budget on the basis of 1923–35 expenses are entirely adequate.

For defense of American investments everywhere in the world, we need an army and navy enormously increased, with a budget of billions, instead of the $991,000,000 asked for.

Which do we want?

Wallaces' Farmer and Iowa Homestead believes that Corn Belt farmers will prefer a defense program devoted to protection of the United States on a budgetary basis like that of the 1923–35 period.

But will Congress go along? Will Congress prefer to spend additional funds on supporting farm income or on supporting the makers of battleships?

[From Wallaces' Farmer, March 12, 1938]

PLENTY BIG ENOUGH FOR DEFENSE

To those easily frightened people who want to vote for a bigger Navy lest Japan come over and gobble us up, we want to quote from a statement of Admiral H. E. Yarnell, now in command of the Asiatic fleet. He said:

"When we come to discuss the problem of defending the Pacific coast, it is reasonable to assume that the enemy will require the same advantages and preparedness to come to our coast that we feel are necessary to us in advancing our forces to the western Pacific. Hence, the inhabitants of the Pacific coast can sleep quietly in their beds until Japan builds a navy twice the strength of that of the United States."

Last reports were that Japan had 10 battleships to our 15. And the battleship is the major weapon for an attack delivered across so many miles.

Admiral Yarnell has repeated the orthodox Navy view. To attack Japan successfully in her home waters, we would need a fleet twice as large as Japan's. For Japan to attack us successfully in our home waters, she would require a fleet twice as large as ours.

If the admirals are correct, then why does the United States need to build more battleships? If our present Navy is almost equal to a 30-battleship Japanese Navy in a defensive battle in our home waters, why should we worry about Japan's 10 ships? And why should we start a new billion-dollar shipbuilding program?

[From Wallace's Farmer, April 9, 1938]

TAKING THE ROAD TO WAR

Is the United States going to stick its nose into another European war?

Corn Belt farmers would like to know.

The signs are bad. In 1916, we were told that Great Britain and France were fighting to preserve democracy and end dictatorship. But when the war was over, we found that these powers were grabbing land and uniting in a vicious peace treaty that produced a new crop of dictators.

Today, the news is being broadcast in the United States that we must associate ourselves with Great Britain and France to check the advance of Hitler and Mussolini.

We ought to realize that it was the peace policy of Great Britain and France that hatched out Hitler, and that the menace of the dictators is a menace to Great Britain's Egypt and to France's Morocco, but not to us.

Neither Hitler nor Mussolini is trying to grab off New York or Miami.

We may not like dictators as well as we like the parliamentary governments of France and Great Britain, but is that dislike strong enough among our citizens to put us into another war to preserve the African and Asiatic possessions of the democratic powers?

In 1916, we began to develop a larger Army and Navy, presumably for defense, but actually as an offensive weapon to use in Europe the next year.

Today, we have made an increase in our annual military and Navy budget from the $600,000,000 that was ample in the 1923–35 period to nearly $991,000,000. And the House of Representatives has passed a bill providing for the expenditure of an additional $1,113,000,000 over the next few years for more naval weapons.

In 1916, before we entered the World War, the United States lent money to warring nations, and then we found that where our cash was there our hearts turned also. Today, the Johnson Act, which forbids any foreign nation that is in default on a debt to the United States, to float loans in this country, stands as a safeguard to keep us from committing a similar error. All of the major nations in Europe are in default to us. None, under the present act, can float bonds here.

But we must be constantly on the alert. Somebody will be trying to change that, too.

In 1916 we shipped munitions and goods of all kinds to warring nations and built up an artificial prosperity on war trade. Today our Neutrality Act forbids shipments of munitions to countries engaged in war.

But the Neutrality Act is in danger. An attempt is being made to change the act so that the President can decide whether he wants to stop any sales of munitions by this country to either side or to both sides.

That, of course, means that the President would be given the power to declare war. For the United States to aid one group of nations by shipping munitions and to injure another by blocking shipments would be considered an act of war by the injured group.

Farmers of the Corn Belt should urge their Senators and Representatives to keep the United States from retracing the same path that led us into the war in 1917.

Defeat the naval-expansion measure. Defend the Neutrality Act. And, in regard to military and naval expenses, let our slogan be, "Millions for defense, but not one cent to send troops or battleships to Europe or Asia!"

[From Wallace's Farmer of September 24, 1938]

LET'S KEEP OUT OF WAR!

No American wants to get into another World War today. Neither did any American in 1914 want to get into the World War then.

But we got in anyway, didn't we?

That can happen again, unless we are smart enough to avoid the wrong turnings we took in the road from 1914 to 1917.

As this is written, Germany is on the verge of war with Czechoslovakia, with a strong chance that Russia, France, Great Britain, and Italy may be involved also. The crisis may come this week or next or may be postponed for months. Yet most competent observers seem to think that an explosion is certain.

Now or later, Great Britain and France seem destined to clash with Germany and Italy in a struggle for the mastery of Europe.

What will the United States do then?

If we do what we did in the years from 1914 to 1917, we will:

1. Lend money to the warring nations.
2. Build up a war-trade boom in munitions and other goods.
3. Permit ourselves to be tricked into thinking that we can help ourselves or the world by going into the war.

Our decision to go into the World War was not actually made in 1917. It was made when we permitted foreign bonds to be floated here, and when we allowed the boom in war goods to rise to a point where we had to continue that boom, by participation in the war, or bring on a domestic crash by refusing to sell any more goods abroad on credit.

The United States must decide soon whether to repeat these mistakes or to avoid them. Our Neutrality Act now provides:

1. No loans to warring nations.
2. No shipments of munitions.
3. No sale of other goods to warring nations except on a cash-and-carry basis.

This cash-and-carry program is weakened by the provision that the President is given power to apply it or not as he chooses.

Our Neutrality Act will help to keep us out of trouble, if it is retained and strengthened. But there is a strong campaign on to repeal it and to let the United States take sides.

Farmers must see that the Neutrality Act is kept intact and made more vigorous. They will have to sacrifice something in so doing. They will sell less pork and less wheat to Europe, and at lower prices, if a cash-and-carry provision exists than if American ships are permitted to carry supplies to warring nations.

But, remembering what the last war did to them, farmers may be willing to make some sacrifices to stay out.

In the congressional campaign now on, farmers who want peace and are willing to pay for it should see that candidates for the National Congress are on record for the preserving and strengthening of the Neutrality Act.

This time, let's mind our own business and stay out of trouble.

Last Frontier

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES L. McNARY

OF OREGON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 21 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ARTICLE BY RICHARD L. NEUBERGER IN AUGUST 1940 ISSUE OF FREE AMERICA

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article from the August 1940 issue of Free America, by Richard L. Neuberger, entitled "Last Frontier."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Free America, August 1940]

It has become axiomatic to say that the American frontier is gone. And perhaps in the old sense of the word it is. Forty-seven years have passed since Frederick Jackson Turner wrote his great essay on the impact which the passing of that frontier would have on our social and economic institutions. Yet the National Resources Committee maintains today that one vast region of the United States "still has some of the aspects of the frontier."

This region is the Pacific Northwest, stretching in timbered majesty from the Continental Divide to headlands that break off into the Pacific Ocean. It covers 11 percent of the country's area, but has only about 3 percent of the people. Seven times as large as the State of New York, it has a population about half that of New York City. Malheur County in Oregon, for example, encompasses more territory than New Jersey, yet is inhabited by fewer souls than the single New Jersey community of Ridgewood.

The Pacific Northwest represents an opportunity to build a society that will, in the opinion of President Roosevelt, "avoid some of the mistakes and wasteful exploitation of resources that have caused such serious problems in other parts of the country." The Northwest, which consists of Washington, Oregon, Idaho, and that section of Montana west of the crest of the Rockies, has yet to fall into the old patterns that jar the mind and eye in so many regions. Its destiny is still to be shaped. It can build a new civilization without having to rehabilitate a civilization already founded.

The most important resource in the Pacific Northwest is the Columbia River. This waterway, the second mightiest river on the continent, contains in the main stream and its tributaries 42 percent of all the latent hydroelectricity in the United States. The Columbia pushes through the Cascade Mountains with a ponderous strength that is beyond computation. It snaps at granite cliffs with talons of white-capped water. It surges inexorably against basalt battlements and sandstone bluffs. And now it tosses fitfully at the foundations of two enormous dams—Bonneville, a $75,000,000 goliath at tidewater, and Grand Coulee, biggest structure ever built by man, located in the heart of the inland empire.

These two huge undertakings will produce more power than the 14,082,282,000 kilowatt-hours turned out by the 260 electric plants in the State of New York. Obviously, all this staggering supply of energy cannot be used in the farms and homes of the Northwest. New industries must absorb a great portion of it. Will these industries be scattered all over the region or will they be concentrated near the source of power, clustered like pup tents about the dam?

In September of 1937 the President dedicated Bonneville Dam. Standing beneath the dark crags of the Columbia gorge, he delivered a speech which has been forgotten in the mad welter of wars, foreign crises, and political emergencies. Yet it was an important speech from the standpoint of America's future, and particularly important to the future of the Pacific Northwest. The President said the Northwest should not be a land of new "Pittsburghs." And then he added: "It is because I am thinking of the Nation and the region 50 years from now that I venture the further prophesy that as time passes we will do everything in our power to encourage the building up of the smaller communities of the United States. Today many people are beginning to realize that there is an inherent weakness in cities which become too large and inherent strength in a wider geographical distribution of population.

"No one would suggest that the great cities of Portland and Tacoma and Seattle and Spokane should stop their growth, but it is a fact that they could grow unhealthily at the expense of all the smaller communities of which they form logical centers."

This speech went further in the direction of what John Chamberlain calls a "free, decentralist economy" than any other utterance by Mr. Roosevelt. The policy it inaugurated in the Northwest has also been in that direction. "Postage-stamp rates" govern the cost of power from Bonneville Dam. This means that the rates are no higher at the end of the transmission line than in the immediate vicinity of Bonneville. The necessity for new "Pittsburghs" is obviated. Two factories built to make use of Bonneville power—the Aluminum Co. of America and the Sierra Iron Works—are under construction not in Portland or Seattle but in the much smaller community of Vancouver, Wash. (population, 15,766). The Pennsylvania Salt Co. has an option on land in the Oregon hamlet of Cascade Locks (population, 1,135).

Near both Vancouver and Cascade Locks are grassy slopes and timbered swales where people can cultivate small farms. When the country was in the worst throes of the depression some unemployed families from the cities trekked to Yacolt Mountain, not far from Vancouver. They cleared land, built cabins, and tilled gardens. Today they are still there, living off the soil. The Northwest is not yet blanketed with cities, towns, roadways, and factories. All its territory has not been taken up. The Federal Government owns half the region.

With thousands of men and women struggling with submarginal farms in the Middle West, with the metropolitan areas of the Atlantic seaboard crowded and jammed, the Pacific Northwest is a national safety valve. It is the one section of America capable of absorbing more population. Maj. Roy F. Bessey, of the National Resources Committee, announces that "with a reasonable development program, from one million to two and a half million additional people could readily be absorbed in the Pacific Northwest within a generation. Migration toward the region during recent years seems to indicate that the population increase may approach the higher figure."

The Northwest is vast and expansive. The population increase to which Major Bessey refers should be spread throughout the region and not concentrated in a few localities. This is not alone the hope of President Roosevelt. CHARLES L. MCNARY, senior Senator from Oregon and Republican candidate for Vice President, has often advocated the development of the whole river basin. He thinks every home ought to have a "kitchen garden." Several years ago Stuart Chase proposed that the Northwest be stabilized by having industrial workers there live on small farms that would serve as "anchors to windward" if the jobs threaten to give out.

The most important development now taking place in the Pacific Northwest is the construction of Grand Coulee. This stupendous structure, today nearing completion, will be the world's major source of hydroelectricity. It also will irrigate 1,200,000 acres of land, an area almost equal to all the farms in the State of Connecticut. This will not be soil that yields its bounty grudgingly. It will be rich, fertile land on an alluvial plainland capable of growing pears, peas, strawberries, apples, and the other prize fruits and vegetables of the Northwest.

The Coulee section will not be allowed to become either an overpopulated metropolitan area or a feudal domain of corporate farms. Congressman CHARLES H. LEAVY, of Spokane, has pointed out that the purpose of Grand Coulee is to take care of as many families as possible. Accordingly landownership at the great project will be restricted to 80 acres for a family and 40 acres for a single man. Combines and other large-scale operations will not be permitted. Land held in defiance of this limitation will be denied water from the Government canals and ditches.

At the same time that the dam itself rises above the murmuring river, the Bureau of Reclamation and the National Resources Committee are working to bar from the agricultural area the mistakes which are a blight in so many sections of the country. Jammed towns and crowded communities will be taboo. Recreational centers, schools, rural parks, warehouses, markets, public buildings—all will dot the entire 1,200,000 acres rather than become concentrated in any one place. An effort will be made to secure truck gardens even for the men and women living in the villages and hamlets. The land will be the basis of the whole society. And, as the St. Louis Post-Dispatch has claimed, the troublesome dilemma of agricultural surpluses will be largely avoided if most of the food raised at Grand Coulee is thus used for home consumption.

Irrigation and reclamation projects are the hope of the Northwest. Secretary of the Interior Ickes has estimated that besides Grand Coulee, smaller irrigation enterprises can reclaim 104,491 acres in the region. Such undertakings are bolstering the population total. One county in Oregon has increased 75 percent in inhabitants since 1930. This is due exclusively to a busy sugar-beet industry made possible by irrigation dams. The farms are not large, but they have been successful and are supporting hundreds of families. Many of these families are migrants from the Dust Bowl and other dried-out agricultural areas.

It is not without significance that the population rise in the Pacific Northwest in the last 10 years has been predominantly in the rural and suburban districts. The decade just closed was productive of events that sent 200,000 people trekking to the State of Washington, 175,000 to Oregon and 85,000 to Idaho. They have not rushed to the cities. "In the past few years," says Arthur Langlie, the mayor of Seattle, "there has been a trend of population away from the cities to the suburban areas." And augmenting his statement, the Seattle Post-Intelligencer observes, "Seattle folk are demanding and getting lebensraum."

Seattle is the biggest city in the Northwest. Since 1930 its population has changed only slightly. Yet the surrounding countryside has filled up like a mushroom patch. Suburban communities dot numerous roads and highways. Groves of fir trees have been cut down, and in their place are rural homes with small truck-gardens. Most of these people work in Seattle, but they live outside Seattle in the adjacent rural districts. Seattle itself has had the smallest proportionate census increase in 60 years, yet the Pacific Northwest as a whole reports extensive gains.

Consider what has happened in Oregon. Portland is the only community of metropolitan proportions in that State. Since 1930 the Portland population has increased 2 percent. But the entire State has gained 14 percent, and the rural regions around Portland have soared 33 percent. Newcomers formerly rode into Portland on a train and took a lease on four rooms in an apartment house. Now they roll in on a wide highway, driving their coupe or sedan, and start making down payments on a bungalow and truck garden 14 or 15 miles from the city proper.

The eminent geographer J. Russell Smith once declared, "Basing my assertion on past history and economic and industrial conditions of today, it is in the Northwest where I expect American civilization, in many ways, to reach its maximum. Yes; I expect that it will outstrip New York, overcoming the advantage which the metropolis has had of an early start." Predictions of this sort are quite common in the Northwest. Why not? We live in an electric age, and any area with the greatest power stream on earth is bound to have the open sesame to future industrial development.

Although the people of the Columbia Basin want to fulfill J. Russell Smith's glowing prophecy and outstrip New York in some respects, they are not eager to outstrip it in others. Glittering word pictures of an industrial mecca have not been applauded in the region. The residents want new industries, new manufacturing, new mills, but they do not want crowded cities, densely settled factory towns, houses row on row like shoe boxes on a shelf. This attitude has been demonstrated many times.

Before President Roosevelt delivered his dedicatory address at Bonneville Dam, controversy over the disposal of the project's energy had been taking place for 6 months. One group wanted a vast factory community concentrated near the dam. The other faction maintained that factories should be scattered all over the Northwest, that power rates should not favor nearby industries and thus tend to build up new "Pittsburghs." The latter group won out. It attracted the support of most of the people. It defeated for reelection the Oregon Governor, who had been the main advocate of the new "Pittsburgh" idea.

There is no doubt that the Pacific Northwest requires more industrial development. Today the region ships out raw materials—timber, wheat, salmon, copper, apples—and buys back finished products. This unfavorable balance of trade cannot continue indefinitely. Resources play out some time. A Douglas fir can be sawed down in an hour; it took a couple of centuries to grow. Ultimately the Northwest must process and manufacture many of its raw products. But it does not want to trade the problems of a frontier, a frontier that may be even a colonial empire, if you please, for the more aggravating problems of a complex metropolitan area.

"Let our workshops remain in Europe," warned Jefferson. During the struggle over Bonneville power rates, these words of his appeared in many rural papers: "I view great cities as pestilential to the health, the morals, and the liberties of man." Inasmuch as he had first sent Lewis and Clark westward, he was cited as the unquestionable authority on the region's destiny. The mandate eventually ordered for the same electric rates all along the transmission line—a line 275 miles long—was not a mandate against factories and industries per se, but against industries and factories compounded into places like Pittsburgh, Chicago, and Detroit.

Men and women in the Pacific Northwest have a chance to combine manufacturing progress with home life close to the soil. The region is still untrammeled and open; and the inhabitants have not lost their pioneering zeal. They would rather live bravely than hit the jackpot. "Stricken the region is now, its pioneer economy a wreck," wrote George Leighton a year ago, analyzing the collapse of the lumber industry. "But its people still are free." And free they are, choosing a frontier society to an imitation of the Atlantic seaboard.

"I think we must still continue," says E. B. MacNaughton, a forward-looking banker in Portland, "to make it possible for people who have been divested of their chance to be able again to strike their boots in and become self-respecting members in our communities and in our States." Unlike California, where the migrants are adrift on the highways, the Northwest has offered sanctuary to the wanderers from the midwestern drought regions. Many of them have found new farms; some have taken over old farms and made them yield pay crops.

The frontier is closed in the sense that Professor Turner considered it. No longer can a man wander into the Idaho wilderness and find land stretching to the horizon that will grow heavy stands of wheat. But in the Columbia River Basin, conservation and development still can be used to reclaim some of the frontier. Dams and canals and tree breaks can provide new acreage. Hundreds of farms on the gaunt plateaus, thousands of truck gardens in the dales and valleys near Portland and Seattle, indicate that all avenues of escape from the city are not yet barred. The Northwest remains.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. THORKELSON

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 21, 1940

ARTICLE FROM THE SAN FRANCISCO LEADER, FEBRUARY 17 AND 24, 1912

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my own remarks in the RECORD, I include an article which is a reprint from the San Francisco Leader of February 17 and 24, 1912, by Lillian Scott Troy. The article is entitled "Benedict Arnold Peace Society—Some Inside and Interesting History of the Infamous Peace Proposal—How the Scheme To Form an Alliance With England Is Being Engineered—Carnegie's Crafty Method."

This is in line with the other matter which I have inserted in the RECORD, of which it is part VI. In these articles I have made it a point to show that this insidious British influence to return the United States as a colony of Great Britain has been active for over a hundred years.

BENEDICT ARNOLD PEACE SOCIETY—SOME INSIDE AND INTERESTING HISTORY OF THE INFAMOUS "PEACE" PROPOSAL; HOW THE SCHEME TO FORM AN ALLIANCE WITH ENGLAND IS BEING ENGINEERED; CARNEGIE'S CRAFTY METHOD

(By Lillian Scott Troy)

Andrew Carnegie is in high favor in England just now. Britons who formerly sneered at the return of the Scot American to his native Highland heath biyearly, now nod satisfied approval when the iron master's name is mentioned.

When English sneer, they hate; when they hate, they hate forever. Why this sudden change? Carnegie's money? No! His libraries, hero funds, etc.? No! His ambition? Yes!

Within the soul of the little Scotsman dwells a burning weakness, which only an experienced physiognomist could discern in his immobile features.

Ambition! Mad ambition; the ambition of Caesar.

The man who so cleverly amassed one of the largest individual fortunes it has been man's luck to gather together in the age of the world would be less than human had he not some weakness. To be ambitious is good but to be ambitious with a feverish but deliberate intensity which sacrifices principle for trickery and craftiness is bad. The master mind that engineered the ways and means to a colossal fortune has no limitations! Carnegie expands and basks in the limelight; it is the one joy of his declining years.

Since the visit of King Edward to Skibo Castle in Scotland, a new germ of ambition has been sown in the mind and soul of the Scotsman. On that memorable day, when he was honored by the King of England, a flag floated over Skibo Castle, which showed the Stars and Stripes on one side and the British flag on the other. As the King was leaving the castle, after offering Carnegie a dukedom—on terms, the laird of the castle is said to have raised his hand to the flag and exclaimed subjectively, "Your Majesty entered Skibo Castle under the American flag, and the British flag flies over your Majesty as you leave. May there be only one flag over Skibo Castle when your Majesty graciously design to enter again, and may that flag be the British flag. And may it also float over the United States from the Atlantic to the Pacific."

Immediately after the peacemaker's visit, the Carnegie peace fund was started in America.

The fair name of peace was substituted for treachery and betrayal. The word "peace" caught the popular mind for the moment. The subtlety which marks the character of Andrew Carnegie forbade mentioning arbitration with England until the peace fund had been well advertised, and duly cemented in the minds of the American people as the best scheme for good the laird of Skibo had initiated.

The "Peace" Fund Committee was painstakingly selected, with a careful regard for future development. And trading under the holy name of "peace" the object and aim of this congenial committee (neat salaries, etc.) was what? To sell the United States to England!

These were the terms demanded for Carnegie's dukedom! His money could buy men buyable, to favor "peace," it could buy or lease secretly newspapers to spread broadcast Carnegian doctrine until their protean proclivities gradually permeated into easily influenced minds; it could hire unnaturalized Englishmen or Canadians who had lived and amassed fortunes in the United States but who found the land of their long residence too inferior for adoption, to spread the doctrine; and lastly, to be ultracharitable, it could even pull the wool over the eyes of the President of the United States!

This sudden haste about arbitration was unwittingly brought about by the impending war between England and Germany. Carnegie was forced on against his will and more farsighted judgment to bring about a working "entente" with the United States before Germany made any hostile move against England. In fact, the United States was to be held over the head of their friend Germany in the shape of a "big stick" by England.

Look well at the men who are talking themselves hoarse trying to tell us why we must have arbitration with England. Is there a man amongst them who is a representative American? Is there one whose patriotism for America we would class with that of Washington, Jefferson, or with that of any of the great men who have passed away, but whose example of shunning "entangling alliances" has helped to make America what it is today, the sun in the constellation of nations?

Of Carnegie I have already spoken—and sparingly. And what of Mr. Eliot of Harvard? We are told that the gentleman is an Englishman and as such probably knows what is good for England more interestedly than he knows what is bad for America.

Mr. Choate, the ex-Ambassador to Great Britain? This gentleman was principally notorious for his ultra-English tendencies and sympathies when Ambassador to Great Britain; and any fame he may have attained was chiefly as an after-dinner speaker.

Mr. Whitelaw Reid, the present Ambassador to Great Britain? This gentleman is remarkable for the facility with which he manages to marry his relatives of the gentler sex off to decadent members of the English nobility; and also almost famous for the beaming smile he bestowed upon Commander Sims of the U. S. S. Minnesota when that previously inspired American officer made his clever faux pas at the Guildhall luncheon in London, given to the officers and sailors of the American Fleet in the Thames some short time since. This speech, which the Englishment gulped down with joy, and which gave serious offense to Germany, contained these most un-American sentiments:

"If Great Britain were to be threatened with an external foe, she could count upon every dollar, every man, and every drop of blood in America."

Like the famous speech of an ex-President of the United States at the Guildhall some time previous, it is generally accepted that Commander Sims simply had his little say, as he was parroted to, and felt amply repaid in the genial nod and beaming smile of approval of the American Ambassador.

This speech was intended to convey false news to Germany; it was intended to scare Germany off.

If the little "feeler" passed unchallenged in America, the intended end would have been accomplished; if exception were taken as to how and for whom we Americans were willing to shed every drop of our blood, there was Sims to be the scapegoat.

I am in Germany as I write this and I want to say right here that Commander Sims' unlucky inspiration has done exactly what these "Benedict Arnolds" expected it to do, and the American people have been greatly injured in the eyes of a friendly nation. Without any other reason than that the Germans have made such wonderful progress in their foreign trade, England has continually insulted and misrepresented German motives and ideals until an industrious people have had the last straw added and they are going to have compensation.

The Boer War opened the eyes of England to her own delinquency and she discovered, after all the rest of the world had done so, that she was the happy possessor of an army that was "brag" and a navy officered by sap-headed gentlemen's sons which was all "boast."

The bragging, boasting, and bluffing went merrily on, but Great Britain immediately began to look around for crutches and a cane. She made an alliance with Japan; Germany minded her own business and sawed wood. She made an "entente" with her old bitter enemy, France; Germany continued to saw wood and work. She made an alliance with Russia and then triumphantly began to insult Germany. She made demands on Germany—commanded her to cease increasing her navy. Germany quietly told Great Britain that her armaments would increase in the ratio of Great Britain's hostile alliances. England tried bluffing and got her bluff nearly called. Germany said she was ready to take her chances with the quartet of England, Japan, France, and Russia, but politely added that she much preferred to work and increase the prosperity and happiness of her people; but * * * If Great Britain wished to have a little fracas * * * "Barkis was willin'."

Like the slinking coyote which has the will and desire but not the courage to pounce on the lamb, England, with all the reinforcements of three other hungry powers, decided that the time to attack Germany had not yet come. And then the question of how, was the nightmare of Great Britain. A man of initiative, clever in handling difficult situations with dispatch was needed. America was looked to with covetous eyes—but no Englishman dare suggest arbitration. Why? Because the American mind would immediately become suspicious of a "nigger in the woodpile." The suggestion must come from an American! It must appear as if America graciously made the initial move, and England immediately fell into her arms.

Andrew Carnegie, whose sentiments were always British, while willing to father the scheme and pay the bills, was too far sighted to openly suggest the idea himself, knowing the propensity of the American people to ask embarrassing questions, so he whispered first to the King, and the peacemaker found Carnegie's whisper so dashingly funny that he must hold his kingly sides in acute risibility.

The question of arbitration with England must come from no lesser an American than the President of the United States!

Pulling England's chestnuts out of the fire—no wonder the King laughed!

Then the canny Scot, the clever organizer, came to the United States on mischief bent. He tickled President Taft under the ribs and cooed something into his ear—several things. And out of a clear sky "our" President—all by himself (?)—holds out the glad hand to England and says, "Let us arbitrate."

And he says he thought it all out by himself! Ananias!

One high in authority and near to the Throne, in a speech in 1908 said: "In seven years the Union Jack will float over the whole of the United States."

Elihu Root wishes us to celebrate one hundred years of peace with England in 1915—the seventh year. Synchronism!

Why not celebrate with our friends, with whom we have never had war? Why celebrate with the only nation on earth who has always been and still is our own enemy, the only nation who has had the distinction of oppressing us, and whose smoldering hate and contempt for the "Yankee" is only second to the hate and ill will she bears her Irish and Indian subjects?

The present King of England openly boasts that if George III (3rd) had held court in New York, there would have been no American Revolution. The Queen, a woman hard and cold as Queen Elizabeth but without Elizabeth's brains, detests Americans fiercely. No opportunity is lost in showing her royal contempt even to American women who have, by marrying musty and decaying scions of the British nobility, not only reinstated their husbands in three full meals a day, but their whole families as well.

The Duchess of Marlborough was insulted before the world at the Coronation. Why? Because she was a hated "Yankee".

It is quite safe to say that the only Americans who are treated by the English royalties as if they were human beings are the numerous relatives of Ambassador Reid. Not that the Reids are supposed to be in any degree more eligible than any other American family, but because Mr. Reid is and may still be very useful in furthering the arbitration treaty—and a few other things.

The Liberal and the Irish parties have on two occasions taken serious umbrage at Ambassador Reid's attempt to take sides in the British election. At one time it was thought that the Irish party would take the matter to Washington.

On last Thanksgiving Day, Ambassador Reid contemptuously aired his opinion of Americans at the dinner given by the American Society in London. He said that Americans who visited England were generally of two kinds: Those who referred to America as "God's country" and who couldn't find anything as good in England as in America, and women who wished to intrude their republican presence on English royalty.

And thus in a public speech did the man who represents the United States in Great Britain hold his own countrymen and countrywomen up to ridicule. And on Thanksgiving Day, a day on which, if he couldn't bring himself to say something fair and kind, he had done better to have held his peace.

The English newspapers made much of Ambassador Reid's anti-American speech. Many were the gloating references made to the effect that even the American Ambassador could not stand his own people. And why, may the American people consistently ask, does our patriotic reference to the United States as "God's country" exasperate Mr. Whitelaw Reid to such an extent that he must select Thanksgiving Day of all days to criticize at a public dinner our warm-hearted and truthful reference to our own country? As to the American women he holds in such contempt for endeavoring to "intrude" their republican presence on English royalty, why should they not, if they wish to, and royalty wants their money to save the disintegrating nobility? Can Mr. Reid, with all his close experience of royalty, begin to compare any royal house in the world with even the average American family? No! Can he compare any of the royal women with American women in refinement, courtesy, genuine kindness, brains, wit, or honorable pride and virtue? No doubt the United States Ambassador, knowing the distaste the English King and Queen have for Americans, would turn it to account by barring out all but his numerous family and family-in-law from the sensitive royal presence. One has only to glance casually at the picture of the group of guests at Ambassador Reid's country home in England, where King Edward is seen sitting close to D. O. Mills, Mr. Reid's father-in-law, to observe the angry and disgusted expression on His Majesty's face at being roped in so neatly and being obliged to sit and have his royal face and figure taken "with that d——d old nobody, Mills."

But the possibility of an entente with America, and possibly in time—well, the King was only playing the game, even if it did upset him.

Cecil Rhodes' dream of empire found expression in his legacy providing for the education of American youths in England. Rhodes hoped that the process of time would gradually prove an influence in changing the history of the United States as it is written and studied in America to the way England teaches it in her colleges and desires that it should be taught in America in order to "do justice to England."

Rhodes sagaciously remarked that as far as education went, every 10 years saw a new generation. As the influence of American boys educated under English direction increased, so would the tendency to rewrite the history of the United States become easier to suggest and more certain of success. The history of our country as written, studied, and believed in England would put Baron Munchausen to shame.

The first seeds of hate for America are sown in the young student's mind by a cruelly calumnious attack upon George Washington. George Washington is spoken of as a "most inferior rebel general." One wonders what were the delinquencies of the British he whipped. Children are taught that Americans are the refuse of Europe; the descendents of servants, adventurers, and criminals.

The Japanese are right when they say that a secret is best kept by three men when only one man knows it.

Intoxicated with what appeared to them as signs of success in the great "peace" fraud, there are a few whose loquacity, whose brag of American dependence, is more fluent than their silence. Hence this article.

We are told in England that Andrew Carnegie is a loyal subject of the King, and has sworn allegiance to the British crown. Although born a Scotsman, no American cares a rap whether he is a Scotsman or a Frenchman or a Russian, but we most certainly do take exception to his pretending to the American people that he is acting for the best interests of America as an American when he is neither the one thing, nor doing the other.

Why was President Taft in such an indelicate hurry to rush the arbitration treaties through the Senate last July? Because Germany was preparing to attack Great Britain in August, and only the moral influence of a possible entente between Great Britain and the United States, which at a moment's notice could be widened into an offensive and defensive alliance, prevented hostilities.

Mr. Astor, otherwise known as the expatriated American, is keenly in favor of "peace." That's enough to make us suspicious. He loves America so.

John Hays Hammond is in favor of "peace," too. Our President commented most kindly on the warm reception accorded Mr. Hammond at the coronation last June.

And why was John Hays Hammond sent to represent the United States at the coronation of the King and Queen? Why did he receive such a fall-into-my-waiting-arms reception? Because he fought in South Africa with the English against the brave Boers. Also because he is all for England and Carnegie "peace."

While no one in their normal senses would question or attack the patriotism, guilelessness or artless simplicity of heart of Elihu Root, yet—keep your weather eye on him.

Many reputable citizens whose patriotism was unquestioned were misled into taking an active interest in public demonstrations in favor of the special brand of buncombe called Carnegie "peace." The chief aim and object of getting prominent names associated with Mr. Carnegie's scheme was partially successful for a short period but now the eyes of the deceived are widely opened to the full and complete campaign of treachery launched against the United States in Skibo Castle.

If the arbitration treaties must be discussed in the Senate, let the debate be an open session, and let us mark well the men who call upon the dishonored spirit of Benedict Arnold to help them to a ready flow of eloquence that they may hide under their scintillating utterances the sardonic curl of a traitor's lips.

The following is what a few very ambitious but traitorous Americans in high positions could tell us if they would, and to which policies they have either pledged their wealth, their brains, or their influence. Many of these men are under pay from a fund which has given none of its "peace" money to prevent war between Italy and Turkey, or any other nations or peoples at war; a fund which under a false name, is only being used, and only will be used to assist to the utmost the destruction of American independence, and the slow or fast betraying of America's nationhood into the ready hands of the only genuine enemies she has ever had.

As far as can be ascertained, the following are the guidance rules laid down for the accomplishment of this secret society which we can make no mistake in calling the "Benedict Arnold Peace Society."

1. Power of the President of the United States to be increased so as to gradually diminish the powers of Congress.

2. Supreme Court of the United States to be revised so as to embrace only judges agreeable to absorption by Great Britain, and uniformly hostile to the United States Senate.

3. Precedents must be established by said Court against the United States Senate in rulings, decisions, etc., (specially prepared).

4. Strong campaign must be waged in the several States and Territories against Congressmen and Senators showing hosility to Great Britain. If unsuccessful in defeating them, they must be continually watched until discovered in some overt act, mainly personal, and under threat of exposure forced to resign.

5. When the success of the arbitration treaties is assured a few unimportant disputes between the United States and Great Britain may arise, in which the preference must be given to the United States. These apparent victories must be widely advertised in order to create confidence in the propitiousness of arbitration with Great Britain. While the scope of the treaties must be of considerable latitude, care must be taken not to in any way bring such questions as to the fortification or navigation of the Panama Canal, or the Monroe Doctrine, into dispute until the situation is under firm control.

6. As soon as compatible with conditions, the arbitration treaties must be widened into an offensive and defensive alliance.

7. On accomplishment of same, British and American naval officers must be mutually exchanged, but care must be taken that this suggestion is made by an American.

8. Quietly and unobtrusively, American soldiers must be sent to Egypt and India; British soldiers may then be quartered in the United States.

9. English royalty, preferably the Duke and Duchess of Connaught, must be sent to Canada, from whence they must make frequent trips to New York. But great care must be taken not to enter Washington if there is a demonstration against them, or until they have practically "held court" in New York.

10. The wives and daughters of men controlling great wealth and influence in America must be given preference at these "courts." They must be selected carefully from every State and Territory in the United States. Thus a new "society," through royal favor, must quietly and expeditiously be created.

11. Honors must be conferred on the husbands of women thus given preference in the social circles of America, and a rank or position determined by judiciously distributed decorations.

12. Honor must be conferred on all American officers favoring "peace."

13. The women of men showing hostility to "peace" must be socially ostracized.

14. When a strong phalanx of influential people in favor of "peace" has been created, and the exchange of British and American naval officers accomplished, and as many as possible of the United States troops transported to India, the King and Queen of England may then visit Washington.

15. Should any demonstration of hostilities to their Majesties occur, the Hindu troops and the British may, in the absence of the American soldiers, quell any disturbances.

16. Men whose wealth prevents their being influenced by money must have honors and position and possibly a title dangled before their wives' eyes.

17. When newspapers cannot be bought or leased, new publications must be started.

18. Educators must receive special favors in flattering newspaper notices; and wide publicity must not be given to Independence Day celebrations; people persisting in demonstrations must be "cut" and held up to ridicule. Any demonstrations with fireworks must be strongly opposed and discouraged on the ground of protection to life and property.

19. An elaborate celebration must be arranged to take place in the United States in 1915, to commemorate 100 years of peace between Great Britain and America, by which time the object and aim of "peace" will be at the apex of consummation.

20. Education of the masses must be discouraged, in order to create harmony with the desires of the wealthy and the several trusts, who will see in such a suggestion a strong tendency to reduce wages from their now unreasonable heights to the basis of wages paid in Great Britain; also, the suggestion that the ignorant cannot organize so formidably as the educated masses will be widely appreciated as dissension and suspicion of their own leaders can be more easily advanced.

21. A popular feeling against Irish immigration may be aroused in the United States by giving wide publicity to all individual cases of rejection of immigrants for reasons of acute poverty, insanity or criminality, or disease.

22. Arbitration, offensive or defensive alliances, and finally peace must be brought about as quickly as possible. For the latter, armed compulsion may be necessary, and it is recommended that the Indian and British troops be altogether confined to the east of America, leaving the protection of the west to the Japanese troops, 80,000 of which are already scattered throughout the Sandwich Islands, Mexico, British Columbia, and California. Reciprocity with Canada can be passed almost unanimously through the American Congress, and then opposed bitterly in Canada on one ground only—that of annexation by the United States. Simultaneously with the rejection of reciprocity by the Canadian people, a member of the British royal family, preferably the Duke of Connaught, must take up his residence in Canada.

23. With the assistance of some interested and powerful trust, such as the Meat Trust, strained relations may be brought about between Germany and the United States; in such event, and with a defensive and offensive alliance with Great Britain, a casus belli of England would be more easily turned into account by a simultaneous attack on Germany. Great Britain's diplomatic relations with Germany must remain intact until the consummation of the alliances with the United States.

24. It is suggested to embrace France in the arbitration treaties, for the moment, as suspicion must not be created during the initial efforts.

It will be remembered that when the Japanese hero of Port Arthur visited the United States last summer, he graciously informed us that "arbitration between Great Britain and the United States would be such a benefit to the United States." He had just come fresh from England; he hadn't been provisionally promised the Philippines, either in the event of * * *.

As the great Japanese admiral placed a wreath at Washington's Tomb, did any of us remember the almost prophetic words of the first American President, "to beware of entangling alliances"?

Let the shades of Benedict Arnold blush for shame, for there are those today who exceedeth him in treachery and betrayal. Away with the Carnegian peace at the price of liberty!

England's attempted dictation and interference both in our internal and foreign affairs is plainly and boldly illustrated in a book written by Lieutenant Colonel Lowther, military secretary and official mouthpiece of the Duke of Connaught. Lieutenant Lowther says that he suggested a solution of the Japanese tangle to Colonel Roosevelt, namely, that the United States of America should give the Japanese all the facilities they asked for in California, on condition that the Empire of the Rising Sun should take over the Philippines from the United States.

In these few words Lieutenant Lowther has embodied two shots for one bird:

Firstly, the flooding of the United States with cheap coolie labor will reduce wages, thus gradually making it more difficult for the man in ordinary circumstances to spare enough money to support his children during the time they should be in school, and thereby making it necessary for children's education to be reduced to the level of the children of the poor in England, which would tend in a very short time to make for a sharp class distinction or "illiterate rabble." This latter class is regarded as very desirable in England, as the more ignorant the lower classes, the more easily they are controlled.

Secondly, Japan wants the Philippines. Her alliance with England was made for one purpose, and that was, by the careful and cunning treading of certain intricate and complicated paths of diplomacy, to bring about the peaceful or otherwise militant absorption of the Philippines. England's alliance with Japan was made to offer the tempting bait of the Philippines as a reward for services which Japan must be ever prepared and ready to offer, if necessary.

What about the Japanese coaling station recently discovered in Mexico? Preparation?

Lieutenant Colonel Lowther has held the post of naval attaché; his advice has been highly appreciated in the deliberations of his Government; he has lately accompanied the uncle of the King of England to the United States as military secretary and official mouthpiece; therefore let no one discount his set idea of what our policy with the Philippines should be; a man so strictly trained in the policy and diplomacy of his Government speaks with authority from his King and government.

Should a suggestion be made to Congress that "it will be next to impossible to hold the Philippines without increasing our Army, which will entail a great burden of expense on the United States," it will be well to investigate the company the suggester of this statement has been keeping; also, if it is his own opinion, or if it is the opening wedge to the proposal of the English officer, Lieutenant Colonel Lowther, military attaché and official mouthpiece of the Duke of Connaught, to "turn over the Philippines to the Empire of the Rising Sun." * * *

The opening chapter of Lieutenant Colonel Lowther's book, in its general exaggeration of lawlessness in the United States, has helped to cement the idea in the English mind that the United States must come under British rule speedily.

Simultaneously with the publication of this British officer's book depicting Americans as a lot of wholesale murderers, devoid of the slightest honor or courage, and comparing them detrimentally to the gentlemen he had known in Pall Mall, he was scattering broadcast in New York and Washington his hypocritical expression of admiration for "the great Republic and the American people." His comparison of the Canadian soldier to the United States soldier leaves nothing to be admired in the American soldier. In fact, every reference to anything or anybody in America is teeming with contempt and bitterness. Even the clubs in the United States, which received him with open-hearted hospitality, he refers to with sneering contempt, and, to be accurate, one must say that many of his statements regarding the people whose bread he broke are devoid of the merits of truth.

The inefficiency of the Senators and Representatives is systematically advertised to the British public in cleverly written magazine and newspaper articles and books. The English portion of the British public are not overly given to think for themselves; when they read that India "must be governed," Egypt "must be governed," they are one with the Government; and now that they are daily and weekly being fed on the suggestion that the United States has completely gone to the bow-wows, and can only be saved if she throws herself into British arms, they won't let go of the idea, and will help to a man to bring about the consummation of "Carnegie peace."

Even Mr. A. Maurice Low, an Englishman who has lived in the United States for 20 years, tells his countrymen the following in his book on America:

"Secrecy is often essential in negotiations, but secrecy is impossible when a treaty must be communicated to the Senate. The Senate is not popular with the country at large."

He goes on to explain that Members of the Senate are certain to break their oath of secrecy taken regarding "executive sessions." He also says, "It is generally believed that Members of Congress, as a body, are corrupt."

Lest some of my statements regarding the hatred the English people cherish for America and the Americans be doubted, I am going to give a few extracts from a book written by an Englishman during the last term of the ex-President in the White House. While the actual literary merits of this book may be nil, its long and complicated sentences obscure and badly constructed, and its syntax amateurish, nevertheless its purpose and its veiled meaning is as clear as crystal. Every page of this book shows malice; every paragraph venom. When I first began to read this book—on the recommendation of another English writer that I would find out some truths about my own country—I naturally supposed the publication to be a sort of "freak" idea; but on closer investigation of all books written by Englishmen about the United States I found that nearly all of these books contained far-fetched lies and calumnies written with pens that were steeped in bitter jealousy, detestation, and hatred. "Americans who favor 'Carnegie peace,' otherwise called 'absorption,' will do well to read 'Y, America's Peril.'" The Y is intended to mean Yankee. This book is intensely popular in England, no less a personage than the late King Edward finding in it the best book on the "Yankee" he has ever read. The author is almost a hero. You had better make up your minds to read some things which you will find real "nawsty."

Following are a few printable extracts from this book:

"There can be no doubt that America is the dumping ground of Europe's refuse; it is the scum of other lands. It has no right to be called a nation. Everything in the United States seemed unwholesome. I think the desire for gold is so deep-rooted in Yankee that if he could "beat" his own father he would do it. In less than three generations the United States will be unfit for a civilized lady or gentleman to live in.

"From the boy who shines your boots to the Senator, they are a nation of boodlers. Americans are the cast-offs from every land on the face of the earth.

I saw a good deal of the American woman—in fact, "most all" that she could show me without exposing herself to Yankee's anger.

Verily Yankee's women, and sometimes unwise ones, do not believe in hiding the light of their charms under a bushel or anything else. By the time I had been in the States a month, I began to ask myself, was any woman in the land to be trusted?

I was informed * * * that in a western town, there was not a virtuous woman, and that 75 percent of them had suffered from "modern appendicitis."

(Writer's note—particulars regarding the explanation of this last statement, which appears in the book, cannot be printed.)

Yankee is a deadly assassin, worse than a rattlesnake. Yankee is awfully brave, especially when it is 20 to 1. Yankee does not care to fight with his fists. The American police are no more fitted for police than a barrel; they bear a resemblance to a walrus on end. The standard of fair play, even that of good taste, is not the same as in England. Yankee is vulgar and ignorant. He wears tan shoes with a dress suit. The typical American has no intellectuality. He has a nether lip like a motherless foal reared on a whisky bottle. His hair is cut "slop bowl" fashion. He is sallow, with pointed narrow jaw. Of this type are made magistrate, judges, and so forth. Young men of America are of the ladylike type. Men in America are effeminate looking. They are a mixture of poodle dog and girl.

It is quite a rarity to see an American city-bred child with legs. Their poor little apologetic pipestems are simply pitiful. Already this process of decay has begun. Yankee has no instep. His foot is as flat as a pancake and as "narrow as the trend of his mind." * * * His legs are thin, and so infrequently is his body. He is a tramcar. I visited the Philadelphia University and had a look through the dental school there. I inquired carefully for the specialists who would not take on anything but canines. I found that it had not come to that yet, but it is trending that way.

The carrion-eating vulture would have suited the Americans quite as well as an emblem of liberty as the eagle.

In four generations when the aggressive newness of the Congressional Library at Washington has been toned down, it may be a fine building. The Capitol is shoddy.

The English writers of books, and those who write for the press, have attacked and calumniated every ideal of our nationhood for generations, but they have left the virtue of our women unassailed until of late years. Where one heard a grudging compliment paid to the virtue of our women, now we hear the most cruel and untruthful aspersions cast upon them individually and collectively. There is no use to remonstrate; they will tell you that several English writers who visited the States have written in their books that the American woman is simply "rotten," and they ought to know. The English are more like sheep than lions; they herd close together in their opinions, which they generally do not form for themselves and when the leader of the flock says "bah," they all "bah, bah." If he says "boo," they all "boo" together. They read Y, America's Peril, because the King read it. They like it for the same reason he liked it—because it "slammed it to the Yankee upstarts."

This particular writer says he came away from America with a nasty taste in his mouth. He says the first hotel he stayed at was in San Francisco and the waiters look like "a lot of dirty brigands."

He evidently bears a most venomous spleen for Washington, like the rest of his compatriots. He says he doesn't see how Washington could have been an American if he never told a lie. Writing of the Washington Monument at Washington, he waxes torpidly eloquent. He says that Washington's Monument is a mere elevator "and like everything in America, from justice on, it is hollow and corrupt." He says the Washington Monument is typical of American usages and customs—hollow and corrupt. He adds: "Yankee! Yankee! have you anything in your land that is not hollow?" He calls the American boys "young American dastards. * * * Poor, pitiful little Yankees."

It is puzzling and singular that the only American he admires is Theodore Roosevelt, of whom he speaks pityingly as "Roosevelt, president of champion spitters of the world."

Like many Englishmen, he frets because on our currency we have the words "In God we trust." He says that this should be changed. It is to be wondered if the inspiration to eliminate "In God we trust" from our currency during the term of office of the only American this Englishman admired was done to solve the particular sensitiveness of this anti-American Britisher.

He says, "The dollar is dirty in the West. It is positively filthy in the East, both metaphorically and actually."

The inscription "In God we trust" is a lying religious inscription.

He says that he apostrophized a Negro thus: "Aye! Whiter than you, Yankee, except for about a hundredth of an inch. Whiter than you!"

Americans will be surprised to learn the author's story of the Battle of Manila Bay, but they may rest assured that if the history of the United States is rewritten according to Carnegian ideas and to coincide with the British patriotism of Prof. Morse Stephens, of the State university at Berkeley, Calif., this, in a few generations, will be accepted as the correct version:

"England beat the Spaniards at Manila. This isn't generally known, and I got the strictest confidence from a certain admiral in Chicago when Dewey gave the whole secret away."

This writer tells his readers that Dewey went all the way to Manila without ascertaining if he had certain guns and ammunition. In consternation, Dewey sent to Admiral Seymour, of the British squadron in Manila Bay, and obtained the guns and British ammunition with which the Spanish were whipped.

He says that Dewey was confused as to what to do in the battle and signaled Seymour, who from the British flagship directed the American admiral how to proceed, signaling "Fire your port broadsides," and in reference to one Spanish ship Admiral Seymour directed Admiral Dewey not to fire but to "blow her out of the water."

The closing reference to the battle of Manila Bay is as follows: "And now you have for the first time the story of how the English beat the Spaniards at Manila."

This book, which so pleased the late King, and which was read so widely in England, did not miss its mark—the ever growing tendency of the English public to accept as final that the absorption of America by Great Britain would simply be a matter of a few years.

Referring to the United States being skillfully steered into British waters, one is astounded to read that "courageous President Roosevelt realizes the decaying tendencies of the United States of America. A skillful pilot is at the helm, and he is not unaware of the danger * * * but his assistants—what of them?" (The Senate).

Continuing, he says he hopes the President will "wear ship" ere it is too late, and steer the ship into the safe and deep waters beyond (England). His book ends with the expression of a certain conviction that America and Great Britain would "go hand in hand and that time is not far off," and a full-paged curse on the United States and its citizens:

"Land of sallow, scurrying men!
Land of bribery and corruption!
Land of the greasy food!
Thrice cursed art thou!"

But these British plans for the peaceful or militant absorption of the United States, with the assistance of Andrew Carnegie's executive ability and money, the treason of members of the Benedict Arnold Peace Society, and the willing cooperation of the rewriters of the history of the United States have gone sadly amuck on account of the threatened war between England and Germany. The matter of the arbitration treaty with England has been unduly and indecently rushed, much to Mr. Carnegie's displeasure; this indelicate haste was caused by the hysterical announcement of Lord Charles Beresford, the hero of many a naval parade, that the British Navy was not what it seemed; that the Navy was "without officers, without men, without the necessary units, and in the event of war with Germany the British Navy would be a present to the enemy."

Plans for the peaceful or otherwise absorption of the United States were overwhelmed with the fear that Germany would give unto herself a present of the British Navy, and possibly even more. While the plans of Carnegian peace were not scheduled to be ripe for a test until 1915, the fear of war with Germany in the immediate present forced the issue with such feverish haste that more than one cat was let out of the bag of diplomacy. England could not tax her people any heavier than she was taxing them, and even if she had the necessary funds at her command to build a navy that would compare with Germany's she did not have time. Germany was ready to spring, and England had little faith in the French and Russian Navies combined against the Germany Navy. She dare not expect the Japanese Navy to fight ship to ship with the Russian Navy for fear they might remember old scores and forget they were fighting for England and turn their guns upon each other.

There was only one subtle influence which could stay Germany's hand, and that was the arbitration treaty between England and the United States and the possible ratification of that treaty by the United States Senate. The treaty was sprung upon the Senate, just as reciprocity with Canada was, and it did not occur to the British Government that there would be any difficulty in quietly slipping the treaty through the Senate, and quickly widening it into a defensive and offensive alliance.

There have been times in the history of the United States when the country has not only been threatened with enemies from without, but also from traitors from within.

There have been times when the United States Senate has taken upon itself the functions of a court of impeachment.

If war is to come between England and Germany, let us keep our hands off. While deploring war and the horrors of war, we must choose between the lesser of the 2 evils—the killing of some thousands in battle or the continual oppressing and torturing of millions. A war between England and Germany would mean the killing of perhaps a few thousand men; but it would also mean liberty for 350,000,000 oppressed of India; liberty for 12,000,000 Persians; liberty for 4,000,000 Irish; liberty for the struggling Egyptians from Alexandria to the Sudan. It might even mean the peace of the world—the break in the trail of blood.

From the Sudan to London, Theodore Roosevelt hurrahed for England; in Egypt he told a patriotic and brave people to be "loyal" to the British Government; he said English rule in India was great. Ask the Indians. Ask the Egyptians! * * * and you might also ask Mr. Morgan Shuster. Hands off!

Carnegie set up the Church Peace Union in 1914 with a $2,000,000 fund to further his aims.

World Alliance for Promoting International Friendship through the Churches has as its stated purpose "To organize the religious forces of the world so that the weight of all churches and Christians can be brought to bear upon the relations of governments and peoples."

The Betrayal of France

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 21 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ARTICLE BY HARTLEY W. BARCLAY

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, in accordance with the permission granted to me, I present for printing in the Record an article by Hartley W. Barclay, entitled "The Betrayal of France," published in Mill and Factory for July 1940.

The article is as follows:

[From Mill and Factory for July 1940]

THE BETRAYAL OF FRANCE—POLITICALLY AND INDUSTRIALLY SABOTAGED BY THE "FIFTH COLUMN," FRANCE BECAME AN EASY VICTIM OF TOTALITARIAN POWER BECAUSE IT WAS ECONOMICALLY HAMSTRUNG. THIS DEBACLE OF DEMOCRACY WAS NOTHING LESS THAN AN "INSIDE JOB." IT IS AN OBJECT LESSON FOR AMERICA

(By Hartley W. Barclay)

Treachery and treason went unpunished in France, it is alleged by reliable reporters, because these tactics destroyed the power of the government to punish the culprits who engaged in undermining the power of the nation. When the French Army, formerly vaunted as the finest army in the world, admitted defeat and surrendered in the middle of June at Bordeaux, the last act of dishonor had been committed by those who dedicated their activities to Communist and Socialist intrigue, rather than to the development of social and economic stability within the nation. The seeds of dissension and class warfare had been well sown. The sabotage of national defense had been completed. Either by accident or design the theories of Henri Barbusse, Leon Jouhaux, Leon Blum, and other assorted leftists of varied hues had brought the nation finally to its knees. In this tragic extermination of democracy lies a lesson for America. If leftist power remains unchecked here, it continues to exist at the risk of the United States paying the same price for minority dictation that was paid by France.

When world depression hit France, Communist influence brought to life a variety of measures of government intervention in control of economic life. France, like America, had her economic planners. France, like America, substituted visionary idealism for practical realism, despite the fact that unemployment was never as serious a problem in France as in the United States. France earlier limited the employment of aliens, a step which this Nation is now beginning to take, with the result that French citizens exclusively received the entire benefit of French depression alleviatives. The new measure recently introduced, that American employers can employ not more than 10 percent aliens, was adopted by France more than a year and a half ago. Relief payments in France were limited to French nationals. The severity of the economic depression in the United States in terms of real income, in comparison with the French people, is shown by the accompanying table which was published by National Industrial Conference Board in May 1939.

The French Utopianists won a sweeping victory at the polls in 1936. The Popular Front coalition, headed by Socialist Leon Blum and supported by the C. G. T., won a sweeping victory at the polls amid an epidemic of sit-down strikes and merchandised by the promise of extreme social reforms. The Matigon agreement was used as a measure of dealing with the sit-down strikes, through introducing immediate wage increases and the labor code was revised so that public authorities could intervene to enact collective-bargaining agreements and to impose them, despite the objections of employers. New laws provided for 40-hour weeks, paid vacations, public-works jobs, and other benefits under the devalued franc. The French equivalent of the American "60 families" was known as "200 families," and to break their hypothetical monopoly on jobs the Bank of France was reorganized and Leon Jouhaux was made a principal officer of the bank with the title of regent. Then the Government stepped in to control money markets, just as they have been controlled here. Direct control was exercised over key industries related to national defense. Direct price control was imposed. Agricultural regulation and control was carried to extremes. The principal tenet of the Popular Front was that the purchasing power of the masses could be raised and recovery induced by thorough-going economic reforms.

These demands voiced in Paris paralleled demands voiced in other nations—all sponsored by Popular Front advocates—and yet in none of the countries subjected to the "blitzkrieg" can be found any Popular Front advocates who were capable of assisting their countries when the Nazi "blitzkrieg" hit in full force.

FRENCH MILITARY PREPAREDNESS PLAN

A complete French mobilization plan was presented to the Chamber of Deputies in 1924 as bill No. 6949. Although it was never passed in its entirety many features of the bill were placed in effect. It provided for economic organization in time of war. Each minister was made responsible for the assembly of any resource or material or any class of resources that was in their field. Each ministry was required in time of peace to evaluate the needs of each ministry to satisfy wartime requirements. They were required to determine the facilities for the procurement of all types of raw materials, commodities, manufactured products, tools, motive power, labor, means of communication, and other resources necessary for the successful prosecution of war. The Superior Council of National Defense was established as the official agency for planned distribution and mobilization of industrial resources. A decree dated August 11, 1936, provided for the total or partial expropriation of private industrial enterprises by the French Government. On April 5, 1938, France is reported to have been spending 30,000,000,000 francs annually in preparation for war. The kinds of munitions purchased included revolvers and automatic pistols, rifles and carbines, machine guns and automatic rifles, field guns, howitzers and trench mortars, ammunition, projectiles and cartridge cases, grenades, bombs, torpedoes and mines, special sighting devices, fire-control apparatus and listening-in devises, tanks and armored cars, warships, aircraft carriers, destroyers, and submarines, aircraft, including replacement motors and parts, and chemical warfare materials. Great defense preparations had been completed including the highly vaunted Maginot line and the French Army had been hailed as the finest army in the world. Yet with all these defense preparations and large supplies of material on hand, the impregnable Maginot line was pierced, the Flanders defense was lost, and Paris fell before the Nazi drives.

The weaknesses of France proved to be primarily industrial in character generated by leftists' demands for extreme forms of social control which made adequate preparedness impossible.

FORESIGHT LACKING

Where Germany had used foresight in locating airplane plants in concealed, remote, and inaccessible locations, France did not develop protected plants in safe areas until after conditions became critical. When Germany completed underground hangars on protected air bases, France clung to conventional-type above-ground hangars fully exposed to bombing. Not having learned from experience, France reconstructed her northern industrial areas on the same sites where they were demolished during the last war. The development of new manufacturing areas remote from the 1914–18 battlefields was secondary to the rehabilitation of war-torn industrial districts.

The French airplane-production plan was of hapless design. It had fallen behind schedule by 1938 and French plants were producing only 54 planes per month compared with 500 per month produced in Germany at that time. The general characteristics of the industrial plan in 1938 provided for governmental subsidy of the merchant marine and completion of the electrification of railroads rather than adequate national defense. Although in 1890 France recognized the importance of adequate industrial preparedness and commenced planning the handling of food supplies in military emergencies, the plans were never fully or adequately developed. Similarly a plan of developing adequate reserve supplies of munitions had been developed, but this plan was soon made a football for political exploitation. In both 1914 and 1940, France made the common error of underestimating the ability of modern defense armies to consume supplies and the ability of offensive armies to destroy. Just as there was a 20- to 36-month delay in 1914 in meeting the material requirements of the French Army the inadequacy of emergency production schedules in 1940 proved to be the weakest link in the plan of preparedness.

POLITICAL BLUNDERING

This fault cannot fairly be charged to the military leaders of France. Rather, the blame belongs upon political leaders who continuously diverted the attention of the nation from real problems and concentrated mass interest upon utopian political objectives. In 1936 the Popular Front government passed 40-hour-week legislation. The result was the precipitation of an economic crisis for business and industry. This step was the climax to a trend of constantly increasing the percentage of the total national income spent by government. The following table shows how this expenditure grew:

COST OF GOVERNMENT IN FRANCE—PERCENT OF NATIONAL INCOME PER YEAR

1913	20
1929	26
1930–31	33
1932	38.5
1935	46
1937	50

To insure the progress of so-called social reforms, in December 1936 the French Government granted a virtual debt moratorium to small business concerns on rent payments and on promissory notes given in payment of business obligations. In addition, legislation was passed to provide all employers with cheap Government-guaranteed credits from the Bank of France for sums equivalent to increased wage costs incurred by conforming to social-reform legislation.

The results of the Popular Front social reforms were these:

1. Diverted attention from adequate national defense.
2. Nationalized key munitions industries, thus rendering them inefficient and nonproductive.
3. Internal prices rose 47 percent at retail in 1936–38.
4. Internal prices rose 62 percent at wholesale in 1936–38.
5. External prices were higher than world levels, making it economically impossible for France to maintain favorable trade balances.
6. The highly vaunted increased consumer purchasing power predicted to result from politically decreed wage increases was wholly absorbed by rising prices while the purchasing power of the fixed-income classes was more than cut in half and the capital losses of the wealthy classes were irreplaceable.
7. Labor-reform measures seriously interfered with the French rearmament program. Although France had only 40,000 skilled workers available for rearmament production, according to the French Minister of War, Italy at that same time had 80,000 and Germany had 100,000. In Germany at this time (1938) the skilled workers were working 52 hours per week, while in French factories they worked only 37 hours per week. At best, therefore, French workers were producing goods at the rate of only 1,480,000 man-hours per week while German workers were producing at the rate of 5,200,000 hours per week. After reviewing this comparison, even in 1938, military experts said: "In its present conception, the 40-hour week is incompatible with adequate national defense and the security of the country, and all credits (Government) will be useless if steps are not taken to increase working hours."

It should not be forgotten that at that time France was economically favored. Germany was driven to acceptance of substitutes—ersatz materials—because of natural raw-material deficiencies. Even in the depths of depression, however, France, with her colonial empire, was well supplied with food and industrial materials. Through favorable treaties she had access to supplies unavailable to Germany. She was economically self-sufficient in food, wood, salt, potash, coal, iron, bauxite, and antimony. She had adequate cork, alcohol, sugar, bromine, glycerine, wheat, and nitrates. Although some strategic raw materials of importance were lacking—such as rubber and cotton, copper, lead and mercury, tin, sulfur, and manganese—the allies of France favored her with terms and arrangements for procurement of these materials on schedules which could not be duplicated by Germany. With these natural advantages, France lacked an adequate labor supply; therefore she, like the United States, admitted alien labor. During the decade from 1921 to 1931 more than 1,750,000 alien workers were admitted, with the result that, like the United States, since 1931 there was a serious surplus of alien labor. This alien labor was readily victimized by political opportunists when depression set in, and the unemployed alien-labor group was most prominent in the planned labor disturbances which arose during the administration of the Popular Front cabinet.

A war-material program was authorized in 1936. It amounted to a test of the organization set-up designed to control production. Even then, tests showed that this plan failed to meet the productivity scheduled. Output was lower and costs were higher than was expected. By a decree dated January 16, 1937, political leaders decided to seize the fanciest and juiciest plum in the whole national-defense field. Therefore, the aero plants were nationalized (i. e., taken over for governmental operation). The justification given was that the Government needed to create an industry capable of maximum production. Twenty-three aircraft factories and one engine plant were expropriated. In addition, 12 munitions firms, included the noted Schneider-Creusot Co. were grabbed by the expropriators. At that time, it was adequately pointed out that far from aiding aircraft production, the step actually hindered expansion of output. The real motive was obviously political. It tended to further increase the financial burdens of the state at a time when further financial burdens were embarrassing. Immediately the step increased costs and reduced production efficiency.

ENTERPRISE STIFLED

It encouraged French Communists, already a powerful group to seize even more power. The decree tended to destroy public confidence and to stifle enterprise and initiative among industrial entrepreneurs. It placed inefficient management in charge of plants—replacing capable management. The government's payments for the plants were made slowly—behind schedule. Development work and research virtually stagnated in aircraft fields. Efficient engineering was displaced and bureaucratic political planning was imposed. Labor became indifferent to its responsibilities. Morale in the French Army decreased to a low ebb. In 1936, despite an increase in the budget for aircraft of 18 percent, production decreased 65 percent, and even then the modernization of design of the airplanes produced was not up to foreign standards. The question of nationalization of industry became a fiercely fought political issue. Labor stabbed France in the back, directed by Leon Jouhaux (a notorious ally of Henri Barbusse, noted French Stalinist Communist) and strikes set in quickly in the government-owned plants. It was at this time that the door was opened for Hitler—by the joint action of overreaching labor groups and the traitorous incompetence of the Popular Front government of Leon Blum and his radical Socialist-Communist adherents.

Charles Rist, a French economist, summarized the 1938 plight of the French Government from an economic standpoint when he asked, "How can France support a budget of 85,000,000,000 francs when only 55,000,000,000 is provided by taxes and the remaining 30,000,000,000 must be raised in some other way?" The response from the Blum government was further enlargement of public expenditures. But, as was to be expected, this failed to increase either the national income or the productivity of French industry. Indeed, just the opposite occurred. Blum's "social reforms" boosted costs of production and widened the great gap between income and expenditures. The French Parliament, after borrowing up to the limit on both short-term and long-term loans, on March 10, 1937, authorized the Blum administration to float the first national-defense loan at 4½-percent interest. However, by June the funds had been spent, the treasury was again empty, and further heavy borrowing from the Bank of France was necessary. This marked the turning point in the political fortunes of Leon Blum. He asked for emergency powers to act by decree—virtually demanded dictatorial control over France—and was turned down by the hostile conservative senate on June 19, 1937, and the popular-front cabinet resigned.

Blum's successors were given even wider decree powers than those which Blum had demanded. But even in the haste to modify laws and relax restrictions upon industry, it could be seen that French industry could never recover rapidly enough to meet the impending crisis. The 40-hour-week law was drastically modified. Taxes were increased, but production was encouraged. Tax rebates were given to manufacturers who could prove they had materially increased output in key industries.

Events rapidly moved toward a show-down between the new government and the extreme left coalition of Socialists, Communists, and labor elements. The C. G. T. (comparable to the C. I. O. in the United States) under Leon Jouhaux called a general strike of 24 hours as a protest against the new-decree laws. Premier Edouard Daladier, backed by public sympathy, accepted the challenge of the general strike as a test of power between democratic government and dictatorship of a "proletarian minority." His reply was:

1. Requisitioning the railroads.
2. Threatening general mobilization of the country.
3. Threatening to declare the nation in a state of siege under a law of 1878.
4. Mobilizing the bottle necks.

THE GOVERNMENT ATTACKED

The penalty for disobedience when the railroads are requisitioned is imprisonment and a fine up to 1,000 francs. In explaining his position during a radio talk, Premier Daladier said: "Let us be clear and frank. The sudden strikes and occupations of factories and this call for a general strike are simply a brutal assault on the peace policy of the Government, which is seeking to avoid spilling the blood of Frenchmen for interests that are other than those of France. These threats and occupations of factories were launched without warning. * * * What happened Thursday night at the Renault factory is complete proof of what I just said. No labor question of any kind was at stake. Neither working conditions nor pay questions were raised. But the cries, the posters, and the orders passed about the factory fully betrayed the movement as of political origin. The aim was to launch a movement of masses against the Government of the French Republic. What has to be done and what will be done is to force that movement to yield." Supporting Daladier, the National Convention of War Veterans unanimously passed a resolution condemning the proposed general strike.

When the C. G. T. finally called 4,000,000 men to strike, events happened swiftly. Two thousand workers in an aircraft plant refused to work and were dismissed. Employers were permitted to discharge all employees in event of a strike so that workers could be reemployed as desired—omitting the strike leaders and troublemakers. Public employees who deserted their posts were liable to dismissal and punishment. When a strike occurred on the railroad leading to Auzin, Daladier turned the line over to Government troops headed by General Doumene and his staff. Railway workers were arrested in Paris for demonstrating against the Government following union meetings. A special decree authorized the Ministry of Labor to requisition all mines and industries connected with mines in northern France.

The Mobile Guard, composed of France's toughest veteran soldiers, was ordered to clear all sit-down strikers out of factories at once. At Rennes they drove 150 sit-downers from a Government arsenal. At Sockaux the Mobile Guard was defeated by workers who seized an automobile plant.

Since the spearhead of the rebellion against preparedness was the Communist Party, Daladier threatened to indict the party for high treason, dissolve it, and jail its leaders who ordered its members to strike. By December 1 more than 700,000 workers who took part in the nation-wide strike had been notified of their dismissal. Strikers were being sentenced to prison in almost every industrial district, and 120,000 were locked out of factories as the Daladier decrees took effect. Labor leaders, strikers, and even city officials—who encouraged strikes (such as the Communist assistant mayor of an industrial village near Valenciennes) were arrested and charged with rebellion. Former Socialist Premier Leon Blum went ahead with a plan to call a rump session of Parliament—but only Communists and Socialists supported his scheme. Striking dock workers at Marseille placed a bottleneck between importation of African troops by Daladier despite the fact that mobilization of Hitler's legions had already reached the French border. Daladier responded by placing the entire water front at strategic points under fully mobilized control. By November 30 the C. G. T. threat was completely broken and resulted in a huge public triumph for Daladier. He responded by immediately declaring a 3-year state of economic mobilization. Blum became a ridiculous public figure. Leon Jouhaux became a nonentity.

The full meaning of the victory was expressed by Daladier when he said, in commenting upon events: "Some foreign newspapers were asking yesterday whether it was possible for democracy to prevent anarchy. * * * Today the whole world knows that France has triumphed over her internal difficulties." But the triumph came too late. The damage had been done. It was then too late to organize adequate national defense material production.

The complete history of subsequent political and military events cannot be reviewed in this brief article. It is sufficient to draw the obvious conclusions generally accepted by economists familiar with the planned sabotage of national defense in France by social reformists.

1. The French Popular Front promoted centralized planned economy.
2. It assumed that prosperity could be achieved by heavy governmental expenditures.
3. It harassed and restricted private enterprise and nationalized many varieties of production.
4. It introduced control of prices.
5. It reduced working hours and increased wages excessively.
6. It unbalanced the budget—kept it unbalanced—financed Government works by excessive borrowing and piled up a hopeless governmental deficit.
7. It revalued the currency and depreciated it.
8. It brought about a lowered standard of living.
9. It destroyed the morale of industry and science.
10. It made adequate national defense impossible of attainment and paved the way for Hitler's success.

The job of sabotage was well done in France. No small details were overlooked in planning the thorough destruction of industrial preparedness. The social schemers and Utopian planners opened the door to Hitler's triumph in a way which can be paralleled by a "fifth column" in any democratic country. In fact, the experience of France conclusively proves that democratic processes are most vulnerable to seizure by incompetent minority blocs.

The Great Precedent

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 22 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

AN ARTICLE BY WALTER LIPPMANN

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask leave to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article under the heading "The Great Precedent," by Walter Lippmann, published in the column Today and Tomorrow of the Washington (D. C.) Post of today.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post of August 22, 1940]

TODAY AND TOMORROW—THE GREAT PRECEDENT

(By Walter Lippmann)

The negotiations now under way between the British Empire and the United States demonstrate how permanent and continuous, in spite of changing circumstances, are the fundamental lines of American foreign policy. To those who have forgotten or have never learned the tradition in which American foreign policy was formed, it may seem novel and therefore surprising for the United States to negotiate an understanding with Britain in the midst of a great imperialistic revolutionary and imperial war. But as a matter of historic fact the basic foreign policy of the United States, which gave this hemisphere a century of security, independence, and freedom, was shaped by just such understandings with Great Britain during the great wars of Napoleon and the threatened wars of the despotic Holy Alliance.

Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe would have recognized these negotiations as a continuation of their own, as dictated by the same necessity, as actuated by the same vital interests, as inspired by the same instinct of self-preservation. The negotiations between Jefferson and the government of Pitt which preceded the Louisiana Purchase and the negotiations between Monroe and Canning which led to the Monroe Doctrine were two decisive chapters in the same story which is now continued in the negotiations between Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Churchill.

The analogy is not apparent and superficial. It is real and it is organic. The foundations of our foreign policy were laid by necessity in the tremendous upheaval of the Napoleonic era. That same foreign policy is being developed by necessity in the tremendous upheaval of our own era.

On February 15, 1798, while Great Britain was at war with the revolutionary imperialism of Napoleon Bonaparte, the American Minister in London had a conversation with Lord Grenville in which he learned that Napoleon might obtain control of Spain, and through Spain of the resources of South America. Shortly afterward it was learned that Spain had secretly ceded to Napoleon the great region of the Mississippi Valley known as Louisiana. When Jefferson became President he took the position that while the United States could tolerate Spanish possession of this territory because Spain was feeble and pacific, it could not tolerate its possession by Napoleonic France because of the impetuosity of her temper, the energy and restlessness of her character.

He then went on to say that "the day that France takes possession of New Orleans fixes the sentence which is to retain her forever within her low-water mark. It seals the union of the two nations who, in conjunction, can maintain exclusive possession of the ocean. From that moment we must marry ourselves to the British Fleet and Nation. * * * This is not a state of things we seek or desire. It is one which this measure, if adopted by France, forces on us as necessarily as any other cause, by the laws of nature, brings on its necessary effect."

The Louisiana crisis was settled by purchase and not by war. It was settled that way because Napoleon lost command of the seas and could not, therefore, maintain his empire in this hemisphere. But Jefferson, unlike the latter-day isolationists who cite his words without studying his acts, had no illusions on three fundamental points. The first was that revolutionary imperialism must not be allowed to establish itself on this side of the Atlantic. The second was that this could be prevented only by Anglo-American control of the ocean. The third was that to preserve that exclusive possession of the ocean he would, if necessary, "marry ourselves to the British Fleet and Nation." Jefferson took this position on April 18, 1802; 13 months earlier in his first inaugural he had coined the historic phrase warning us against "entangling alliances."

It is evident that in his mind an understanding with Great Britain for the joint control of the Atlantic Ocean was not an entanglement but the very basic condition of American security. So what Mr. Willkie said at Elwood about our relations with Britain and what Mr. Roosevelt is doing in his negotiations with Mr. Churchill is in the direct line of descent from the founders of American independence.

That Jefferson's views about Anglo-American relations at the time of the Louisiana Purchase were no passing notion is clear from the fact that 20 years later, in the crisis which led to the announcement of the Monroe Doctrine, he repeated them no less emphatically.

In 1823 the continent of Europe was in the grip of four despotic monarchies bound together in the so-called Holy Alliance. They turned their eyes to this hemisphere; the Russian Empire began to move down the west coast from its base in Alaska; the other European despotisms began to formulate plans to reconquer Spanish-America which had rebelled and became independent. Again as in the case of Louisiana 25 years earlier, Great Britain and the United States began to negotiate, and in these negotiations between Canning and our minister in London, Benjamin Rush, an agreement was reached to forbid, if necessary by war, the conquest of Spanish America. The agreement was reached in London on August 23, 1823, and the papers were received in Washington by Secretary Adams and President Monroe on October 9, 1823. A week later the President sent the papers to Jefferson asking his advice.

Within a week Jefferson replied urging acceptance and said that while "Europe is laboring to become the domicile of despotism, our endeavor should surely be to make our hemisphere that of freedom. One nation, most of all, could disturb us in this pursuit; she now offers to lead, aid, and accompany us in it. By acceding to her proposition, we detach her from the bands, bring her mighty weight into the scale of free government, and emancipate a continent at one stroke, which might otherwise linger long in doubt and difficulty. Great Britain is the nation which can do us the most harm of anyone, or all on earth; and with her on our side we need not fear the whole world. With her, then, we should most sedulously cherish a cordial friendship, and nothing would tend more to knit our affections than to be fighting once more side by side, in the same cause. Not that I would purchase even her enmity at the price of taking part in her wars.

"But the war in which the present proposition might engage us, should that be its consequence, is not her war, but ours. Its object is to introduce and establish the American system of keeping out of our land all foreign powers—of never permitting those of Europe to intermeddle with the affairs of our nations. It is to maintain our own principle, not to depart from it. And if, to facilitate this, we can effect a division in the body of the European powers, and draw over to our side its most powerful member, surely we should do it. But I am clearly of Mr. Canning's opinion, that it will prevent instead of provoking war. With Great Britain withdrawn from their scale and shifted into that of our two continents, all Europe combined would not undertake such a war, for how would they propose to get at either enemy without superior fleets? Nor is the occasion to be slighted which this proposition offers of declaring our protest against the atrocious violations of the rights of nations by the interference of any one in the internal affairs of another, so flagitiously begun by Bonaparte, and now continued by the equally lawless alliance calling itself holy."

At President Monroe's request, Jefferson sent the papers to Madison who replied on November 1, saying:

"I return the letter of the President. The correspondence from abroad has gone back to him, as you desired. I have expressed to him my concurrence in the policy of meeting the advances of the British Government, having an eye to the forms of our Constitution in every step in the road to war. With the British power and Navy combined with our own, we have nothing to fear from the rest of the world; and in the great struggle of the epoch between liberty and despotism, we owe it to ourselves to sustain the former, in this hemisphere at least."

It was after this consultation by the most eminent living Americans, themselves the founders of the Republic, that the Monroe Doctrine was promulgated 1 month later in the form, be it noted, not of a treaty but of a Presidential declaration. Yet there are men today who dare to charge that a negotiation based upon recognition of the vital connection between American security and British sea power is un-American.

But Mr. Roosevelt need have no doubts and Mr. Willkie need have no doubts that they are walking on the main highway of American foreign policy and that they are following the greatest precedents of American history.

Drafting Wealth

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSH LEE

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 22 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM ST. LOUIS STAR-TIMES

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial from the St. Louis Star-Times of August 13, 1940, entitled "Draft the Dollars Now."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the St. Louis Star-Times of August 13, 1940]

DRAFT THE DOLLARS NOW

An overwhelming necessity exists, in order to prepare this country adequately for dangers that lurk in the world situation, to determine now, right at the outset of our national-defense program, to draft dollars along with men.

The excess-profits bill, though it heads in the right direction, does not cover this necessity. It allows a profit of 20 percent a year for 5 years, to pay the cost of new buildings and equipment, plus a normal profit on the entire investment. Thus the taxpayers will pay for the new plants and give them to the corporations. That is one of the penalties we pay for having to rely on the American brand of private enterprise, put into sudden competition with a European system of national socialism in which business men and financiers are water boys for political dictators.

If the United States were limited to a choice between sugaring American investors to sweeten their patriotism, and dosing them with bitter Nazi pills, it would be a sad choice. But we are not. Beyond the excess-profits tax is the realm of the direct income tax, both personal and corporate. It is in that field that the United States Government will answer the question: Is the conscripted doughboy, and he alone, going to get it in the neck?

The Treasury Department has just given out income-tax figures for 1938, showing that three Americans had incomes in excess of $5,000,000 apiece. Their combined incomes were $21,804,000, and they paid a combined income tax of $6,664,000.

Under our tax laws, the surtax rate on incomes in excess of $100,000 (up to $150,000) is 50 percent, and on everything above $1,000,000 a year it is 59 percent. Adding the 4 percent normal tax the total is 63 percent.

If these three gentlemen had paid nothing at all on their first $1,000,000 apiece, and had paid the legal rate of 63 percent on the remainder, their total tax would have been $11,846,520. That is almost twice what they actually paid on their entire incomes. The rate they paid was not 63 percent but 30 percent.

How did this come about, a legal rate of 63 percent, and an actual rate of 30 percent, for men getting more than $5,000,000 each in 1 year? The answer is easy. Tax-exempt bonds. The colossal fortunes of America are being put out of reach of taxation.

The little fellow, earning $3,000 a year in salary, pays the full legal rate. The movie star with a salary of $300,000 a year pays the full rate—more than half of what he takes in. The prize fighter pays in full. In fact, the government sends a collector right down to the stadium and takes the money on the spot—no income tax, no prize fight. But the man with an income of $5,000,000 a year, obviously drawn largely from investments, not salary, cashes his coupons and laughs.

It is true that the cost of national defense cannot be paid by the multimillionaire dollar-slackers who live on tax-exempt income. It cannot be paid by the citizens, many thousands in number, who pay comparatively low taxes on incomes between $6,000 and $30,000 a year. It cannot be paid, solely, by the corporations whose profits make up the undivided incomes of stockholders and bondholders.

But these groups, in combination, have as fair a claim to be put in a favored class—favored with the privilege of paying most heavily for national defense—as young men of 21 to 30, inclusive, have of being put in the favored class of answering the first call to arms.

If the United States is going to come through this national crisis with a sound society, a sound political economy, and a secure homeland, sacrifice of the pocketbook must not lag one foot behind the sacrifice called for from young American manhood. The first step of all should be to repeal the monstrous system of tax exemption of income from State and municipal bonds, the racket of the $5,000,000-a-year slacker on national defense.

Address by Ambassador Bullitt

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH F. GUFFEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 22 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ARTICLE BY JOSEPH ALSOP AND ROBERT KINTNER

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an article by Joseph Alsop and Robert Kintner which appeared in last night's Evening Star. I do this in view of the fact that my colleague the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] referred to this article in debate yesterday, and I think the Members of the Senate should have full benefit of it.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Star of August 21, 1940]

THE CAPITAL PARADE—BULLITT'S SPEECH, DISCUSSED WITH PRESIDENT, SEEMS TO SUPPORT WILLKIE'S CHARGE ON CANDOR

(By Joseph Alsop and Robert Kintner)

William C. Bullitt's speech before the American Philosophical Society at Philadelphia was no blundering indiscretion, in the manner of James H. R. Cromwell or John Cudahy. It was not only passed by the State Department, as was reported at the time; it also was discussed at length with the President, both in the early and final stages of composition, and was approved in detail by him.

It must be taken, therefore, as an exact expression of the President's own views.

Regarded in this light, the Bullitt speech is unquestionably the most significant utterance on foreign affairs to come from any administration source, including the President himself, since the outbreak of the second world war.

For Bullitt did not speak in the broad generalities and careful indirections which have characterized such Presidential utterances as the message requesting repeal of the arms embargo. He painted in the most lively and moving colors the tragic picture of the fall of France. He grimly told his countrymen that the same pattern of events might be repeated here in the United States. He urgently pleaded that destroyers and other forms of aid be made immediately available to England. And he sharply warned that if England fell, the danger of German aggression against the United States would be immediate and terrible.

"America is in danger," he said. "It is my conviction, drawn from my own experience and from the information in the hands of our Government in Washington, that the United States is in as great peril today as France was a year ago. And I believe that unless we act now, decisively, to meet the threat we shall be too late."

WILL THE PRESIDENT FOLLOW?

The disparity has always seemed completely fantastic, between the calm face shown to the world by the President and the desperate private pessimism of every informed man around him. Proof was lacking that the President shared his advisers' pessimism, until it was supplied in the Bullitt speech. Certainly there could be no better proof that the President's approval of an unvarnished, unqualified prediction, by one of his own ambassadors and most intimate friends, that within 12 months the American way, the American Government, the very independence of the American people, may all have fallen before the German onslaught.

The Bullitt speech, of course, seems to substantiate Wendell Willkie's charge of lack of candor in the President. There is reason to hope, however, that the President himself follow Bullitt in telling the people frankly what he believes to be the truth.

Whether he does or not will depend, no doubt, on the total reaction to Bullitt. In the Senate, news of what Bullitt said in Philadelphia promptly touched off a violent demonstration, in which Senators BURTON K. WHEELER, BENNETT CHAMP CLARK and other isolationists joined in shouting for Bullitt's blood, impeachment, or both. In the country, on the contrary, the reaction appears to have been good, for both the White House and Bullitt's office at the State Department have been deluged with approving telegrams, and editorial comment has generally been favorable.

THE INDISCREET PROPHET

Whatever the President decides to do, Bullitt may be expected to carry on what he regards as a vitally important campaign to educate the American people. His gloom is so complete that he has told friends he very much doubts whether anything can be done to avert the peril ahead. He expects England to go under unless it receives aid from this country. He questions whether the aid can be obtained in time. He is positively convinced that the defeat of England will soon be followed by a German attack on the United States. And he is equally sure that our rearmament cannot be quick enough to make really sure the warding off of such an attack. Yet he also feels, as he puts it, that it is his job to "shinny on his own side" until the end of the game.

Two questions remain. Why has not the President spoken out before? And are Bullitt and the President right in their dark views? To the first, only the President can supply the answer, and to the second, only the future. It must be said, however, that if the Senators who denounce Bullitt are right, they must be right by instinct only. Bullitt, on the other hand, has all the available information at his disposal, and has lived close enough to the event to form a competent judgment. Before they dismiss his warnings as foolish and groundless, the Senators might also remember, that from the day when Bullitt exactly forecast the results of the Versailles Treaty in Paris in 1919, he has proved a surprisingly accurate, if often irritating and indiscreet prophet.

Possibility of War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 22 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

SYNDICATED NEWSPAPER ARTICLE

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, an American columnist, who writes daily under the heading "In the News," released today through a syndicate of newspapers one of his articles entitled "War Before November Is the Writer's Forecast." I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IN THE NEWS—WAR BEFORE NOVEMBER IS THIS WRITER'S FORECAST

How long do you think it will be before we get into the present war head over ears?

What is going to put us in?

What is to be our part when we do get in?

And what is to be the situation and condition of our people and our country during our participation and afterward?

It is well to be thinking about these things because our entrance into the war seems very near.

Many people think it will occur before the Presidential election in November.

Why?

Oh, because it would be very fortunate for Mr. Roosevelt if we should get in before that time, and Mr. Roosevelt is very fortunate.

Second, because the agreement with Canada is an indication that the administration thinks that war is close at hand.

Third, because administration insistence that American vessels sail through dangerously mined ocean zones in spite of warnings of unavoidable catastrophe is likely to provide an immediate critical occasion.

Fourth, because Mr. Roosevelt's Cabinet is being built for war.

Col. Frank Knox, a military figure of distinction, is very war-minded.

And Henry L. Stimson has always been, when a Republican office-holder, a strong advocate of intervention in European affairs and participation in the League of Nations.

Fifth, because war propaganda is being encouraged on every side.

Mr. Bullitt, ambassador extremely extraordinary to almost everywhere, stands incongruously on the steps of Independence Hall and at the instance of the Roosevelt administration inconsistently incites the American people to enter the disastrous European conflict.

Even the gentle First Lady of the Land sponsors an inflammatory anti-German picture made from the writings of Ernst Toller, who was, in 1919, leader of the Communist revolution in Bavaria against the republican government of President Ebert.

James Roosevelt is being sued by the heirs of Toller for a financial interest in the film, which was produced by an English company as war propaganda.

Sixth, because of the proposed disposal of some 50 of our older naval destroyers to England to be employed in the war.

And, seventh, because the especial kind of conscription which the administration advocates would seem unnecessary and undesirable unless expeditionary forces are contemplated.

Of course there are also many powerful influences other than the administration in favor of war.

There are social influences, financial influences, racial, and religious influences.

Ours is a wonderful country—an amazing melting pot, the product of which is a democratic alloy valuable to our civilization and to all the world.

But many of the ingredients in the pot are not yet thoroughly fused.

Many for some generations will retain much of their original character and connections.

These elements have been deeply affected by the conditions prevailing in Europe and are eager to correct them—to democratize them according to American standards—not by example but by force of arms.

All of these political and personal causes make pretty certain our involvement in the war.

The defensive agreement with Canada is in itself a beneficial thing.

But it must necessarily mean that the United States will defend Canada more than Canada will defend the United States, unless the agreement includes the provision that the British Navy shall cooperate to defend the Western Hemisphere.

In which case we have entered into an alliance not only with Canada but with the British Empire.

Everybody knows that the South American republics will be not an advantage but an obligation to the United States in case of war—not an asset but a liability in matters of mutual defense—which would in no way be mutual.

No one can seriously suppose that Chile, Peru, Ecuador, Guatemala, Brazil, or even Mexico is going to supply tatterdemalion soldiers for the defense of the United States.

And they certainly are not going to supply ships, because they have not got any worthy of much consideration.

Everyone can see equally clearly that the reason the conscription bill does not confine the activities of the United States Army to the United States and its possessions is because the administration contemplates using the Army in other parts of the Western Hemisphere—if not in various parts of the Eastern Hemisphere.

In other words, the administration purposes to use this Army for world war without securing the specific consent of Congress or without consulting in any way the wishes of the American people.

The agreement with Canada is like the treaty of Habana, a purely personal Roosevelt agreement imposing upon the people of the United States the defense of the whole American Continent.

This obligation is immense and wholly unilateral unless, as has been said above, specific provision is made for the equal employment of the British Navy, in which case the treaty is with the British Empire.

Would it not be well to have these treaties formalized and constitutionally approved by the Senate of the United States and to have their consequences in widespread warfare referred to the approval of the people of the United States?

As for propaganda, its effect is astounding.

It carries us away like the current of a great tide.

It causes us to forget all the lessons of our experience.

It transforms facts into fancies and fancies into facts.

We are fortified against the propaganda of the warring nations.

We expect them to color their statements and to exaggerate their achievements.

But we are unprotected against the insidious and insistent propaganda of our own Government.

We naturally tend to rely on the good faith of our own representatives, and their attack upon our credulity with biased statements and prejudiced personal views reaches us under our guard.

Consequently, a sentiment for war is gradually developing in this country as it did in the World War.

Soon, therefore, we may look for war.

How soon and how certain it is difficult to say, but if your columnist were inclined to venture an opinion he would say before November—and he is not wholly without practice as a prognosticator.

Federal Expenditures in Fifth Congressional District of Washington

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES H. LEAVY

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 22, 1940

Mr. LEAVY. Mr. Speaker, I am having printed a report of certain statistical data of interest to the people of Spokane and Lincoln Counties in my district, showing the nature and extent of estimated expenses of the United States in these counties during the present administration.

These figures are instructive and illuminating and readily make it possible for interested persons to know what has been done in each county during the 7-year period to better the conditions of the people that live in that county.

The Third Term

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 22 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE STANDARD-TIMES, NEW BEDFORD, MASS.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask leave to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial on the third term by Basil Brewer under the heading "Roosevelt 'Drafted,'" published in the Standard-Times, New Bedford, Mass., issue of July 22, 1940.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New Bedford (Mass.) Standard-Times of July 22, 1940]

ROOSEVELT "DRAFTED"

Probably all Americans would prefer to avoid the situation which now confronts them, a President nominated for a third term.

School boys know Washington and Jefferson urged against the third term and counseled that those who offered themselves be sternly and promptly rebuked.

In 150 years of the Nation's history no one seriously has gone counter to this solemn warning.

On the surface it would seem the voter would find the solution simple—but we see no such conclusion.

For the crisis of the times lends itself to the sorry scheme, and the President who offers himself for the third term is a master political strategist, a master of plausibility.

He did not plan or desire to run, he said, as he accepted the nomination, but, "Today, all private plans, all private lives have been repealed by an overriding public danger. In the face of that public danger all those who can be of service to the public have no choice but to offer themselves for service in those capacities for which they may be fitted."

Are there in the English language more convenient words with which to excuse a third-term candidacy?

It even is possible the President has convinced himself by the plausibility of his own phrases. Otherwise, he conjures faithlessly in the country's crisis and out of the people's fears.

But there are simple questions which, if answered, will help to clear the air, may even help the President out of his self-hypnosis, if such it is. They are questions which will not down and must be asked over and over during these next few fateful months.

Was the President drafted, or did he knowingly and willingly contrive by action or inaction to bring about his third-term nomination?

Were the people represented at this Chicago scene, where the President says he was drafted? Or was this, on the whole, one of the sorriest spectacles of political ward heeling ever staged in a convention, with hundreds of delegates there representing nothing but a city gang, paid and grown fat with Federal projects money?

And what is the truth about the President's claim that he alone is best qualified to meet the present national crisis, the only "experienced man," as he modestly says, capable of steering the Nation through its difficulties?

All partisanship aside, what is there in the past 7 years of this administration to justify the President's sublime faith in himself?

National debt, admittedly bordering on bankruptcy, with unemployment, if we disregard Federal work projects, almost at its peak.

Military unpreparedness, so serious as to constitute now the greatest element of the "crisis" which the President uses to justify his candidacy—a condition which, despite warnings, has improved but little since the President called it to the country's attention; a condition repeatedly called to official attention by Baruch and others as Hitler power rose in Germany.

A country divided into class-conscious groups, created by the President's deliberate efforts, employer and business tagged with hateful names, employee encouraged to thwart employer against their mutual interest.

Taxes, the highest in the country's history, a brake on all business enterprise, some of it admittedly punitive; business asked to expand employment, but the money needed to provide this employment taken by excessive and punitive taxes.

Are we to believe, then, the President is the "only man" who can save the country in the crisis?

Is there encouragement in this record for breaking the third-term precedent of 150 years?

But there is more than inconsistency in this third-term position of the President.

There is definite menace.

The President does not have the respect for constitutional government which the ordinary citizen has and which, of course, should be the President's.

Had he this respect he would not have attempted to pack the Supreme Court, to secure approval of his measures.

We assert the President does not take seriously the breaking of the third-term unwritten law. Did he do so, he would refuse to run as did Washington and Jefferson. But even clearer than this is the fact that in no speech or statement has he so much as mentioned the subject, not even in his address of acceptance Thursday.

The President is a student of history. He has not failed to see that free government often has been made into dictatorship by easy stages of disregard of precedent such as the third-term tradition of this country.

The conclusion is inescapable—he does not take the matter seriously, or excuses himself on the basis of the national crisis. He excused his Supreme Court packing attempt, which failed, on the same basis of emergency.

It is true the country faces a grave crisis. But the President, in this decision, has imposed a second crisis on the one which already existed.

We do not know whether the President is self-hypnotized or deceived by his inner circle of advisers.

But, deceived or not, the President must not be allowed to deceive the country in this time of crisis.

Neither President Roosevelt, nor any other man, ever must be elected to a third term as President of the United States.

Transfer of Destroyers to Great Britain

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSH LEE

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 22 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM ST. LOUIS STAR-TIMES

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial from the St. Louis Star-Times of August 21, 1940, entitled "Send the Destroyers!"

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the St. Louis Star-Times of August 21, 1940]

SEND THE DESTROYERS

The time has come when the American Government, moved solely by concern for our own national interests, should transfer to Great Britain the overage destroyers which Britain needs to bolster her defenses in the immediate future.

Two objections, previously, have prevented this bold step. The first was the argument that 50 light warships could not possibly prove decisive. This was based on the theory that the battle of Britain would be finished quickly—that the Nazis would stake all on a spectacular aerial invasion, which would succeed or fail without reference to sea power. The second argument, vigorously pumped up by our isolationists, was that selling destroyers would be an "act of war," and that it would make Hitler turn against us either now or later—when, as, and and if he broke Britain.

The first objection has been answered. Prime Minister Churchill states a clear, definite reason for England's need of these vessels—to "bridge the gap" between Britain's peacetime navy of 1939 and the much larger wartime navy she expects to have substantially completed by next year.

The theory of a short Battle of Britain has been weakened by events of the last 2 weeks. Every observer reports that England has successfully beaten back the preliminary Nazi efforts to smash her by a bombing "blitzkrieg." Now Germany has announced a sea and air blockade.

Always granting that this may be merely a trick to lull the defenders into a false sense of security, the apparent meaning is that Hitler is driven to revise his plan, to resort to a siege of Britain—a war directed against her vital food and supply ships with the objective of starving her people and her factories.

In such a war of attrition it is possible that acquisition of 50 additional destroyers from America would decisively strengthen the British Fleet for the next few critical months.

The vital importance Britain attaches to American destroyers is further proved by agreement to lease bases in the Atlantic and Caribbean to the United States.

Considering the importance of Newfoundland, Bermuda, and the Caribbean Islands as strategic bases for defending the Western Hemisphere, Churchill's offer of 99-year leases of these island strongholds is equivalent, almost, to a transfer of sovereignty and at least comparable in value to a pledge to send the remnants of the British Navy to Canada if England finally falls. Such a pledge, however, also should be sought—to copper-rivet our security.

The final objection to sale of the destroyers—the fear of Hitler's wrath—always has been more fanciful than real. Such a transfer would be no more an act of war than the other technically hostile acts we already have committed against the Nazis—the sale of obsolete aircraft, for example, through the flimsy device of returning them to the manufacturers, who then have vended them to England.

These scrupulous niceties are not important. Hitler shows no sign of yielding to the resentment he naturally feels following our previous aid to Britain. Would he declare war against us at once on account of a destroyer deal? It is possible but not likely. At present he doesn't even threaten it; he prefers to slaughter one victim at a time.

As for the future, if Hitler conquers Britain despite Churchill's efforts and despite our aid to England, the question of whether or not we sold destroyers to the British would be insignificant.

Nazi operations in the Western Hemisphere will not be governed by such relative trivialities. The only thing which will govern them is Hitler's judgment of his chances to win against the United States.

The destroyer-sale issue should be decided, therefore, by the simple question of whether the transfer would diminish or increase the chances of a successful Nazi assault on the United States.

The most logical answer is that it would bolster our security. If it helps England win, by strengthening her both materially and in her morale, we shall never have to face a direct attack from Hitler. And, since the fate of the Orient will be decided primarily in Europe, it may save us an embarrassing and dangerous challenge from Japan.

If it merely postpones a British defeat, it probably will be selfishly worth while through buying us additional time to build up our own armed forces and implement pending plans for hemispherical defense.

In the light of these considerations, the breast-beating anguish and obstructionism of do-nothing isolationists fade into insignificance. Let us act decisively for once, without further confusion, and sell the destroyers which—by aiding England—will defend the Americas.

Defend America With Equipment "on Order"?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 22, 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT, OF PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I insert herewith an address recently delivered by me before the Williamsport Consistory of the Scottish Rite Masonry at Williamsport, Pa., Friday, June 28, 1940:

Mr. Chairman, distinguished guests, ladies and gentlemen, it is a real pleasure to accept your kind invitation and to have the privilege of again mingling with my Masonic brethern on this happy occasion.

Since I had the good fortune to be introduced to you by my good friend and colleague, BOB RICH, who so ably represents the Sixteenth Pennsylvania District in Congress, I really feel at home among you, even though Bob did not include in his remarks his copyrighted daily congressional question, Where are you going to get the money from?

Seriously, you represent a cross section of American citizenry that appreciates a straight-from-the-shoulder discussion of the perplexing questions incident to the war situation. Every war is accompanied by a wave of propaganda. You and I know the World War was no exception, and today from experience I hope that you have not been misled by the abundance of foreign propaganda that has been unloaded on the American people during the past few years.

I hold in my hand a portion of what the average Member of Congress receives daily as propaganda from abroad. Here is a piece from Germany, a pamphlet from England, a circular from France, as well as Japan, Belgium, China, and other countries. Each of these pamphlets blames the other fellow in an effort to have the American people take sides in their century-old world wars.

To many of you who have served in the World War, this propaganda is old stuff. During the hectic days of 1917–18 we rubbed elbows with the Frenchman, the Britisher, the Jap, and others now involved in this effort to sell their own bill of goods to America. Those of you who served in the A. E. F. are qualified to take this propaganda with a grain of salt.

However, since the World War, the babies of 1917–18 are now young men and women and are being fed the same old war propaganda. It appears that the American people are falling for this propaganda, hook, line, and sinker. Therefore, as good Americans, we must assume the responsibility of acquainting our neighbors with the true facts and in so doing make a worth-while contribution to the welfare and preservation of our form of government. Unfortunately, all propaganda has not been confined to foreign sources, because I hold in my hand pieces of printed propaganda now being circulated throughout the United States by William Allen White, Kansas publisher, and his Committee to Defend America by Aiding the Allies. For months and months the White committee has been leading the American people down a blind alley by advocating that we strip our own meager defenses to aid the Allies. There is no question the Allies have your sympathy and mine in the valiant struggle they put up against a superior military foe. But when it comes to exposing our national defense to danger, common sense tells us that we are forfeiting our own national safety.

At this point I want to impress upon you one thing, and that is, the White committee almost overnight developed to be self-appointed saviors of this Nation. Do you believe for a minute William Allen White is paying the bill for all this propaganda being fed the American people? Do you realize the members of the White committee are beyond military age? Can you forget that a few years ago this same band of superpatriots labeled the World War veterans of America "Treasury raiders" when the adjusted compensation, commonly miscalled the bonus, was being considered in Congress? The patriotism of the White committee was forgotten as they raised their voices in loud protest over payment of benefits to those whose service to country rendered them in need.

Let's forget William Allen White and his band and talk about cold facts. For more than 150 years the American people have enjoyed the freedom of a democracy and a form of government universally recognized as a masterpiece of statesmanship. During that time we have accomplished more than the nations of the Old World achieved in 10 centuries.

We value blessings that the Old World has never enjoyed. Therefore, if we are to continue to enjoy these benefits, we must safeguard our form of government by an adequate national defense, with a determined effort to stay out of this war.

Before talking about our national defense, let us give some thought to the type of defense needed should we be called to repel invasion from the Old World. The Hitler military machine, which is recognized as a mechanical military monster the like of which the world has never seen before, has required 7 years to develop at a cost of $40,000,000,000. It has consumed the energies of Europe's greatest industrial country, mobilizing every energy, talent, and resource of the industrious and talented German people. This military monster, a product of Hitler's mind, has revolutionized every phase of warfare to the extent that today it knows no equal. The striking power of Hitler's war machine is terrific.

In the short space of 21 days Hitler conquered Poland, destroyed a half million soldiers, and took 700,000 prisoners.

In spite of the British blockade, Hitler invaded and mastered Norway in 8 days. In similar fashion he crushed Holland in 4 days and vanquished Belgium in 17 days. In like manner he required but 21 days to destroy or capture the British expeditionary force in France together with three entire French armies.

Following the surrender of Belgium, it required Hitler but 17 days to conquer Paris, capture the Maginot line, drive the French Army more than 100 miles south of Paris, and to reduce the French people to servitude.

In 2 months of active military operations Hitler has conquered a territory as great as New England, New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Michigan, Illinois, Indiana, and Wisconsin. He has conquered more than a hundred million people, possibly destroyed 2,000,000 soldiers, and taken as prisoners 3,000,000 more.

With the exception of Norway and Denmark, each of the nations subdued was of the opinion that it had set up a real defense against German aggression.

Let us examine this German war machine. From information available, it has a dozen mechanized divisions, commonly referred to as Panzer divisions. Each division consists of 1,274 motor vehicles, that consume 10,568 gallons of gasoline and 1,023 gallons of oil every 24 hours. These divisions move at the unbelievable rate of 40 miles a day. Surely you recognize the great problem of keeping this giant military monster in operation, whose make-up is as follows:

A Panzer division—Its fuel consumption

Table above gives break-down estimates on a German Panzer division and shows tremendous daily consumption of gas and oil in gallons. Supply factors should double the figure shown for tank brigade gas and oil requirements, making totals 49,270 and 3,290. An air cooperation squadron is attached to each division but number of planes varies greatly. Figures for supply vehicles attached to a division are not available.

Recently I had an opportunity, with other Members of Congress, to view the official German war films in an "off the record" private showing in which was revealed the bloodiest warfare the world has ever known.

We saw German parachutists land and immediately assemble machine guns; we saw giant German bombers unloading their cargo of death and destruction on the peace-loving countries of Norway, Holland, and Belgium; we saw the flame thrower taking its toll of human life and property; we saw the 6-ton, 20-ton, and 80-ton tanks in action; we saw the armored cars and motorcycles—in short, we saw Panzer divisions, with not one soldier on foot, destroy modern armies that yesterday were heralded as among the world's greatest military forces.

Ladies and gentlemen, it is too bad William Allen White and his committee, who advocate stripping our own national defense to aid the Allies, could not witness the harrowing spectacle revealed by these films. In one Panzer division they employ 288 light tanks, 72 medium tanks, forty-five 6-ton tanks, thirty-six 20-ton tanks, and twelve 80-ton tanks, or a total of 453 tanks. Remember, this is only 1 Panzer division, and Hitler boasts of many such units.

Let us in passing, and for contrast, dwell for a moment on the amount of our own military equipment from an inventory of supplies actually on hand, together with the equipment that is considered as being "on order" and revealed by the following tables:

You will note from the above tables that in the entire United States Army on May 1, 1940, we had 10 light tanks and 18 medium tanks, or a grand total of 28 modern tanks of a type comparable to a modern German tank. Yes, it must be admitted we have 392 light tanks on order, but you will note they will not be delivered until June 1, 1941. You will also note we have 126 medium tanks on order and their delivery is not until August 1941.

Let us not forget the Air Corps of the Army and Navy and their important place in present day methods of warfare. Rear Admiral John H. Towers, Chief of the Bureau of Aeronautics, recently told the Senate Naval Affairs Committee that the Navy had only 1,755 and on order, 1,137. He continued by asserting the Navy would have only 1,902 combat planes by July 1, 1941.

Major General Arnold, Chief of the Army Air Corps testified that of the 2,752 planes in the Army Air Corps, only 52 planes are fit for modern warfare, and of the remaining 2,700, perhaps a half dozen could be rendered fit for combat. In other words, we have 58 fighting planes in the United States Army and Germany has 18,000.

William Allen White and his committee, eager to furnish aid to the Allies, especially planes, should thoroughly analyze the fact that as to the planes on order, the whole delivery schedule of Army and Navy planes has been delayed by a recent order giving the Allies priority on all American military production desired by them. Thus the 3,837 planes on order are not in fact in production for our own use should the Allies elect to call for them.

Ladies and gentlemen, you recall from the start of this discussion we decided to look at the facts. One fact you cannot overlook is that soldiers, sailors, and marines cannot fight wars with equipment on order, and William Allen White and his committee should recognize this fact. Another fact is that the General Staff of the United States Army knows more about war than the President or anyone else, and I am convinced when Hon. Harry H. Woodring resigned as Secretary of War he was forced to do so because he elected to follow the advice of military experts rather than to accept the viewpoint of a group of international meddlers whose military knowledge is zero plus and whose only concern is to utter high-sounding phrases tending to send the youth of America to the battlefields of Europe. Hon. Harry H. Woodring is entitled to the esteem and love of the great American public for his courage and manhood in refusing to become a tool of the international bankers. One has only to read the following statement from Harry Woodring's own lips to arrive at a suitable conclusion as to why he was forced to resign as Secretary of War. Upon returning to his native State of Kansas on June 1, 1940 to receive honors from Washburn College, Secretary Woodring said:

"I'm an advocate of adequate defense, but I will never stand for sending American boys into Europe's shambles. There is a comparatively small clique of international financiers who want the United States to declare war and get into the European mess with everything we have, including our manpower. I'm not going to stand for it and I'm not going to resign until forced to do so. They don't like me because I'm against stripping our own defenses for the sake of trying to stop Hitler 3,000 miles away. Eventually they will force me to resign, and I'll be darned glad to come back to Kansas where the people have their feet on the ground and are not easily swayed by demagogues and subtle propaganda."

Ladies and gentlemen, Harry Woodring saw the handwriting on the wall and, as a true American, he put the welfare of his country first. In other words, he has the only sensible viewpoint—build an adequate national defense by arming to the teeth.

But the White committee of superpatriots would have us police the entire globe and neglect our own back yard.

We must recognize the fact that in addition to building up our own military defenses we have the problem of assisting in militarizing the Western Hemisphere, which means adequate defense for every country south of the Rio Grande.

No doubt some of you have visited Latin America and realize the shortcomings of our neighbors in these countries and the impossibility of developing them into military men. They lack both the temperament and the physique to make real soldiers. In order to protect our own interests and to offset the alien influences now running hog wild in these countries, we have a huge task in being forced to send men, money, planes, tanks, and other implements of war to properly militarize this Western Hemisphere.

In the face of building our own inadequate defenses and shouldering the burdens of our Latin American neighbors, William Allen White and his committee have the gall of an army mule in advocating that we strip our armed forces of greatly needed military equipment in their frenzied efforts to meddle into European affairs.

I take the position we must arm to the teeth and when that task is completed militarize South America before turning our attention to the plight of European nations.

America has a huge task in carrying out our national-defense program, because it is easily seen that needed equipment cannot be delivered for a period of from 18 months to 2 years. At the completion of that period we hope to have an Army and equipment comparable to Hitler at a cost of approximately $50,000,000,000. We cannot possibly achieve this goal if we are to listen to William Allen White and his cohorts or the propaganda from Europe that would have us strip our armed forces of material necessary for an adequate national defense.

Our national-defense program will be of no avail unless we as a nation unite in our efforts to properly defend this country and the Western Hemisphere. There was never a time in the history of this great Nation when national unity was at a greater premium.

If this objective is to be attained our national unity must be above suspicion. America will not countenance the presence of those who harbor a desire for other forms of government. Such deluded individuals with their warped minds and false political philosophies are the scum of creation and unfit to associate with liberty-loving Americans. These breeders of international hatred and disrupters of the American way of life are the tools of Stalin and Hitler and form the backbone of the "fifth column" in America. Despite the love of Americans for national unity, it is a known fact that the "fifth column" is running hog-wild throughout the country. Yes; the "fifth column" is on the march.

No city in this great land is immune to the workings of these disciples of Stalin, Mussolini, and Hitler. They preach and practice their un-American doctrines with a sneer on their faces and a song of hate in their black hearts.

With reckless abandon and unmitigated gall they have invaded Government departments in the Nation's Capital, enlisting Federal employees in their determined drive to undermine this Government.

Make no mistake about it—the "fifth column" is on the march.

Daily the corridors of many Government buildings in Washington resound to the footsteps of hundreds of Federal employees known to harbor un-American doctrines.

I hold in my hand a printed membership list of the Washington, D. C., branch of the American League for Peace and Democracy containing the names of 563 Government employees known to be members of this organization, branded by the Dies Committee as a Communist-front organization. The salaries of this group range from $1,080 to $10,000 annually, which are paid from the pockets of the taxpayers of America. Since this list was published in the official hearings of the Dies Committee on October 5, 1939, only 20 persons named therein have notified the Dies Committee that they have renounced their membership. During the month of June the House of Representatives was informed that this group of employees was still on the Federal pay roll. One week later specific attention was directed to a fellow traveler in the Department of Labor who, while occupying a $7,000-a-year position, finds time to carry on at the expense of the American taxpayer the program of another Communist-front organization.

A week later I had called to my attention that the acting chairman of the Federal Advisory Council for Employment Security, when asked to consider a motion granting preference to American citizens, publicly confessed the fact that he was an alien.

The climax in this parade of "fifth columnists" was reached several days ago when there arrived in Washington a man who from his own lips asserted that he was a delegate to the Twentieth Anniversary of the Russian Revolution in Moscow. This individual is daily awaiting an appointment to a key position in our national-defense program concerning the training of the youth of America.

Yes; the "fifth column" is truly on the march in this great Nation. Congress has enacted the necessary laws to suppress the "fifth column" if only those high in authority would recognize this menace and move promptly to exterminate it.

America cannot afford to allow this parade of "fifth columnists" to go on unmolested. With the entire country working at a feverish pace to attain the objectives of our national-defense program, it is not difficult to realize how the "fifth columnists," or, as they are more appropriately termed, "filth columnists," can disrupt our well-organized plans.

Every loyal American will find no difficulty in recognizing the real threat of the "fifth column" to our national unity and likewise to our priceless heritage—a free democracy.

It is unthinkable that the taxpayers of America should be called upon to pay the salaries of Federal employees who have "fifth column" tendencies. Nor should the mothers and fathers of America be asked to entrust the training of their sons to Moscow-minded individuals. We have only to recall the sad fate of France and other countries of Europe betrayed by the "fifth columnists," who were permitted to thrive unmolested at the expense of the people.

Let the message of the American people to these alien agitators be phrased in plain language—if you don't like the American form of government; get out and stay out.

We have heard a lot recently of purging political officeholders for differences in opinion. If we are to attain the required solidarity of this Nation, let us witness those in high authority conducting a worth-while purge in ousting from Government circles known enemies to the American way of life.

America has a gigantic task in building a national defense to preserve our priceless heritage of liberty and freedom. But we can never accomplish our task while there lurks in the shadows of the Nation's Capitol a group of alien-minded ingrates who, like vultures, are bent on destroying this Nation.

America is at the crossroads. If we are to proceed in the right direction, let us with a firm hand and a stout heart inform the "fifth columnists" that their heydey is over and that they will be no longer coddled, nursed, or tolerated.

In short, there is no choice. You are either an American or not an American.

Let our actions and our words convey to these "fifth columnists" in blunt language the command of all liberty-loving Americans: If you don't like America, get out and stay out.

In closing, let us for a moment pay tribute to those of our citizens who have laid down their lives in defense of this country. Let us keep in mind the many sacrifices of our forefathers that were necessary in developing this great Nation.

Three thousand miles away a war is raging, but here we are peacefully assembled in this beautiful auditorium, protected by a form of government that has been given us as a priceless heritage.

Let us return to our respective homes conscious of the many blessings we enjoy and with a firm resolve to protect and defend with our lives, if necessary, our cherished possessions—peace and freedom.

Chances We Might Not Have a President

OF

HON. ESTES KEFAUVER

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

NONPARTISAN RADIO FORUM OF THE AMERICAN GOOD GOVERNMENT SOCIETY

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include herein the text of the broadcast of Nonpartisan Radio Forum of the American Good Government Society, on which I was guest speaker. This was broadcast over the coast-to-coast blue network of the National Broadcasting Co., August 21, at 9:30 p. m., eastern standard time. Also I include the bill H. R. 9642 at the end of the broadcast script.

ANNOUNCER. In keeping with its policy of bringing listeners broadcasts on important public questions, the National Broadcasting Co. presents the Nonpartisan Radio Forum, conducted by the American Good Government Society.

The distinguished guest on the program is Representative ESTES KEFAUVER, Democrat, of Tennessee, who will be introduced and interviewed by Richard A. Staderman, Independent, of New York, and president of the society.

Mr. STADERMAN. Thank you, George Gunn, and good evening all friends of good government from the Atlantic to the Pacific coast. It is true but unfortunate that a Presidential election is the greatest sporting event in the Nation. Every 4 years we witness national political conventions full of ballyhoo and almost everything but the calm deliberation the founding fathers of 1787 hoped to apply to the choosing of a President. After the nominations we witness much the same thing until election day. Sometimes genuine issues are debated, other times the candidates seem to try to outdo each other in mud slinging, having little or no bearing on the fundamental public questions involved.

It seems particularly difficult to arouse public interest in the defects of the basic law of the land pertaining to Presidential elections. Last year, over another network, it was our privilege to present Congressman CLARENCE F. LEA, of California, who is not only chairman of the House Interstate Commerce Committee, but a leading authority on election laws. In that broadcast we showed how, in 1876, Mr. Tilden received a quarter of a million more popular votes than Mr. Hayes, and yet Hayes become President through the outmoded electoral college, which we felt and still feel should be abolished, as the Lea bill in Congress provides.

Tonight we are considering another serious defect in the Presidential election laws which might sometime, perhaps even in 1941, bring an inauguration day with no one legally able to be inaugurated. This may sound like a fantastic statement, but we believe that after you have listened to our distinguished guest tonight, most of you will agree.

Before proceeding to him we invite listeners to give us their comment on this program. Simply write the American Good Government Society, Washington, D. C. On a recent program over this network, we presented Republican Congressmen. Tonight, therefore, we present a Democratic one, Congressman ESTES KEFAUVER, of Tennessee—his last name being spelled K-E-F-A-U-V-E-R. An attorney and now member of the House Judiciary Committee, he is eminently qualified to discuss this topic.

Congressman KEFAUVER, what do you propose to do about these election laws?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Thank you, Mr. Staderman.

I wish first of all to commend you and the American Good Government Society for the public services you are rendering in bringing important but neglected problems to the attention of the American public.

Even during these hectic days, when our thoughts pertain mainly to our national defense and to the selection of a President in November, I think it is well to consider and examine our laws, or, rather, some omissions in our laws, which might result in great confusion and uncertainty as to the office of the President, or even in our failure to have a President.

"The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America." These two lines in the Constitution establish all executive power in one person. It places the President beyond the reach of any other department, except impeachment and conviction by Congress.

Mr. STADERMAN. Tell us what situations might arise to keep us from having a President.

Mr. KEFAUVER. It is not necessary that I discuss the confusion, uncertainties, and havoc that would result from our failure to have a President, even for a very short time. The difficulties that would arise are obvious to everyone. There would be no head of the executive department. The members of the Cabinet and the chiefs of departments could not be appointed. No vacancies in the executive department could be filled. The Army and the Navy would be without a Commander in Chief. All laws would have to be passed by a two-thirds majority in both Houses of Congress, and it is doubtful if any valid law could be enacted even by a two-thirds majority, as under the Constitution a law must be presented to the President before it can be passed by a two-thirds majority.

The idea of a vacancy in the office of President was abhorrent to the Constitution makers. Such a thing was unthinkable. But while they studiously avoided the use of the word "vacancy," they failed to provide against such a contingency, and no provision has as yet been made by constitutional amendment or by congressional enactment to insure that we have a President under all circumstances and at all times.

The contingencies, remote but nevertheless real and possible under which we might on Inauguration Day, January 20, find this Nation without a Chief Executive are:

First, should the President-elect and the Vice-President-elect die or become disqualified before the inauguration, or should the President-elect die or become disqualified before the inauguration and the Senate fail to elect a Vice President.

The second contingency may arise through failure (1) of the electoral college to elect a President, and (2) through failure of the House of Representatives to choose a President before the beginning of his term.

Suppose there should be no majority over all for any Presidential candidate in some Presidential election. A third party has, and might again bring about this situation. Two hundred and sixty-six votes are necessary to elect. The election of a President would then be thrown into the House of Representatives. It would be a new House, one elected at the previous election. It would meet on January 3. It would have to organize. It could not organize until it elected a Speaker. This may not be possible for days or weeks or even months. Deadlocks have occurred in the past over the election of the Speaker, one lasing several months. The electoral vote is required by law to be counted on January 6, only 3 days after the first meeting of a new Congress.

Obviously, if a deadlock over the Speakership should ensue and not be broken by January 6, the two Houses of Congress could not even meet in joint session on that date to count the electoral vote, much less proceed to the election of a President or Vice President. Assuming, however, that a Speaker of the House were to be elected promptly, and the count of the electoral vote disclosed a stalemate, the House would proceed to ballot for President. No other business would be in order from day to day. The date for the inauguration of the President is January 20, as fixed by the Constitution, allowing but 12 weekdays in which to make a choice, and if no one is chosen by that time the Vice President, if the Senate meanwhile has elected one, would become Acting President; otherwise, under this bill, the Speaker of the House would become Acting President, and the House and Senate would continue to ballot for President and Vice President, respectively. In the election of a Vice President by the Senate two-thirds of the Senators shall constitute a quorum, and a majority of the whole number is necessary to elect. It might be an easy matter to prevent an election by the absence of a constitutional quorum.

In the extremely remote possibility of the death or disqualification of both the President-elect and the Vice-President-elect, there is no provision now in our Constitution or statutes for the selection of an Acting President.

To meet these contingencies the bill, H. R. 9462, designates the Speaker of the House of Representatives as Acting President until a President shall have been qualified. If the House of Representatives has not chosen a Speaker, then, and then only, the bill designates the President of the Senate pro tempore to act as President.

Mr. STADERMAN. What does the United States Constitution have to say about succession to the Presidency, Congressman KEFAUVER?

Mr. KEFAUVER. The Constitution, Mr. Staderman, makes no provision for succession in the event of the death or disqualification of both the President and of the President-elect, or in the event the House has failed to elect a President and the Senate a Vice President, when that duty devolves upon them.

Three years after the ratification of the Constitution, the Congress, in which sat many members of the Constitutional Convention, passed a law to take care of a vacancy in the office of President, providing for the succession, first, to the President pro tempore of the Senate, and then to the Speaker of the House, who should act as President until a special election could be had.

This law remained on the statute books until 1886, when it was repealed. The reason for its repeal was that Vice President Hendricks had just died. The President pro tempore of the Senate was a Republican. He would have succeeded to the Presidency in the event of the death of President Cleveland. The Succession Act of 1886 made the succession fall first to the Secretary of State, and then on down through the Cabinet.

This is the law today, but it takes care of a vacancy arising only after a President has qualified. Most constitutional authorities do not interpret the law to provide for succession in the contingencies contemplated in the bill under discussion, to wit, where a President has not been chosen before inauguration or where a President-elect and a Vice-President-elect should not have qualified.

Mr. STADERMAN. Before the passage of the twentieth amendment to the Constitution (the so-called Norris amendment), the new President qualified on March 4, so that the House had 3 months in which to elect a President in the event the election of one devolved upon it. But by the Norris amendment the term of the retiring President expires on January 20. The House meets on January 3, thus the House, as you have previously said, has only 12 working days in which to elect a President if it should be required to do so. This amendment increases the necessity for the passage of the Kefauver bill, does it not?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Yes; and furthermore, Mr. Staderman, the twentieth amendment contemplated that Congress would pass a law to take care of the contingencies we have been discussing.

Section 3 of the twentieth amendment is as follows:

"If, at the time fixed for the beginning of the term of the President, the President-elect shall have died, the Vice-President-elect shall become President. If a President shall not have been chosen before the time fixed for the beginning of his term, or if the President-elect shall have failed to qualify, then the Vice-President-elect shall act as President until a President shall have qualified; and the Congress may by law provide for the case wherein neither a President-elect nor a Vice-President-elect shall have qualified, declaring who shall then act as President, or the manner in which one who is to act shall be selected, and such person shall act accordingly until a President or Vice President shall have qualified."

Thus it will be seen that this amendment authorizes this legislation. The bill is in pursuance to provisions of section 3.

Under this provision it will be seen that Congress derives authority to designate any person whomsoever it desires to act as President under the circumstances indicated. An analogy is furnished in the temporary function exercised by the Chief Justice of the United States when presiding over the Senate in a trial of an impeached President. His authority so to act is in the Constitution. Likewise, the authority of Congress to designate a person, any person, to act as President is derived from the same source, the Constitution.

Mr. STADERMAN. Have any Presidential elections ever been thrown into the House of Representatives?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Yes; in 1800 Thomas Jefferson and Aaron Burr received the same number of electoral votes—73. The Jefferson-Burr controversy threatened a dissolution of the Government. It was said that the country escaped from a civil war only by the prevalence of that kind temper in the Congress which prevailed in the Constitutional Convention itself. This was the first time a Presidential election had been thrown in the House of Representatives, and it nearly wrecked the young Republic.

The second and last time an election was thrown into the House of Representatives was in 1824. In the electoral college Jackson had 99 votes, Adams 84, Crawford 41, and Clay 37. The great Tennessean, Andrew Jackson, had a plurality of 50,000 in the popular vote. There was no question as to the election of John C. Calhoun as Vice President. Henry Clay was Speaker of the House at that time. Before the day for counting the votes a great scandal arose. Charges of corruption were made against Clay, which were investigated without result. The situation was one which invited intrigue, and no doubt there was much bargaining and attempted trading of votes. Excitement ran high. A coalition between the followers of Clay and those of Adams resulted in the election of John Quincy Adams on the first ballot. Clay, on account of being fourth in the electoral college, was eliminated in the House. If the old provision of voting for the five highest on the list had not been changed to the three highest, Clay instead of Adams probably would have been the choice. Adams, when a Senator, had opposed the change from five to three, and had his argument prevailed, it is unlikely he would have become President.

Another election was almost thrown into the House in 1876 during the Hayes-Tilden controversy. Congress, by setting up a joint committee, whose decision as to the election was final, avoided an election by the House. Hayes was found to be elected by a majority of one.

Mr. STADERMAN. Why in your bill, Congressman KEFAUVER, have you designated the Speaker of the House of Representatives as first choice and President pro tempore of the Senate as second choice for Acting President?

Mr. KEFAUVER. The reason, Mr. Staderman, is that the Speaker of the House has been recently elected by a majority of the Members of the House. The House represents the latest expression of the people. In other words, it might be said that he derives his power direct from the people, as a result of the recent election. In a lesser degree the same could be said of the President pro tempore of the Senate.

There is a great deal of logic in succession to the Cabinet members beginning with the Secretary of State if a vacancy occurs after the beginning of a term. The Secretary of State and the Cabinet members are the choice of the President and are familiar with and sympathetic with the policy of the administration and would be best fitted to carry it forward. But this logic does not apply where a President does not qualify, as a Cabinet member of the old administration might be entirely out of harmony with the recently expressed will of the people and with the intended purposes of the new administration.

By designating the Speaker of the House, and if no Speaker has been elected, the President pro tempore of the Senate, the Congress by the enactment of this bill would be designating a compatible officer just as it did recently when an Assistant Secretary of the Navy was designated as Acting Secretary.

Upon the election of a President or of a Vice President, the Acting President would automatically resume the duties of his office of Speaker of the House or President pro tempore of the Senate, as the case may be. The bill provides that no vacancy in these positions would have ensued, and the Acting President would receive the emoluments of the President only so long as he should act as such.

Mr. STADERMAN. Thank you, Congressman KEFAUVER, for your convincing explanation of your bill. We of the Good Government Society certainly hope that your plan will become law. Listeners may send their comment on this program directly to the American Good Government Society, Washington, D. C. Those persons favoring the Kefauver bill, H. R. 9462, just discussed, would help to make it law by expressing their views about it.

I believe we have a few moments to summarize several high points of the program for the benefit of listeners who tuned in after it began. There might be no one legally able to assume the duties of President on inauguration day due to (1) possible death or disability of President-elect and Vice-President-elect; (2) due to repetition of the 1876 situation when Congress was unable for months to determine whom the rightful President-elect and Vice-President-elect were, on account of conflicting and allegedly fraudulent election returns; (3) due to lack of a majority in the electorial college having thrown the election of President and Vice President into the House and Senate respectively as the Constitution provides, and if neither Chamber is able to muster a majority needed to select any one candidate; and (4) due to the fact that if no one political party should have a majority in the House in the new Congress counting the Presidential votes, the House might be unable to legally organize to elect a Speaker and there might be no joint session of Congress legally possible to carry out the constitutional mandate of approving the votes in what might otherwise be a clear-cut election of President and Vice President.

This is Richard A. Staderman saying good-bye and good government.

A bill designating the person who shall act as President if a President shall not have been chosen before the time fixed for the beginning of his term, or when neither a President-elect nor a Vice-President-elect shall have qualified

Be it enacted, etc., That if a President shall not have been chosen before the time fixed for the beginning of his term, or neither a President-elect nor a Vice-President-elect shall have qualified, the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall act as President until a President or a Vice President shall have qualified: Provided, That if the House of Representatives shall not have elected a Speaker, the President of the Senate pro tempore shall then act as President until a President or a Vice President shall have qualified: Provided further, That no vacancy shall ensue in the office of the Speaker of the House of Representatives nor in the office of the President of the Senate pro tempore by reason of this act.

SEC. 2. The person who shall act as President shall take the oath of office prescribed in the Constitution before entering upon the discharge of his duties, and he shall receive compensation at the rate prescribed for the President and none other during his incumbency as Acting President, and he shall exercise the powers, functions, and prerogatives of the Chief Executive while so acting; and when a President or a Vice President shall have qualified such person shall thereupon relinquish the office as Acting President and automatically resume the duties of the office of Speaker of the House of Representaitves or President of the Senate pro tempore, as the case may be.

Interstate Trade Barriers

EDITORIAL FROM THE WASHINGTON EVENING STAR

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, a most excellent editorial entitled "Interstate Trade Barriers," appeared in the Washington Evening Star Saturday, August 17. The statements contained therein lend emphasis to the report of the Committee on Interstate Trade Barriers and Unemployment, which was submitted to this House a few days ago and which is contained in House Document 850, Seventy-sixth Congress. In that report we of the committee simply went a step further than does this editorial and pointed out that freight-rate discriminations constitute perhaps the greatest barrier of all. I am happy to insert herewith in the RECORD that editorial:

[From the Washington Star of August 17, 1940]

INTERSTATE TRADE BARRIERS

In its plans to conduct an educational and promotional drive, through its field offices, for the removal of interstate trade barriers, the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce is undertaking a project well worth while. For these trade barriers impede the free flow of commerce between the States, and their elimination will do much to speed business recovery. Under the program announced this week by Director James W. Young, the Bureau will explain to business and civic organizations the economic effects of these discriminations against trade, and cooperate with them in collecting local examples of laws, rules, and regulations that serve as obstacles to the movement of commerce from one State to another.

These discriminations are of many kinds. Several States, for example, tax nonresident motor vehicles so as to discriminate in favor of busses and trucks owned locally. In laws regulating dairy, oleomargarine, trucking, and other operations, farm products face many barriers. In one State, a fresh egg is an egg laid only in that State. However fresh eggs from other States must be labeled "foreign eggs," and the containers from which they are sold must be so marked. The regulations governing sizes, weights, and measures differ widely, and are a cause of much confusion. Though Idaho and Maine sell their potatoes all over the country, standards of weight or the cubic content of a bushel of potatoes vary between the States by as much as 30 percent. Oil-burning equipment made in New Jersey cannot be installed in New York City.

For several years Federal officials have been studying the problem created by the increasing barriers to interstate trade. Last fall, at the suggestion of Secretary Hopkins, an interdepartmental committee on interstate trade barriers was established. The committee has assembled a great deal of information on the subject. These data have been turned over to State organizations.

As Secretary Hopkins pointed out some months ago, the removal of these barriers rests with the States. The Southern Governors' Conference, at its meeting at Nashville in January, approved resolutions condemning specific kinds of discriminatory laws, and there have been evidences elsewhere that the States are beginning to realize the economic significance of these discriminations against interstate commerce. This is a hopeful sign.

Roads and Trails To Develop Inaccessible Regions Where Enormous Natural Resources Remain

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. COMPTON I. WHITE

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 29, 1940

STATEMENT OF HON. COMPTON I. WHITE, OF IDAHO, BEFORE THE SENATE APPROPRIATIONS COMMITTEE

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, the construction of roads and trails to open the inaccessible regions in vast, rugged, mountainous sections of the West is one of the most important undertakings depending on the policy of the Federal Government. The development of the extensive mineral, timber, and waterpower resources of this important section of our country is entirely dependent on the construction of the necessary roads by the Federal Government. In support of the program I have appeared before the Senate Appropriations Committee and presented the facts concerning this appropriation, which is submitted for the RECORD:

FOREST SERVICE

[Statement of Hon. COMPTON I. WHITE, a Representative in Congress from the State of Idaho]

FOREST ROADS AND TRAILS

Representative WHITE. Mr. Chairman, I come to you to speak about one of the most important appropriations carried in this appropriation bill, as I see it. That is the item for forest roads and trails. I understand the Budget authorization of $10,000,000 has been cut by the House to $7,500,000.

IMPORTANCE OF DEVELOPING ROADS AND TRAILS

In dealing with the appropriation for forest roads and trails we are dealing with the development of our great resources which are inaccessible. I have a very heavy responsibility in representing a district which contains the greatest concentration of national forests within the United States. There may be a little greater area in California, but in that great strip of country which commences at the national divide and extends down to the Snake River, dividing Oregon and Washington, we have vast resources that are locked up. They are in the national forests. Seventy-two percent of the State of Idaho is federally owned, and there is no way of opening up the country. We are working under a terrific handicap. The forest needs every dollar in that item. It is a short-sighted policy to cut that appropriation, which should be increased, if anything.

We are dealing here with the great Territory of Alaska. The habitable portion of Alaska, in the southern part, is largely in national forests. We are dealing with Arizona, and with all the Western States—with a territory that is in the undeveloped section of the country. There is no way the States and counties can go into this territory, where there is no taxable property. If we could develop the resources of that territory we could put men to work. The strategic minerals which the Government is searching for are to be found in that territory.

I have here some pictures of Stibnite, Idaho. I wish to take the time of the committee to show some of the pictures of the things we have in Idaho. I could furnish you a whole book.

Antimony comes from stibnite. The Government has just gone in there and is financing the development. That country is reached by going over three mountain roads to a place called Yellow Pine, where the stibnite operation is going on, employing about 200 men, producing a metal which is of vital importance in supplying alloys needed in the manufacture of steel.

That activity is concerned with this item of the appropriation for forest roads and trails. These pictures show the character of the country and the kind of roads we have to build to obtain access to the territory. This [indicating] is a bird's-eye view. This [indicating] is a picture of old Thunder Mountain, the place that was opened when William Allen White went in there, and the town of Roosevelt was established in Teddy Roosevelt's day. I have here a picture of the town of Roosevelt, which was built in Teddy Roosevelt's time. It is now under about 40 feet of water. A slide came down the mountain, crossed the valley and formed a big dam which backed up the water. This is the way it looks today [exhibiting a photograph] with a few houses floating around.

We are also dealing with a gold treasure. We have the great Idaho granite intrusion, containing seams of gold which produced gold back in 1860 and 1870. We are credited with having produced $300,000,000 in gold. Heavy machinery must be taken back into the mountains to operate the mines, and the work is done under a terrific handicap.

Senator RUSSELL. What minerals were produced at the Roosevelt mine?

Representative WHITE. They are now producing gold there. There is a mill in there. This is the way they got oil in [exhibiting photograph]. The mine was up on Thunder Mountain.

A peculiar thing about Thunder Mountain is that the only way to get into Thunder Mountain is to follow the forest roads and trails to the end, and then go in on horseback. I was up there. I followed the forest trails and roads to the end, parked my car, and the little party I was with was met by a string of pack horses.

In the center of the United States, we cannot get a road into Thunder Mountain. This picture [indicating] shows a barrel of oil which was dropped from an airplane to keep that mill in operation. It broke into a thousand pieces. Some of the oil was scooped up out of the snow.

We are dealing with a serious proposition when we talk about roads and trails. We must have a constructive policy that will open up the country and put men to work developing our resources. I was trying to help this thing along. I saw Mr. Bell, Director of the Budget, and tried to impress him with the importance of this activity, and pave the way for a slight increase in the Budget for forest roads and trails. I went on to tell him about the gold lying there waiting to be developed. He said, "We have too much gold now." I said "All right. Let us fold up and go home."

This picture shows the way they get machinery into the mine. This [indicating] is a winch. The machinery is let down from the top of the mountain. If you want to get down to a mine, you have to let the machinery down with a hand winch. When you get it down there, how are you going to get your gasoline and fuel oil in to run the machinery and open up the country? Those are some of the things we are up against.

Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to take too much of the time of the committee. We are making many, many appropriations. I certainly hope that when the committee scans the little item for roads and trails it will have a little appreciation of what it means to all of us. It is important to the eastern section of the country, which supplies the machinery. It is important to the oil-producting section of the country, which supplies the oil to run the machinery. It is important to those who supply the food and clothing that go in there.

In that rough and rugged country there is no competition. Everybody in there has to take in everything he consumes, whether it be oil to drive a Diesel engine, the clothes he wears on his back, or the food he eats.

We are interested in permanent employment. We are not interested in the little job of building a road. We do not care anything about that. We are interested in putting men to work permanently in these mines and adding to the national wealth.

AMOUNT OF AUTHORIZATION

Senator HAYDEN. The situation, for the record, is that the authorization for this appropriation was $14,000,000 the previous 2 years. For this 2-year period, because of the failure of Congress to appropriate the amount authorized, there was a lag in the expenditures. The authorization for this fiscal year is $10,000,000. The reduction from $14,000,000 to $10,000,00 was caused by the failure of Congress to appropriate the amount of money authorized by law. Congress simply has not appropriated the money, and the lag in the authorization has accumulated in that way. For the fiscal year 1941 the authorization is $13,000,000. I take it, what Mr. WHITE wants is the full amount authorized by law appropriated.

Representative WHITE. I do. I am not asking you to go beyond that.

Senator TOWNSEND. You are in favor of developing our domestic gold, and not buying so much foreign gold.

Representative WHITE. I think the whole monetary policy of the country is in error. It does not conform to the fundamental principles of economics. We must have in this country a good, workable, adequate money system based upon precious metals; and we will never get away from it.

Just now we are witnessing another reduction of the gold content of the franc. In the old days things were stabilized and nearly all the European units were on the basis of 5 to our dollar—5 marks to a dollar, 5 francs to a dollar, and so forth. Just think of the experience those people are going through over there, on account of the money system we have, which has upset the whole situation.

I do not want to go into the money question with you gentlemen, but just contrast our policy in the United States with the policy being followed in Canada. I have a photostatic copy of an article telling of the money being spent by the Canadian Government to assist in developing their mining industry. They are doing everything in the world, and they are just walking right away from us. In the past 2 years we have always exceeded Canada in the production of gold, but in recent times we have fallen further and further behind. Canada's gold production is contributing to her industry, her prosperity, and her business recovery.

We are dealing with a serious problem.

Senator TOWNSEND. The Canadians are developing their mining interests and sending the gold to us, and we are paying $35 an ounce for it.

Mr. Speaker, the Senate Appropriations Committee in recognition of the need for an adequate appropriation for this work increased the amount in the appropriation bill from $7,500,000 to $10,000,000 as it appears in the amended bill,

H. R. 8202, an act making appropriation for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, which is shown in the item for forest roads and trails, page 46 of the amended bill, as follows:

FOREST ROADS AND TRAILS

For carrying out the provisions of section 23 of the Federal Highway Act approved November 9, 1921 (23 U. S. C. 23), including not to exceed $59,500 for departmental personal services in the District of Columbia, ~~$7,500,000~~ $10,000,000, which sum consists of the balance of the amount authorized to be appropriated for the fiscal year 1940 and ~~$500,000~~ $3,000,000 of the amount authorized to be appropriated for the fiscal year 1941 by the act approved June 8, 1938 (52 Stat. 635), to be immediately * * *.

Production of Shoes by Convict Labor

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LAWRENCE J. CONNERY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 22, 1940

LETTER FROM UNITED SHOE WORKERS OF AMERICA

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, for the edification and information of the Members of the House, I present herewith the letter I have recently received from the United Shoe Workers of America, C. I. O., voicing the protest of that organization against the mass production of shoes by convict labor in the Federal prisons. I have already voiced my protest to the Director of the C. C. C. and to the War Department in this matter.

The letter follows:

UNITED SHOE WORKERS OF AMERICA, OF THE C. I. O.
Washington, D. C., August 13, 1940.

Hon. LAWRENCE J. CONNERY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN CONNERY: In behalf of the thousands of your shoe worker constituents, and especially in the interest of those who are now unemployed, we call your attention to the fact that the Quartermaster's Corps of the Army is about to award an order for 300,000 pairs of shoes to the Leavenworth prison for manufacture by convict labor.

The men's shoe industry, we are sure you are aware, has suffered the worst spring and summer seasons to date in many years, and weekly wages earned by many workers in this industry have hit new lows. Workers in this industry cannot afford any loss in wages as the average pay is only $880 a year, a sum too low to maintain a decent American standard of living.

Congress has expressed its will in regard to this matter in Public, No. 271, Seventy-first Congress, which reads in part, as follows:

"* * * that the Attorney General provide employment for inmates in the United States penal institutions in such diversified forms as will reduce to a minimum competition with private industry or free labor."

The Federal Prison Housing, Inc., the agency which handles this matter, has been increasing the activities of its shoe factories until it now constitutes a serious threat to the maintenance of standards in the competitive commercial shoe industry. This is shown more clearly by the fact that in 1932 the total annual production of the shoe factory in Leavenworth prison was 240,000 pairs and now, having completed an order of 120,000 pairs for the C. C. C. so far this year, they are about to take this order for an additional 300,000 pairs, bringing their total production this year to a minimum of 500,000 pairs.

It seems paradoxical that it should be necessary for the thousands of trained skilled shoe workers to commit a crime before they are permitted to work at their trade.

We urge you to protest both to the Director of the C. C. C. and to Maj. Letcher O. Grice, in charge of shoe purchases in the Quartermaster Corps of the United States Army.

Your interest in this matter will be deeply appreciated, and we would appreciate your keeping us informed of any action you may take in regard to this matter.

Respectfully yours,

FRANK MCGRATH,
President.
JAMES J. MITCHELL,
General Secretary-Treasurer.

Research Director, United Shoe Workers of America, C. I. O.

Reply of Secretary Ickes to Mr. Willkie

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RUSH D. HOLT

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 22 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ARTICLE BY WESTBROOK PEGLER

Mr. HOLT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an article by Westbrook Pegler entitled "I Can Lick Ickes." It is the story of "Honest" Harold Ickes, the famous stamp collector.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FAIR ENOUGH

(By Westbrook Pegler)

"I CAN LICK ICKES"

When I was writing sport back in the era of wonderful nonsense we had a muscle-bound middleweight with a nose like a summer squash who called himself Johnny Wilson and who couldn't lick anybody but the champion of the world. He admitted that he wasn't much good, but he insisted that there was one guy that he could lick, anywhere, any time.

"I may be a lousy fighter," he used to say, "but I can lick Mike O'Dowd," and the fact of the matter is that he was and he could.

That is the way I feel about Harold Ickes.

I may not be so hot when you put me in with some of those main-event ideology blokes and fancy-Dan economists, but give me Ickes any time. He was made for me. Santa Claus brought him for me. In this world every guy has a sign on at least one other guy, and Harold Ickes is my guy.

I murdered him out in Chicago during the Democratic Convention when the party of Roosevelt and humanity renominated the great indispensable under the social and political auspices of a gang of political porch climbers and who else but Harold the pure in heart? It was like catching a parson in a raid and hearing the parson explain that, believe it or not, he was just waiting for a streetcar.

Here was the great reformer messing around, and even getting his picture taken, with Ed Kelly, the mayor, whom he himself had denounced as a gang politician of the worst type and against whom he had been of more than half a mind to run for mayor, in a noble sacrifice to save Chicago from a fate which is worse than death.

Mr. Ickes and Harry Hopkins, another sanctimonious devil chaser, went out to handle the job for the party or humanity, and not only got caught with Kelly and his mob but with Frank Hague, of Jersey City, and, what's more, somebody snapped Harold's picture with them.

Harold's weakness is his own kind of stuff. He likes to rip and tear and try to pull your arms off; and if you stand back and try to box him fancy, he will knock your head through the skylight. But tear into him before he can get out of his corner and bat him a couple, then pull him and bull him around a little, and he will start to look for that gate, yelling "Foul!" I know my guy from experience.

I don't wish I were running for President, but I tell you one thing—if I were I couldn't ask for sweeter luck than to have them send Ickes after me. Inside of a week you would read that Mr. Ickes had been compelled to drop out of the campaign and put himself away in the United States Naval Hospital in Washington, his favorite rest cure, at $3.25 a day.

I wouldn't quit reminding the citizens that Mr. Ickes is so cheap that when he gets sick or wants a rest he muscles into the naval hospital, where he has no legal right to put himself, not merely because he considers himself too good and precious to take a chance in the regular civilian hospital in Washington, as the taxpayers must, but because the service is practically free.

When he pulled that crack on Wendell Willkie about how Willkie made his money and about his residence on Fifth Avenue, I wanted to ask, and now I do ask, how Ickes first got into the chips and how he compares his own residence in the dude country north of Chicago, where he has lived much longer than Willkie has lived on Fifth Avenue, and his present country mansion outside Washington, with Willkie's Fifth Avenue apartment. Go ahead, Harold; give us a tell.

A long time ago my guy Harold got fresh. He said I had been a sports writer and that, after all, what could one expect? Do you know the answer to that? The answer is that he was a sports writer himself under the same boss in Chicago years ago, but such a punk that he never made the grade, whereas, anyway, I was a major leaguer for 15 years and quit of my own accord.

Yes, chums; I may be a bum, but I can lick Harold Ickes. And you can throw in that Charlie Michelson, too. There is another one I can lick. That kind were made for me.

War Before November

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARENCE J. BROWN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 22, 1940

ARTICLE BY WILLIAM RANDOLPH HEARST

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by William Randolph Hearst, which appeared in the Washington Times-Herald on August 21:

IN THE NEWS—WAR BEFORE NOVEMBER IS THIS WRITER'S FORECAST

How long do you think it will be before we get into the present war head over ears?

What is going to put us in?

What is to be our part when we do get in?

And what is to be the situation and condition of our people and our country during our participation and afterwards?

It is well to be thinking about these things, because our entrance into the war seems very near.

Many people think it will occur before the Presidential election in November.

Why?

Oh, because it would be very fortunate for Mr. Roosevelt if we should get in before that time, and Mr. Roosevelt is very fortunate.

Second, because the agreement with Canada is an indication that the administration thinks that war is close at hand.

Third, because administration insistence that American vessels sail through dangerously mined ocean zones in spite of warnings of unavoidable catastrophe is likely to provide an immediate critical occasion.

Fourth, because Mr. Roosevelt's Cabinet is being built for war.

Col. Frank Knox, a military figure of distinction, is very war-minded.

And Henry L. Stimson has always been, when a Republican office-holder, a strong advocate of intervention in European affairs and participation in the League of Nations.

Fifth, because war propaganda is being encouraged on every side.

Mr. Bullitt, Ambassador extremely extraordinary to almost everywhere, stands incongruously on the steps of Independence Hall, and at the instance of the Roosevelt administration inconsistently incites the American people to enter the disastrous European conflict.

Even the gentle first lady of the land sponsors an inflammatory anti-German picture made from the writings of Ernst Toller, who was in 1919 leader of the Communist revolution in Bavaria against the republican government of President Ebert.

James Roosevelt is being sued by the heirs of Toller for a financial interest in the film which was produced by an English company as war propaganda.

Sixth, because of the proposed disposal of some 50 of our older naval destroyers to England to be employed in the war.

And, seventh, because the especial kind of conscription which the administration advocates would seem unnecessary and undesirable unless expeditionary forces are contemplated.

Of course there are also many powerful influences other than the administration in favor of war.

There are social influences, financial influences, racial and religious influences.

Ours is a wonderful country—an amazing melting pot, the product of which is a democratic alloy valuable to our civilization and to all the world.

But many of the ingredients in the pot are not yet thoroughly fused.

Many for some generations will retain much of their original character and connections.

These elements have been deeply affected by the conditions prevailing in Europe and are eager to correct them—to democratize them according to American standards—not by example but by force of arms.

All of these political and personal causes make pretty certain our involvement in the war.

The defensive agreement with Canada is in itself a beneficial thing.

But it must necessarily mean that the United States will defend Canada more than Canada will defend the United States, unless the agreement includes the provision that the British Navy shall cooperate to defend the Western Hemisphere.

In which case we have entered into an alliance not only with Canada but with the British Empire.

Everybody knows that the South American republics will not be an advantage but an obligation to the United States in case of war—not an asset but a liability in matters of mutual defense—which would in no way be mutual.

No one can seriously suppose that Chile, Peru, Ecuador, Guatemala, Brazil, or even Mexico is going to supply tatterdemalion soldiers for the defense of the United States.

And they certainly are not going to supply ships, because they have not got any worthy of much consideration.

Everyone can see equally clearly that the reason the conscription bill does not confine the activities of the United States Army to the United States and its possessions is because the administration contemplates using the Army in other parts of the Western Hemisphere, if not in various parts of the Eastern Hemisphere.

In other words, the administration purposes to use this Army for world war without securing the specific consent of Congress or without consulting in any way the wishes of the American people.

The agreement with Canada is like the treaty of Habana, a purely personal Roosevelt agreement imposing upon the people of the United States the defense of the whole American Continent.

This obligation is immense and wholly unilateral unless, as has been said above, specific provision is made for the equal employment of the British Navy, in which case the treaty is with the British Empire.

Would it not be well to have these treaties formalized and constitutionally approved by the Senate of the United States, and to have their consequences in widespread warfare referred to the approval of the people of the United States?

As for propaganda, its effect is astounding.

It carries us away like the current of a great tide.

It causes us to forget all the lessons of our experience.

It transforms facts into fancies, and fancies into facts.

We are fortified against the propaganda of the warring nations.

We expect them to color their statements and to exaggerate their achievements.

But we are unprotected against the insidious and insistent propaganda of our own Government.

We naturally tend to rely on the good faith of our own representatives, and their attack upon our credulity with biased statements and prejudiced personal views reaches us under our guard.

Consequently a sentiment for war is gradually developing in this country as it did in the World War.

Soon therefore we may look for war.

How soon and how certain it is difficult to say, but if your columnist were inclined to venture an opinion he would say before November—and he is not wholly without practice as a prognosticator.

Loans to Latin America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 22, 1940

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday the House passed a bill to make possible $500,000,000 of loans to Latin America through the Export-Import Bank. In spite of the several hours spent in the debate, I do not believe that many of the most essential factors in this matter were made clear.

I voted for the bill for three reasons: First, because I believe it is very important from the standpoint of national defense to prevent the Latin American republics from being forced to become economically dependent upon a Europe which is already largely dominated by dictators; second, because anything we can do to increase the welfare of the Western Hemisphere republics and to assist in giving them better balanced economies is a good thing to do; and, third, because I want to make the United States as nearly self-sufficient as possible, and, by the same token, I want us to be able to obtain the few strategic and necessary materials and commodities which we really cannot produce as near home as possible.

I am hopeful that this move on the part of the American Government will result in putting the whole Western Hemisphere in a stronger bargaining position with regard to the sale of export products. Somewhere a market must, of course, be had for the commodities which are produced in such abundance in South America. Some of these, from the northern part and the Caribbean region, the United States needs, cannot produce, and is in a position to purchase. On the other hand it is, of course, ridiculous to expect that temperate South America will cease to trade with Europe and no one, I think, even desires to bring about such a situation. The best we can do—and all we should try to do—is to support the bargaining position of the South Americans, to enable them to trade on fair terms and not on European terms and thus to leave them both economically and politically independent.

This whole effort will, of course, be of no avail if the United States or its representatives or nationals do anything that smacks of imperialism or "dollar diplomacy" or of an attempt to induce a return to the gold standard on the part of any nation. It must be a sincere effort to help—not a move to dominate.

I earnestly hope that most of these loans will be made for such purposes as public improvements—roads, schools, improved communication systems, better transportation facilities, and similar things. These things will help to balance the Latin American nations' economies and make them less dependent on foreign trade. They will improve the lot of the common people. That should be a major aim.

Another legitimate objective is the development of such products as rubber, tin, nickel, tungsten, and manila fiber—essential things which cannot be produced in the United States and for some of which we are dependent on very far distant sources of supply in regions where there might be danger of war unless we are extremely level-headed.

I am not particularly interested in trying to increase foreign trade in commodities which our people desperately need themselves. This includes most of the things we produce. The answer to most of our so-called "surpluses" is an increased buying power on the part of American consumers. We can achieve this whenever we want to really try to do it. Foreign trade is important where nations exchange goods which one but not the other can effectively produce. In any case, loans won't increase exports. It is an economic contradiction of terms to say they will. For a loan implies interest payments from the debtor to the creditor and when these are made the creditor must in the long pull buy more from the debtor than he sells to him. For the same reason, the higher the interest rate the greater must be the excess of imports by the creditor over his exports to the debtor.

Our market should be here at home for all but a very few things which we produce in actual surplus over our possible needs. I hope that out of all this can come the possibility—remote though it may seem—of the Americas using their bargaining power derived from their possession of the only considerable supplies of food products in the world for the purpose of bringing about a just and decent peace. To try to deliberately starve whole populations is to make war almost inevitable. But that there can be conditions attached to the feeding of nations is clear and obvious and here is where we may have a real opportunity.

Finally, I regret very much that the occasion of the debate on this bill has been taken by some Members of the House to say some perfectly unnecessary and in some cases untrue things about the nations to the south of us. Some of these remarks have come with exceedingly poor grace from people who have themselves for whatever reasons criticized other American officials for outspoken attacks on European nations. Our aim must now be to build good will in the Western Hemisphere, and that good will rather than a counteracting imperialism must be our answer to attempted Nazi or any other kind of foreign penetration in the Western World.

EDITORIAL FROM THE SATURDAY EVENING POST OF AUGUST 24, 1940

Mr. SCHIFFLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask the privilege of inserting in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial appearing in the August 24, 1940, issue of the Saturday Evening Post, as follows:

THIS WAS FORETOLD

In Philadelphia, 153 years ago, the founders sat. Their task was to reconcile government with liberty. The great ends to be served were two. One was to protect the people against their rulers. The other was to protect the people against themselves—for was it not the lesson of history that people, being liable to passion, suggestible, dreading responsibility, tending by power of majority to oppress minorities, were wont to sacrifice or surrender their liberties?

"But there is a natural inclination in mankind to kingly government," said Benjamin Franklin to the Convention. "I am apprehensive, therefore, perhaps too apprehensive, that the Government of these States may in future times end in monarchy."

They understood what Franklin was saying. They knew what the problem was. The problem was how to limit the power of the Executive, who might be called magistrate or president; limit his access to the emotions of the people, lest he persuade them by promises and eloquence to make him monarch; and at the same time limit the power of the people to act directly upon their own Government, lest in fits of sudden feeling or aberration they should act unwisely upon it, to their sorrow. They solved the problem by creating that delicate political mechanism of checks and balances which was the American contribution to the art of government.

The popular principle was established in a House of Representatives, elected directly by the people.

The conservative principle was set up in a Senate, elected not directly by the people but by their several State legislatures.

How to elect the President was long and anxiously debated. If he were elected by the people directly it would be too easy for him to strike hands with Demos and override everything else. If he were elected by the Congress, as some preferred, an ambitious man would be tempted to corrupt the legislative principle and so again make himself monarch. It was decided at last that he should be elected not by the people directly but by electors chosen by the people. How long his term should be and whether or not he should be eligible for reelection, which would be dangerous, were questions of extreme difficulty. Finally, the term was made 4 years and the question of reeligibility was left open.

There was yet a judicial principle to be established. So there was ordained a Supreme Court, the members not to be elected at all, but to be appointed for life by the President, subject to the approval of the Senate.

Nowhere an absolute power. The President could veto a law passed by a majority of Congress; by a two-thirds vote the Congress could pass it over his veto. The Supreme Court could declare a law unconstitutional; the Congress could then amend the law and pass it again, or, if that did not avail, it could move to amend the Constitution; and the Constitution could be changed only by will of the people. Sovereignty at last was in the people, only that they were bound by the Constitution not to exercise it in an unreflecting or capricious manner.

And it was shrewdly provided that never should the sword and the purse be in the same hand. The President was commander in chief of the armed forces; but control of the purse was delivered to the House of Representatives—that is, to the popular principle—which was right, because so long as the people themselves kept the purse in their hands it was certain that they could never be taxed beyond their consent or made to pay for more government than they wanted.

This was not a democracy. The founders dreaded democracy almost as much as they feared despotism, believing, indeed, that one would tend to produce the other. What they had devised was a system of limited, representative, constitutional government. In the papers of Dr. James McHenry there is this quaint footnote of an incident that occurred after the founders had finished their work: "A lady asked Dr. Franklin, 'Well, Doctor, what have we got, a republic or a monarchy?' 'A republic,' replied the Doctor, 'if you can keep it.'"

We have not kept it. Step by step we have moved from being a republic toward becoming an unlimited democracy, until now the word "republic" has been almost expelled from our political speech.

What were the steps?

The first was universal suffrage, touching all matters whatever, local, regional, and national, whereas in the beginning the right to vote was qualified by State laws, generally requiring a modicum of property interest in the Commonwealth.

The second was that the business of electing the President was brought closer and closer to direct vote of the people, until now, in fact, it is direct; it has become a fiction that we choose electors to elect a President.

The third was the election of Senators by direct popular vote instead of by vote of the State legislatures. Thus the conservative principle was destroyed. There is no longer in the scheme of government a conservative principle as such.

Fourth was the graduated income tax. That kind of taxation was strictly forbidden by the Constitution, and the Constitution, therefore, had to be changed to permit it. The justice of the income tax, everyone to pay according to his ability, is not easily impugned. Exercised in a reasonable manner, under restraint of a conservative principle in government, it might well be the ideal tax. Nevetheless, it makes possible—one would say, inevitable—a vast extension of beneficent Government; secondly, it makes it possible for an administration seeking its own power to promise, and to effect, a redistribution of the national wealth in favor of the groups and classes that support it, and so corrupt the electorate. It was precisely for that reason that the Constitution originally forbade the Federal Government to lay taxes except in a uniform manner.

What followed in natural sequence was that inevitable extension of beneficent government, a very great rise in the power and prestige of the executive principle, and then bureau rule over the people by administrative law.

Such were the steps. They were taken slowly at first, with long and thoughtful debate; then faster and faster, sometimes without any debate at all, even without looking. And now, almost unawares, we arrive at the doctrine of indispensability—the doctrine of one leader above all, infallible, who knows better than anyone else what is good for people and how to do it. That idea had been heard before in the extravagance of campaign oratory; never before in this country has it been asserted by the leader himself.

The objections to a third term for President, we think, are not absolute. There is no law against it; only a tradition. If Washington had served a third term and refused a fourth, the tradition, we dare say, would lie against a fourth term and not against a third. But this new doctrine of indispensability, which might be only immoderately egoistic, becomes sinister in relation to a background of 7½ years during which there has taken place a centralization of power in the Federal Government and a subordination of that power to the will of the Executive such as hitherto had been thought impossible under the Constitution. The sovereignty of States has been systematically eroded by new legislation, by reinterpretation of old law, and by a kind of Federal bribery. The Congress, which is the legislative principle, has surrendered or delegated such powers to the President as formerly it had jealously defended. As the power of the President has been exalted, all other powers have been diminished to a point at which even the judicial principle has been annealed and made responsive to Executive will. Finally, control of the purse was surrendered when the Congress began to vote billions for the President to spend in his own discretion.

Briefly, during these 7½ years the Roosevelt administration went further to intervene in the economic and social life of the country, to control it, to plan it, and to administer it, than any other government in the world not already totalitarian in character.

As he was receiving into his hand from an obedient Congress the new instrumentalities of power, Mr. Roosevelt himself remarkably said: "In the hands of a people's government this power is wholesome and proper"; in bad hands, he added, it "would provide shackles for the liberties of people."

And now what is he saying?

He is saying that he alone is the people's government. He alone can be trusted to exercise that power. He is saying that he accepts the nomination for a third term because he is convinced of a duty to keep the Government from passing to other hands. The power is too much to lay down. It may be abused. It may be used to provide shackles for the liberties of people.

That is not all. If the power now changes hands the people may lose their liberties in a worse way. The President says that in what he has done to awaken the country to the menace of the aggressor he has been opposed by "appeaser 'fifth columnists.'" And: "If our own Government should pass to other hands next January—untried hands, inexperienced hands—we can merely hope and pray that they will not substitute appeasement and compromise with those who seek to destroy all democracies everywhere."

That is to say, if the Republican Party wins, the country may be betrayed.

For shame! The pity is that Mr. Roosevelt does not believe it as he says it.

A President of the United States who has arrived at this state of mind is no more a Democrat than he is a Republican or himself a "fifth columnist." There is among us no one word that defines him, nor ever before was the want of it felt. He is the one whom the founders feared and partly foretold—I, Roosevelt.

National Defense

OF MISSISSIPPI

PETITION OF ALBERT WILLIS AND OTHERS

Mr. McGEHEE. Mr. Speaker, the patriotic and liberty-loving citizenship of Walthall County, Miss., which is a part of my congressional district, have sent me a petition expressing their feeling and ideas as to the course of action that should be taken by the Congress in the proper preparing of our country to meet any emergency that we may be faced with in the future. I am so impressed with the spirit manifested, that I ask leave to extend my remarks and attach the petition as a part. The petition is signed by several hundred citizens and is as follows:

We, the undersigned citizens of Walthall County, Miss., mindful that the ideals embodied in our form of government are threatened with destruction by the mad ambitions of the totalitarian powers, firmly believe that the fundamentals of the American way of life may be preserved only by an adequate national defense, by the training and equipping of our fighting forces of land, sea, and air. We need fighting forces sufficient to repel the totalitarian forces of the world, even when combined with the "fifth columnists" of our own country.

The Congress has seen fit to take the first steps in this direction by the appropriation of billions of dollars for the construction of planes, tanks, guns, ships, and other implements of war. But we are convinced that these appropriations are not sufficient—that there must go hand in hand a program of intensive training of manpower to operate these implements of war. The sentiment of this section is overwhelming that some form of selective conscription is not only the best method of obtaining this manpower, but is also the most democratic. We, therefore, urge that the Members of the Congress divert their eyes from the coming elections, and focus them on the defense needs of the nations, enact some form of conscription at once. It is late already. We confess that we are unable to understand why such measures as national defense should be subjected to such prolonged debate when the fate of the Nation hangs in a balance. The American people have delegated to the Congress the high duty of providing for the national defense, and will hold them to a strict accountability should there ever come a day when it may be said of our efforts "Too little and too late."

We believe further, that our defense is so intricately bound up with that of Great Britain, that it is essential that we aid her in every way possible short of war, even to supplying surplus ships, as well as other necessities of war. We are convinced of this necessity in order to gain time to develop our own defenses.

We believe in our form of government and the ideals it represents, and as red-blooded 100-percent Americans insist that proper measures for its protection be taken in this hour of peril, and that they be taken now.

Loyalty of American Citizens of Foreign Birth

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EARL R. LEWIS
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 22, 1940

Mr. LEWIS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, the district which I have the honor to represent, the Eighteenth Congressional of Ohio, includes among its citizenship men and women who have been born in many foreign lands but who have of their own free will chosen the United States of America as the land in which to make their homes and rear their children and acquire citizenship. One of the most heartening and encouraging occurrences growing out of the present troubled state of our international relations is the voluntary expressions of loyalty and devotion to the land of their choice by many of these citizens of foreign birth.

There has recently come to my desk a most touching example of the loyalty and devotion to the land of their choice by many of these citizens of foreign birth. There has recently come to my desk a most touching example of the loyalty and devotion which citizens of Polish and Slavonic extraction have for this country. These citizens are banded together under the name of the United Political Clubs of Jefferson County, Ohio, with headquarters at Steubenville, Ohio, and their communication is as follows:

UNITED POLITICAL CLUBS OF JEFFERSON COUNTY,
August 5, 1940.

Hon. EARL LEWIS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. LEWIS: At a regular meeting on Sunday, August 4, 1940, the delegates to the United Political Clubs of Jefferson County, composed of citizens of Polish and Slavonic extraction, by a unanimous vote instructed us to respectfully urge you to vote and support the Burke-Wadsworth conscription bill.

We also take this opportunity to express our loyalty and our readiness to lay down our lives, if need be, for the country of our choice and adoption, the United States of America.

Respectfully yours,

VINCENT KENSICKI, President.
WALTER NIEMEC, Secretary.

Poll Taxed, He Can't Vote

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LEE E. GEYER
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 22, 1940

LETTER FROM A VIRGINIAN WHO IS FORCED TO WRITE TO A CALIFORNIA REPRENSENTATIVE BECAUSE HE HAS NO CONGRESSMAN OF HIS OWN FOR WHOM HE CAN VOTE

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include herein a letter from a Virginia citizen prevented from casting a ballot because of the poll-tax requirement. This letter is but one of the many of its kind received by me.

RICHMOND, VA., August 8, 1940.

Hon. LEE E. GEYER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: As I live in a State where there is a machine set up so far as politics go, I have heretofore never had much interest in voting, because the same men in office are always put back in office; or if not the same men, then some one they select.

Since the advent of Mr. Hitler, however, I am very much interested in our national politics and for the first time in 27 years enough interested to vote—but I find I can't vote. Why? I must first pay my poll taxes 3 years and this applies to my son also, who it happens was 21 in May of this year. I was required to have paid these taxes 6 months before the coming election and to have registered 4 months prior to said election.

I have no criminal record, have raised five well thought of children, own my home, work every day and spend my money in this State only, my people have been Virginians since 1733 and so far as I can find there were no "hoss thieves" among them. So you see why I am interested in your anti-poll-tax law.

Any 100-percent American citizen with reasonable proof of his mental qualifications should be allowed a voice in any election. There should be no tax imposed if he be otherwise qualified.

Here's wishing you speedy luck in getting your bill through.

Respectfully,

W. A. BROADWELL.

The Negro Is Wise to the New Deal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRED L. CRAWFORD
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 19, 1940

ARTICLE FROM THE COLUMBIA (S. C.) STATE

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, an illuminating article revealing that the Negro is wise to the New Deal in its dealing with him appeared a few days ago in the State, Columbia, S. C., daily newspaper, in the form of a reprint from the South Atlantic Monthly. The article was by Archibald Rutledge. I submit it under the unanimous consent granted me by the House:

[From the Columbia (S. C.) State of August 18, 1940]

AS THEY ARE SAYING TODAY—THE NEGRO AND THE NEW DEAL

(Archibald Rutledge in the South Atlantic Monthly)

Nothing more revolutionary in American politics has ever occurred than the defection of the Negro from the Republican Party—and, of course, his consequent alignment with the Democrats. Faithful, after his fashion, since 1863 to the party of Lincoln, the party of freedom, he has now completely deserted his old friends. His allegiance has vanished. Every principle, every sentiment, every higher consideration urged him to remain true to the party which had effected his manumission and had stood for his securing of citizenship. But suddenly all was forgotten. Almost, it might be said, hundreds of thousands of Union soldiers who died in battle are now affronted. The fealty, the obligations, the soul's loyalty—where are they now? What has caused this amazing defection? The answer is short. Money has accomplished the seemingly impossible. The great corrupter of mankind has here wrought his perfect work. Not reason brought about this sinister change; not some change in ideas, which might have rendered the change respectable; not some evolution in the Negro which might enable him to choose now for himself what masters he shall follow. We might as well deal in plain terms; arrant bribery has done what nothing else could possibly have accomplished. Bribery involves money in some form. Whose money is being used to make the Negro a complete political turncoat? The public funds; the taxpayers' money; your money and mine.

While I am not in a position to discuss this question in its broader and more general aspects, yet I do know what the New Deal is doing, not for the Negro, but to the Negro in my region of the rural South; and since the same influences appear to be at work everywhere, among whites as well as Negroes, I believe the condition I shall describe represents rather fairly the present plight of the colored man in America. His present situation is of great moment to me, not because it affects me directly, but because the Negro's welfare has always been close to my heart; and whenever I discover that he is being morally debased, I cannot keep quiet. For I take it that moral degredation is rottenness of the foundation; and we must not forget that the Negro, whether we will or not, is an integral part of the foundation of our Republic. In my opinion, he is a most vital part.

What, then, is the situation that gives me alarm, and in what way does it differ from the situation of a few years ago? The Negro of my country is a small farmer, or a fisherman (and a good Negro fisherman is the very best I know), a worker in the fields, the sawmills, and about farms and gardens. In these days a great number own their own homes; and many of these used to be pretty little places, nearly always gay, now with blossoming fruit trees, now with flowers, now with song and laughter. Negroes used to grow excellent money crops; they had gardens that helped to make them self-sustaining and independent. They raised cattle, hogs, chickens, and turkeys. There was, all over the rural South, a pleasant rustic life, now darkened by hardships, now brightened by better times. But people got along. They managed, as people will always manage if they have to. The Negro could always get work, and the employer could always get labor. It was a decent and natural and orderly system of life.

Now, what has happened? Almost to a man, every able-bodied Negro man and boy of my acquaintance is on relief. The countryside is empty of its laborers. The little farms and gardens, the fences and the fields, the chicken yards and hog lots, the crops that would sustain life through the winter even though things from stores could not be bought—these are gone. They have been suffered to be utterly neglected in order that the Negro laborers may make a little easy money. Whereas formerly it was always possible to buy chickens and turkeys, rice and potatoes, corn and peanuts from Negroes, they now have none for sale and none for themselves.

Not long ago I was talking with Steve Boykin, one of the Negroes on my place who has been on relief 4 years. He is 66 years old. He told me that, after this period of working for the Government, he is far worse off than he ever had been before. Lately he was laid off, as being overage, and was told that he was eligible for social security. He brought these official announcements to me; and I was obliged to tell him that I did not believe he would ever get any social security. That phantasm is America's will-o'-the-wisp. What is Steve now doing? He told me with appalling frankness that he had eaten nothing for 3 days, and that he would starve if I did not help him. He is now my firewood cutter, and an excellent one at that. Since I see him every day, he tells me a good deal of the inner workings of the W. P. A., of how much he had to pay to be transported to work, of the pressure brought to bear on him to trade at certain stores, of suggestions that he contribute to the Democratic campaign chest. After these deductions had been made from his wages, he had hardly enough to meet his ration account. He told me that certain storekeepers had W. P. A. workers' checks delivered directly to them to meet the laborers' past and current expenses.

It might be explained that Steve's expenses for matters domestic are, I admit, unusual, for he has an indeterminate number of children. To suggest how bewilderingly many there are, and also to hint of this Negro's total equanimity of character, this story is told. One day he was ambling up to his cabin when his wife rushed to the door, screaming and waving her apron.

"Steve, Steve," she cried, "a alligator done eat one of de chillun!"

"Mandy," Steve drawled, "ain't I done tole you week befo' las, something been gettin' de chillun?"

But this Negro's equanimity is shaken now. Strange to him are the ways of that secret and almighty force known as "de Gov'ment." He said to me not long ago, since everyone appeared to be on relief, "I think de Gov'ment is gwine to move down into dis country."

It has moved; and I lament the economic disaster that, because of the W. P. A., is sure to overtake the Negro. I lament much more the fatal undermining of his character. For he is losing his independence, and, with it, his self-respect. His plight is that of a temporary ward of Government. He is afraid to work for himself for fear that he will lose his job with the W. P. A. For the same reason he will not work for anyone else. And into his deep yet simple soul are creeping the shadows of futility and frustration. It is only fair to say that he is in worse slavery now than his race has ever known. Nor are futility and frustration the only feelings he has about this work; he is developing a subtlety that he may have had before but which he has never been free to exercise. Negroes are past masters at getting something for nothing. I once asked a plantation owner why he had persuaded the 20 Negro families who lived on his place to move off.

"Well," he said, "it's like this: If there is a Negro on my place, and I have a dollar, he will get it."

I know cases in which as many as six men and boys from one family are on relief. They do not hesitate to change their names in order to secure this alluring yet spurious benefit. I know one case in which a Negro mother pools the resources of her husband and four sons. They regard the Government as some easygoing Santa Claus, and they will take all they can get. They are human, just like the rest of us.

Nor is the Negro at all deceived by the foolish and futile character of most of the work on which he is employed. He knows very well that it is a mere set-up. If, therefore, he labors at all, he does so without interest or enthusiasm or hope. While I cannot say that all this work is in vain, yet I know that some of it is. In my part of the South, the ditching and road making are especially so; and I wish to mention several projects that have been begun in stupidity and have ended in folly. I know a tiny Negro village of about a dozen cabins. It has always been served by two roads, one a concrete highway. Someone conceived the happy idea of constructing a third road, parallel to the other two, and this road is laid through a deep swamp, and is 60 feet wide. There was an old winding sandy road through that country, and this was destroyed to make this new and almost superhighway. Well, one of the Negroes on the project told me that they never did much work unless they saw a car coming, and as only two people traveled that road, and one of them only once a week, the workers had a grand chance to do a lot of nothing. Nor is there the remotest possibility that more than two people will ever travel that road, the other two highways are much shorter and much better.

Casting about vaguely for something to do, certain eminent local politicians determined on draining an immense and gloomy swamp, far off from everywhere. It was a very good basin for water; and the water in it should have been left there. But, no; it must be drained. So huge canals were dug, and one of these was brought under Highway 17, the great road to Florida. Some 2 miles from the coast, the big ditch came to a man's property who did not want a canal through his place. The work stopped right there; and now, since the canal has no outlet, it floods the pleasant countryside with surplus water that was doing no harm where it originally was.

The trouble about a lot of this work is it is done with costly elaborateness; roads are much wider than necessary through the back country; the ditches and drainage canals are too big, and their tops and sides are manicured with needless meticulousness. You may rightly ask if all this is not well done. In a sense, it is; and for a few weeks, these roads and ditches look impressive. But everything of this kind demands upkeep; and the more extensive the operation, the greater the cost of maintenance. The old one-track sandy roads, quiet and winding and beautiful, that used to amble through the back country were entirely sufficient for their purposes. They were always passable; and the traffic was so occasional that their upkeep was negligible. But on some of these new W. P. A. roads, a man now drives at his peril and the peril of his car. Where once we had good roads 12 and 15 feet wide, we now have 60-foot morasses. On more than one occasion I have had to get a car to pull mine out of one of these New Deal triumphs in road making.

In his quiet infectious way, the Negro makes all kinds of fun about this project work; he labors on the schemes, but he has no faith in them. Referring to one stretch of road through a swamp, a road that was loud with frogs rejoicing in a sea of mud, a Negro said to me that he hoped the Government would give him permission to plant rice in that fetid morass. Another Negro, referring to the monstrous size of a ditch that had been dug to drain the fields of a politician of some local standing, said that it looked as if either the Government or the owner of the property was building another Inland Waterway. Nor are the Negroes insensible to the fact that much of this project work is done upon lands of those who have political influence. I never knew of a day's public labor to be spent on a Negro's property, or on the lands of a man of such acute political insignificance as myself. Nor do I believe this condition to be incident merely to my own locality; it is certain to be true wherever human nature is tempted by a vast and foolish outpouring of the Government's funds. When released at its source (and its true source is every man's pocket), these funds may be clean and humanitarian; but by the time they reach the back country and the political lords and rulers there, and their able henchmen, this money becomes an agent of corruption of public morals, manners, and character.

Here is a story of my own experience with trying to help the Negro, and of my rebuff at the hands of the W. P. A. I have some 20 Negro families on my place; and just next to where they live I have a fine tract of about 80 acres of land. It used to be the main planted field on the plantation, but is now partly grown to yellow pine timber. Thinking not of the Negro's today but of his tomorrow, I offered to give this land to the Negroes to plant if the W. P. A. (employing all these same Negroes, and hauling some of them 15 miles away every day to puddle futilely in the mud) would help to clear and condition the land. I stood to lose by the venture, for I would lose all my young longleaf pines. I did not want to plant the land. I did not, for my own sake, want it cleared. But I was thinking of enabling the Negroes to earn a living on the land. It was to be theirs for nothing.

To my appeal, the Government replied that it would never consider doing a thing like that; it was out of the question. I suspect that those who read my appeal could not make the grade—could not see tomorrow. For it is coming, that tomorrow when all this futile work, eating up the public moneys, must end. And I then want to see the Negro as I know him in something like a position of rustic security. Senator ELLISON SMITH is reported to have said that in the rural South a man can live on 50 cents a day. Whether or not he said it, it is true of the Negro. A Negro can live on nothing a day if he has made his crops.

One day I was talking to young George Myers, whose venerable father Gabe has been one of my Negro friends for these 50 years, I asked George what he was doing this winter.

"Nothin'," he said lightly.

"Well, who is taking care of you?"

"Pa is."

"What is he doing?"

"Nothin'."

It has long seemed to me that the Negro has what may be accounted a certain dim infallible genius in his ability to get along without money. I know Negroes who rarely ever have had as much real cash as $10 a year. But they managed. They were ingenious. They grew crops and raised livestock, on which they lived; and sometimes they exchanged their labor for commodities and for clothes. But now this easy money from the Government (it is really from the politicians) lures them away from their independence, hardy and admirable, until we are getting a race with us, always a problem, and now an acute one of total dependence. I have been noticing that W. P. A. workers drive cars for the first time in their lives; they have radios; and they consume whole oceans of raw liquor. The money they make does them no good, for they utterly neglect their homes and the good earth about them. And whereas, even in the height of the first depression, Negroes got along somehow without Government help, now, if they were suddenly cut off, they would be perfectly helpless. They are being schooled to be helpless except in the ability to lap up the pap that is spoon-fed to them. Nor do I blame them; to a vicious system is to be attributed their present physical and moral decay.

The New Deal has affected the Negro in ways other than by compelling him to neglect his legitimate work: It often beggars him completely. For example, I have a friend who is a typical large cotton planter. He has for a generation grown about a thousand acres of cotton each season. He had on his ample place 15 Negro families. Along comes the A. A. A. and tells him that he may plant only 600 acres. Why is this done? Why, solely to put up the price of cotton; to make it a scarcity, so that the great army of consumers must suffer; and, primarily, of course, to corral the farm vote. But what happens to the laborers who have to be turned off when work on the farm is cut down? Literally, they face starvation. My friend had to let six of his Negro families go out into the wide, wide world. He had no work for them to do. The Government had told him that he must not plant what he had once planted; hence he must not employ so many people as he once did. In a very real sense, the Government has forced these contented and happy and self-supporting people to be either tramps or to try to get jobs with the W. P. A. It does not appear to be exactly reasonable, in times when jobs are at a premium, to make it impossible for some people to keep the work they have had all their lives, and to force them on the public pay roll. And, mark you, this cotton planter who was compelled to turn these families off his place will be paid out of the Treasury for not doing what he really wanted to do. He gets a bonus, and his former helpers, unskilled in any labor but in that in which they have long been trained, get the bum's rush, and then, perhaps, some stultifying Government stipend. If there is any reason in all this, it is a purely political one; and a purely political reason is almost sure to be rotten.

We often hear that private industry should absorb the unemployed. Too often private industry is considered merely to mean the great corporations. It really means any firm or any individual who offers employment. Yet, as things now are, men on relief (and this, I know, is especially true of Negroes) are afraid to do any kind of work for fear that their easy money will be taken away. I know, here in my rural community, scores of such cases. Over the country there must be hundreds of thousands. For that reason it is a difficult thing for employers to get the labor that they need. Men now receiving Government aid of some kind feel that they are pensioned; and if they do any work, their velvet money will be cut off. Such a way of living cannot fail to have its moral effect on the people as a whole; it is a tricky sort of existence, unworthy of our manly traditions.

It is the history of the world that civilizations and countries rise, flourish, and then, in many cases, vanish. Usually, they pass out of existence because of conquest, but some decay from internal causes. It should be the prime duty of government, charged as it is with the safety of a country, to combat with all its power every cause which may tend to undermine the morale of its people. To the impartial observer it would appear that our Government, however professedly good may be its intentions, is contributing to our ruin by piling up debt and by taking from a vast army of our citizens all ambition, all initiative, all self-reliance, and almost all self-respect. One race in our Nation peculiarly affected is the Negro. Whatever may be said for or against this system, it is gone forever. The Negro, after 75 years of freedom, was beginning to make headway for himself. He was becoming commendably self-sustaining. He was learning that the only way for a real man to stand is on his own feet. Then came the New Deal; then came relief. The Negro was just getting away from that sort of thing when his Government, coming apparently to his rescue, really has come into his simple, humble, rustic life to fill him with bogus dreams of perpetual support, to turn him from honest industry into the paths of dishonest, makeshift, spurious toil. Not long ago I was stopped on a highway by a man with a red flag. * * * Before I had passed the crowd, I had counted eight men with red flags. I asked the foreman why the bank was being moved.

"To get it on the other side," he said, grinning. "But it would be better over here where it is."

In a very deep sense the Negro feels that he is in collusion with his white bosses to beat the Government. The Negro is smart. He is hard to fool; and he realizes that he is living in a fantastic time. Besides, he reasons, the white man is supposed to be his superior; and if his boss is a grafter, why shouldn't he be? Practically every Negro I know is trying to raid the United States Treasury; he would not put it that way, but he is going after what everyone else seems to be getting. Only this week a Negro woman came to me to try to get on "de roll." She said she had nine children and no means of support. I found out just in time that she had never been married. But unless I am gravely mistaken, public funds are now being paid out to a lot of Negroes just like her.

I do not find it in my heart to blame the Negro. He does not reason. He accepts. And if the Government offers to support him, he immediately accepts support. But I hate to see a race that I love walking on crutches. I remember times harder by far than we are having now; but they were happier and they augured better for our future. They were normal in that people met hardship and privation with courage and caution and steadfast labor. Now, everybody who will accept cuddling and coddling can get it for nothing; but the price is slow but fatal degeneration of our morale.

A short time ago a lieutenant commander in the Navy, in commenting on this very thing, said to me gravely that both Army and Navy men felt that if we should have a war now, the Government has so pampered its people that the fiber, the sinew, the mettle could not be found. It is a startling reflection, and a great truth is there.

Of the effect of Government aid to Negroes, I am positive; for I have watched that effort for years. It has been distinctly harmful; in a sense, it is dangerous. I cannot speak with the same assurance of its effect on members of other races. But the character of the Negro is fast losing, under this pernicious system, many of its finest virtues. And it is because I admire him for those virtues that I hate to see him made the victim of political ambition sponsoring impractical experiments.

The Spirit of '76

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. A. WILLIS ROBERTSON

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 22, 1940

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, some years ago a disabled World War veteran from New York came to the mountains of Highland County, Va., to regain his health. He fell in love with our Virginia mountains and with the people of the community in which he was sojourning and decided to make Monterey, in Highland County, his permanent home.

For several years he has published a column in the local paper, the Highland Recorder, under the nom de plume of Erasimus Bluegrass, and from that column of last week I quote the following:

The curse of every country and time has been its slackers, its profiteers, and its opportunists. Like the poor, they have been with us always, and their presence is no sign of degeneration. What should chiefly concern us is how we ourselves really think. What are our ideals? What kind of a world must we confront with them? Are we willing to tighten our belts, thrust aside the slacker, the profiteer, and the opportunist, and face it unafraid and open-eyed?

If this is our intent, there is nothing degenerate about us. The world we have to confront has declared itself in no uncertain language. It is a world which has thrown democratic ideals into the discard and is intent on carving up the peoples of the earth to suit its own ends. Germany claims Europe. Italy claims Africa. Japan claims Asia. These three have elected to control the commerce and the raw-material areas of the world and to do it by sheer force of arms. England alone is in the way, and she is fighting a last-stand battle with her back to the wall. There is no question about the kind of world we confront.

With what kind of ideals do we confront it? There we find ourselves confused. To what is our own internal economy to be geared; private interests or national needs? If private interests, can we depend upon them to work for the conservation of national ends? Should the Government keep its hand from the private individual as well as the private corporation? Should the Army be manned by volunteers or by drafted citizens? If it is to be volunteers, can we depend on the citizen to serve voluntarily? To both questions past experience answers "No."

If we resign our accustomed liberties to our Government, will we ever recover them? That depends on ourselves. Do we doubt our own will to remain a democracy? If not, we need fear no dictator from within. He who would lose his life or pledge his personal liberties to the end that democracy be restored to the world, will certainly find them again. He who insists on keeping them, in the face of the present turn in history, will certainly lose them. Is Germany right or do the ideals of 1776 and 1917 still live?

Outside the window the valley is steeped in the peace of an August afternoon. The mountain foliage is touched with that faint tinge of rust which suggests an early autumn. Our eye is caught by a strange commotion in Ed's favorite apple tree and out tumbles Jimmy Wagner in a shower of yellow fruit. Two little girls are trudging up the Parkersburg Pike. From somewhere comes the sound of a hammer.

But somewhere in England a thatch-roofed village is being awakened from just such a peaceful lethargy by a zoom of wings which are harbingers of destruction. Its century of plodding, self-respecting quiet is rent by the bomb of a ranging strafer and the shattered body of a white-capped grandmother lies beside her splintered churn. Peace, gentle reader? Only if the detonation of that bomb has no power to start a reverberation in your own heart.

What matters is neither Republican nor Democrat nor yet preparedness. The only thing that matters is what we Americans really mean. What is it we are preparing for? The protection of our hides or our liberties? Our liberties within the limits of the 48 States, or our liberties in a world of free peoples? If this last is our meaning, let us, in God's name, forget both our bellies and our pocketbooks, forget our prejudices and our fears, and merge our individual lives into the collective task which lies ahead.

Opportunity and Responsibility

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE H. BENDER
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 22, 1940

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, the American people do not require a lengthy argument to prove the difficulties of 1940. Everywhere about us on the national and international horizon we see problems of staggering complexity. Here at home the people of our country, after 8 years of unprecedented spending, find themselves battling desperately against a spirit of hopelessness and helplessness in virtually every area of national life. Our economy has gone backward in the last decade. Living standards have sunk below the level of 1930. Vision of our destiny as a continuous upward movement has been obscured by governmental policies.

These are not idle charges. Our great army of unemployed, the staggering burden of relief expenditures, the development of an attitude of indifference and shiftlessness are all too visible. It is a sorry picture of the greatest nation on the face of the earth.

Abroad we see nothing but menace. From the ashes of stricken Poland, Norway, Belgium, Holland, Czechoslovakia, Finland, and France there rises the uncertain specter of a new kind of world order based upon force and haunted by starvation. Grim reality tells us that we must prepare for events which we have never anticipated in the history of our country.

In the midst of this scene of European devastation and American unrest there has risen, as there always rises in the midst of great crises, a vigorous challenge of a better day. The Republican Party, recognizing the seemingly insurmountable obstacles in the path of national recovery, has sounded a note of defiance, accepting the challenge, dedicating itself to the rehabilitation of the American way.

We too are realists. But our realism tells us that the inexhaustible reservoir of strength which made this country the greatest democracy in the history of the world lies within the minds and bodies of our 130,000,000 men, women, and children. We refuse to despair. We tell the world this Nation has not run its course. The greatest achievements of science, the greatest conquests of men's minds are yet to be recorded. Come what may, the people of this country are determined to pursue the goal which our forefathers so clearly delineated in the Declaration of Independence. Life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness are more than abstract terms to the Republican Party. They are the difference between civilization and barbarism.

We believe that men of good will can restore opportunities, can rebuild incentives, can reinvigorate the minds and souls of the American people. So long as there remain slums to be cleared, lands to be tilled, mouths to be fed, bodies to be clothed, the frontiers are still open.

The Republican Party has given the Nation a man ready to lead in this battle for the American way. He is a man who comes from the heart of America, who in himself reflects the story of our people. Born in humble surroundings, working with his hands, working with his mind, Wendell Willkie, a small-town boy, has demonstrated in his own life the epic which is America. He rose to success because this Nation was dedicated to the belief that all men are equal, not equal in physical strength, not equal in mentality, but equal in the opportunities which this Nation offers its children.

Wendell Willkie challenges those who urge that this Nation is permanently divided into the haves and the have nots. He rejects the concept of economic royalists ruling over an army of slaves. To the people of this country he sounds the reminder that from shirt sleeves to shirt sleeves takes but three generations.

This is the kind of America which our country has always been. It is the kind of America which the Republican Party believes it can continue to be.

Nineteen hundred and forty is a year of opportunity and responsibility. It is a grave task to which the Republican Party is summoning the people of America. No one can minimize the gravity of the situation without convicting himself of demagogery. We need a man at the head of our affairs who can weld this Nation once more into an organic unit, a man who is big enough and strong enough to extend the hand of welcome to every group, rich and poor, white man and black, Christian and non-Christian, in the struggle to keep America free. We need a man at our head who can build from the economic machinery which we have created in the last 150 years, a tremendous force, dynamic, expanding, so strong that it can never be attacked.

Wendell Willkie is that man. He has no enemies. He has no hatreds. He has ability, foresight, and industry. The Republican Party in this great moment of national peril is ready to seize the opportunity and to acquit itself with distinction and honor.

Timely Observations by Major General Rivers, Retired, United States Army

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 22, 1940

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I submit the following observations by Maj. Gen. William C. Rivers, United States Army, retired. General Rivers served the unusual period of 10 consecutive years with the Philippine government at Manila and is a student of Philippine affairs. General Rivers' observations are as follows:

PRESIDENT QUEZON COMING TO WASHINGTON
(Notes by Maj. Gen. William C. Rivers, retired)

President Manuel Quezon's arrival in the United States shortly may render the following brief comments of interest to some of the gentlemen of Congress. A New York Times Manila interview with Mr. Quezon stated that the President of the Commonwealth might try to get a new concession from Congress in the existing act for independence in 1946—a concession which would give increased powers of autonomy to the present government at Manila.

THE NEW CIVIC LEAGUE, MOSTLY SUGAR MEN OF MANILA, OPPOSES INDEPENDENCE; THE CIVIC LEAGUE WORKS FOR A REVISION OF THE INDEPENDENCE ACT

This revision would be a new law saying the United States intends to hold the Philippines permanently as a dominion—the McNutt plan. John Gunther, who visited Manila, states, on page 300 of his book, Inside Asia, his opinion that it is the sugar interests of the Philippines which are working for our permanent retention of the islands. Such retention—the McNutt plan—would make also permanent the responsibility of the people of the United States to defend the Philippines, although the American people had surrendered to the Filipinos all authority to govern the islands.

THE UNITED STATES TO DEFEND THE DUTCH EAST INDIES?

We get now the discussions about the United States defending the Dutch East Indies, 1,500 miles out beyond the Philippines, which lie 7,000 miles from San Francisco. If we are unable to defend the Philippines, with Japan lying on the direct route and squarely between our west coast and Manila, we can hardly take on the defense of the Dutch East Indies. Our policy has been to defend from the mid-Atlantic westward to the mid-Pacific—almost one-half the circumference of the earth. Add to this our responsibility in the South American regions under the Monroe Doctrine and it is seen that we already have a fair-sized job on hand.

Now a word on the latest grand war scare: About 50 percent of the rubber used in the United States, and about the same percentage of our tin, come originally from Netherland East Indies. We buy the tin from people—in Europe mostly—who have smelters for refining tin. The rubber comes from agents who have imported it from those Dutch Islands. But we can readily send, or the purchasing agents can readily send out to Java by way of the Atlantic Ocean.

TWO PROFESSIONAL JUDGMENTS OF EXPERTS

Admiral Leahy, the Chief of Operations of the Navy, made last year to the Naval Committees of Congress the most exhaustive analysis of the general strategy of the North Pacific Ocean we have had in the 40 years of our control of the Philippines.

Among the measured and official judgments of the admiral were the following: "The defensive line of the American Navy at the present time reaches from the Aleutian Islands to the Hawaiian Islands, to Samoa and to the Panama Canal." Also, "The Navy which America now has and the Navy which it will have when it is increased by the authority in this bill will be seriously inadequate to the task of sending a naval force to the Philippines. I said it would require at least three times this amount of increase of our Navy, and I doubt if we could (send a naval force to the Philippines) with three times the increase."

Gen. Douglas MacArthur, field marshal of the Filipino Army at Manila, wisely stated not long ago, "It has been assumed, in my opinion erroneously, that Japan covets these islands. Strategically, possession of these islands would introduce an element of weakness in the Japanese Empire. It would split that Empire into two parts, separated by a broad stretch of almost 2,000 miles of ocean. And between the two parts of Japan would lie its present military enemy, China."

The weight of the responsibility which some would place on the people and the taxpayers of the United States can be seen by studying the statements made about March 13, 1939, before the Tydings Senate insular committee by the Washington representative of the powerful sugar interests of the Philippines. The Washington counsel for the Philippines' sugar interests in his pleading stressed heavily a part of his pleas which is very emotional and which is, in my judgment, dangerous for the people of the United States. This was set forth in declarations such as the following: "The Philippines is a Christian country; we have a moral responsibility to defend the Phillippine republic—after it is granted complete freedom and has been duly inaugurated." Again, "The people of the United States have a strong, general, and continuing responsibility to defend the independent Philippine state."

Christianity was in the Philippines half a century previous to the landing of the Pilgrims at Plymouth Rock. Of course, the people of the United States have no shadow of moral responsibility to send out to the Philippines—at the beck and call of the president of the Philippines—tens of thousands (hundreds of thousands) of American soldiers and sailors to fight an overseas war 7,000 miles away. It would be a war we cannot win, at that distance—a war that would simply crush the Filipinos between the two great fighting nations.

We have discharged our moral responsibility to the Filipino people—and on the whole well and nobly discharged that responsibility. I hope the Filipinos will obtain the independence they justly merit and for which they gallantly fought Spain and the United States for 5 years. We have always promised the Filipinos independence. We will naturally grant them trade privileges for a period of time following independence.

Two misleading statements are frequently seen in our press. They may be inserted in the press by those who are working to revoke the act for independence. One assertion is that in reality the Filipinos do not desire independence. I worked with the Philippine Government 10 consecutive years, residing with my family in many parts of the archipelago. The Filipinos of all classes earnestly desire independence. Another statement which goes the rounds of the press is that the Japanese have already overrun the islands. Japanese have always been free to enter the Philippines and to do business there. Their number was at one time as high as 20,178. But some 5,000 Japanese have gone home since the Chinese war. The population of the Philippines is fully 15,000,000.

Japan will not divide her armies and fleet in the effort to annex the Philippines. In any event, Japan is bound to obtain much of the trade in the islands. Japan is so near and the goods the Japanese make for the Filipinos are very inexpensive. It would be dangerous for Japan to divide her own forces in the face of the great Russian forces near Japan at the north.

I spent 10 continuous years of my working days in the service of the Filipinos. Soon after arriving in the Philippines as one of the first group of officers selected for Elihu Root's new Army General Staff I accepted duty under the Philippine civil authorities—with the constabulary, of which I was later the chief. I had to work in and reside in all parts of the archipelago. My work was in cooperation with the Filipino officials—the Governors, the judges, and sundry other Filipino officials. I was therefore a witness to the energy and capacity of most of the Filipino officials and to the progress throughout the islands. My first residence, with my family, was about 75 miles south of Manila—in the home town of President Manuel Quezon, who was a young lawyer in practice there.

I have affection and admiration for the Filipino people. They will do well as a small nation, if Congress grants them trade privileges for a few years. We should make a new treaty of trade and friendship with Japan. The new treaty should contain clauses showing Japan's interest in the continued independence of the Republic of the Philippines after 1946. Of course, Japan would not approve of any other country taking control of the Philippines after the United States leaves the islands. Filipino taxes pay all government and educational expenses, including such things as new roads and other improvements. But the Federal Treasury at Washington has paid out fully $2,000,000,000 in the Philippines in 40 years—a great burden on American taxpayers. This was for additional naval ships at Manila and the Army in the islands, the offices and residences of the United States High Commissioner at Manila, putting down the 1899 revolt against the occupation of the United States, and so on. Our trade with the Philippines has been a disappointment. Our great trade with Japan is more than our trade with the Philippines and China combined. Few Americans realize that our Japanese trade comes next to that with Britain and Canada—our great customers. Japan is third. The favorable balance on our trade with Japan compensates for the unfavorable balances on our trade with 20 nations to the south of the United States and for the unfavorable balances on our trade with the Philippines and with China. Our Japanese trade is much more than our trade with the Philippines and China combined.

F. H. A. Administrator Stewart McDonald

OF

HON. THOMAS C. HENNINGS, JR.

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 22, 1940

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. Speaker, the Federal Housing Administration is almost unique among Federal agencies now in existence, in that its operation and organization has been virtually free from criticism. The splendid record and achievements of the Federal Housing Administration has been due, in no little part, to the indefatigable industry and ability of high order and character of Stewart McDonald.

Mr. McDonald, before coming to Government service, was for many years president of the Moon Motor Car Co. of St. Louis, Mo. Industrialists throughout the Nation, and particularly in the automotive industry, have long recognized Mr. McDonald as an executive who, based upon his own record and accomplishments, is deserving of a place among the top-flight industrial leaders of the United States.

Stewart McDonald was called to the Government service in the capacity of an Executive Assistant to the Administrator on November 1, 1934. He became Assistant Administrator on January 1, 1935, and following the resignation of Mr. James Moffatt, was appointed by the President as Administrator of Federal Housing on September 5, 1935, his appointment being conferred January 28, 1936.

It is particularly fitting that upon the sixth anniversary of the Federal Housing Administration, that full tribute should be given Stewart McDonald for the service he has and is rendering to his country at personal sacrifice and with the highest degree of vitality and trust imposed upon him by the Nation. Mr. McDonald has set an example which we in Congress hope will be adopted in increasing numbers by other industrialists and businessmen, in that in a time of national emergency he has subordinated his own splendid career in private industry to perform a useful and vital service to his country.

The Federal Housing Administration observed its sixth anniversary in June with nearly $3,500,000,000 of home and property improvement financing insurance written during its operations.

This insurance includes $2,295,000,000 in premium-paying mortgages on small homes, $120,000,000 in premium-paying mortgages on large-scale projects, and $1,075,000,000 in property improvement and modernization loans.

The F. H. A.'s home mortgage insurance operations have proceeded at record levels this spring, and in May and June ran a third or better ahead of last year in applications involving new homes and in new homes started under F. H. A. inspection.

New-home applications exceeded 20,000 in number and $100,000,000 in amount during April and May, and estimates for June indicate similar figures. May was also the most active month ever recorded under the F. H. A. program for homes started under its inspection.

It is estimated that at the present time every other small home under way in the United States is being constructed under F. H. A. inspection and financed with an F. H. A. insured mortgage.

In 1939 approximately 465,000 non-farm-dwelling units were built, the largest number since 1929. This compares with 55,000 units built in 1933 and again in 1934, the 2 years before operations of the F. H. A.'s mortgage insurance system.

During 1939 approximately 325,000 new one-family homes were financed privately, an even larger number than in 1929. The activity in construction of small homes last year and now undoubtedly results in large measure from the F. H. A.'s mortgage-insurance system.

Along with this increase in volume, the quality of home construction has also improved markedly in the past few years as result of the F. H. A.'s influence. The requirements and standards of the F. H. A. as to property, location, and construction are being observed on more and more homes.

Furthermore, a steadily growing proportion of home-financing transactions are being subjected to the F. H. A.'s risk-rating procedure, the only truly national and truly scientific method of analyzing mortgage risk. This risk-rating system has resulted in sounder transactions for both borrowers and lenders; it has kept many citizens from plunging into debt over their heads, and it has produced a far superior type of mortgage investment for lending institutions.

Altogether, approximately 12,000,000 people are enjoying improved housing standards and conditions under the F. H. A. program, a number equivalent to the combined population of 18 States. These families have bought, financed, or modernized homes under the F. H. A. program.

Since its inception the F. H. A. has been influential in bringing far-reaching changes to the residential field, to the benefit of home owners, lending institutions, and the building industry. It has caused a general reduction in interest rates on mortgage loans and has popularized the long-term amortized mortgage in place of the system of short-term first, second, and third mortgages previously characteristic of mortgage financing. The F. H. A. program has also resulted in a large degree of uniformity throughout the country in the terms and conditions of residential mortgages, as contrasted with the wide variety of practices that existed previously.

The Federal Housing Administration does not lend money and does not build homes. It is an insurance agency which protects banks, building and loan associations, life-insurance companies, mortgage companies, and other qualified lending institutions against loss on loans made to individuals or companies for the construction or purchase of residential structures or the repair and improvement of homes and other types of buildings.

Through the mechanism of its loan insurance, the F. H. A. is able to exert an important influence on the entire building, financing, and real-estate structure. In addition to modernizing the form of home-mortgage financing, the F. H. A. has raised the standards of home construction, design, durability, and neighborhood location. The result has been better housing for hundreds of thousands of American families, better neighborhood planning for American communities, and better investment opportunities for American lending institutions.

The F. H. A. program has also operated to make the advantages of modern home ownership available to a constantly broadening proportion of the American population. With the F. H. A. plan of mortgage insurance having removed the barriers which previously were held to exist against the sale of satisfactory new homes to families of modest incomes, a steady trend has developed toward lower-priced homes, with no sacrifice of standards of construction, design, and neighborhood location. Builders and manufacturers of building materials have cooperated in developing new methods for reducing the cost of home construction.

The culmination of these joint efforts has been the development of the low-cost home suitable for purchase by large numbers of families with incomes of $1,500 a year or less who previously have been unable to afford home ownership.

Since the founding of the F. H. A. in 1934, 600,000 families have been able to build or finance homes under the F. H. A. plan. More than 60 percent of these homes have been new, and 75 percent of the record-breaking number of mortgages being accepted for insurance by the F. H. A. this year are homes to be built under its inspection. In addition, 2,575,000 home, farm, and business-property owners have improved and repaired their properties through F. H. A.-insured modernization loans. Almost 12,500 lending institutions are approved to operate under the F. H. A. plan, and a large proportion of the home financing of the country is insured by the F. H. A.

But figures tell only part of the story of the F. H. A. Through the F. H. A., the Federal Government for the first time in history has established an unbiased agency to which the average family, seeking to avoid the pitfalls and dangers of home buying, may turn for a measure of protection never before available, and nowhere else now available in the same degree.

Home buyers generally have obtained better-planned, better-built, and better-financed homes than ever before, and certain major abuses of the 1920's have become the exception rather than the rule.

Continued progress is being achieved in making the F. H. A.'s underwriting, appraisal, architectural, land planning, and technical services valuable to the public. The F. H. A. is cooperating actively with various agencies and with municipal bodies in promoting quality of construction. The F. H. A.'s influence on architecture and land planning is evident on all sides.

Progress under the F. H. A. has been accomplished at little cost to the Government. Charges against the F. H. A.'s insurance reserves remain extremely small. During the next fiscal year beginning July 1, 1940, it is estimated the F. H. A.'s income, derived chiefly from mortgage insurance premiums and appraisal fees, will exceed its operating expenses, and substantial amounts will be added to reserves.

Final Declaration of Twenty-seventh National Foreign Trade Convention

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. MURRAY

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 22 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

STATEMENT ON FOREIGN TRADE

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a very valuable statement dealing with foreign trade. It is entitled, "Final Declaration of the Twenty-Seventh National Foreign Trade Convention," held in San Francisco, Calif., July 29, 30, and 31, 1940.

This declaration constitutes a review of the convention of the National Foreign Trade Council on important matters affecting our foreign trade, and is of general public interest.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FINAL DECLARATION OF THE TWENTY-SEVENTH NATIONAL FOREIGN TRADE CONVENTION

For the advancement of civilization, it is clear that the products of the world must be exchanged among nations according to their relative natural advantages, abilities, and needs. Business and industry, upon which the people depend for essential production and employment, cannot continue to thrive if the stimulating effect of private initiative and enterprise by which they have been built up, is unduly hampered, rather than promoted, by avoidable governmental intervention. Foreign commerce particularly is an occupation in which success depends upon exceptional individual ability, specialized experience and the readiness to incur unavoidable risks.

Adverse laws and trade practices, taxation, and transportation difficulties, foreign credit, currency, and exchange uncertainties, and other factors, call for close private and governmental study and for prompt remedial action, but the far-reaching effects throughout the world of the war situation in Europe and Asia render impossible, at this time, any conclusions which might serve as a permanent guide for the United States in the formulation of fixed commercial policies.

In many cases it may not be possible, before peace is restored, to solve the problems which confront us, in a manner entirely consistent with our present foreign-trade policies based on the unconditional most-favored-nation principle.

Governmental steps should be taken, in the meantime, to maintain export outlets for our products and to increase essential and desirable imports. Other countries that buy our products are dependent upon their exports for most of their foreign exchange and for part of their national income. The satisfaction of these interdependent requirements is of paramount importance.

NATIONAL DEFENSE

The convention commends the efforts the Government is making to further the ends of national defense, and urges the National Foreign Trade Council to respond in full measure to any demands within the scope of its activities which the National Defense Commission may make upon it for assistance in the accomplishment of these ends.

The convention holds that an adequate defense effort requires the concurrent achievement of national strength and security through maximum productiveness in all areas of industry, commerce and agriculture, to which end, in turn, the maintenance of a liberal flow of foreign trade is of vital importance.

RECIPROCAL-TRADE AGREEMENTS

The convention continues to give its full support to the unconditional most-favored-nation principle of the reciprocal trade agreements program. As soon as possible this country and the entire world should return to this principle of foreign-trade policy and practice. Subject to restrictions essential to our national-defense requirements, we desire to trade with all the world on mutually acceptable bases, with freedom from obstructive and discriminatory regulations.

THE NEUTRALITY ACT

The convention urges upon the Congress the modification or repeal of those provisions of the Neutrality Act which constitute unnecessary restraints on American trade, shipping, and finance.

THE JOHNSON ACT

We recommend the prompt repeal of this act.

INTER-AMERICAN TRADE

While the necessity of maintaining all avenues of world-wide trade is recognized, emphasis should be placed at this time on inter-American political and economic cooperation.

Latin American countries should become an increasingly important source not only for strategic and essential raw materials, but also for certain manufactured goods and foodstuffs. The convention recommends that both private and Government funds be sought to increase Latin American production for profitable marketing in the United States and other countries, thereby providing dollar exchange to pay for our exports and the return of earnings on American investments.

The convention recommends that the Government, in cooperation with the governments of Latin America, provide adequate financial assistance in support of their efforts to overcome exchange difficulties due to decline of their normal trade with European countries. As a transitional policy, pending the restoration of a more satisfactory basis for private investment and increased trade, we approve of the lending of United States Government funds for the development of natural resources, stimulation of exports, or for marketing of surpluses.

Loans should be made only for sound and constructive purposes, including the purchase of American materials, and should not be used, directly or indirectly, by governments or nationals of the borrowing countries, to compete with American private capital in those countries. Such loans should be administered and supervised by private firms having expert and experienced personnel for the successful conduct of such enterprises.

PAN-AMERICAN HIGHWAY

The convention records its strong endorsement of the efforts the American Government has made in furtherance of the development and construction of the pan-American highway, and urges the continuance and extension of these efforts in collaboration with the governments of other nations, as a practical expression of the good-neighbor policy, and to the end of fostering the close commercial, social, and cultural ties existing between the United States and Latin America.

THE PHILIPPINES

The convention recommends that the report of the Joint Preparatory Committee on Philippine Affairs be further considered and that appropriate steps be taken by Congress to prevent the damage and disruption to Philippine-American trade relations that would result from the consummation of political independence, scheduled to take effect in 1946, and to grant a longer period of time in which to permit of business making the necessary and natural adjustments.

The convention urges further amendment of the Tydings-McDuffie Act, with the concurrence of the Philippine Legislature, establishing adequate reciprocal-trade advantages for such indefinite period as may permit of the continuance of American-Philippine trade.

THE FAR EAST

The convention commends the manner in which our Government has handled, and is handling, the problems which have arisen in the relations of the United States with countries and regions of the Far East.

The convention believes in the good-neighbor policy, a policy which calls for reciprocal fair treatment. It believes that the businessmen of the United States and of countries of the Far East would welcome, under such conditions, the conclusion of new agreements wherein each country would undertake to respect the rights and interests of the others concerned and to accord broad most-favored-nation treatment toward enlarging trade and preserving the traditional peace throughout the Pacific region.

THE MONETARY POLICY OF THE UNITED STATES

We reaffirm our confidence in the gold standard. We have consistently advocated a return to stabilized currencies at a fixed ratio expressed in gold as one of the necessary requisites for the furtherance of world trade. We continue to subscribe to this doctrine. Stabilization of currencies on a world-wide basis requires, however, a restoration of peaceful relations between nations and the reestablishment of confidence between governments and private enterprises. While we realize that, until peace again is restored, the reestablishment of definitely fixed currencies by the various nations must remain in abeyance, we feel it essential, however, to reaffirm our faith in the fundamentals of co-related and freely exchangeable currencies, being strongly of the opinion that the lessons of the past few years have demonstrated the futility of endeavoring to carry on world commerce permanently through barter and controlled economies. The continuation of restricted commerce means strangulation for all.

We recognize that a great proportion of the gold now in the United States is here principally for refuge and security, and that as soon as world peace again prevails it shall return to its owners in various countries abroad, thus forming the first step in the reallocation of our present gold hoard and settlement of international balances in gold. When world conditions make this step possible, we should be willing to entertain important gold lending operations in order to assist other nations to rehabilitate themselves and to reestablish their monetary systems based on gold. In the meantime, we strongly recommend the resumption of gold payments, and that no further changes be made by our Government in its gold purchasing price. We recommend the repeal of the Thomas amendment and of the Silver Purchase Act of 1934. We feel it essential that all measures be taken that will tend toward the continuation of confidence in the American dollar and hold forth hope to a harassed world that we stand ready to assume our obligation, as a creditor nation, to cooperate with them in the reestablishment of sound monetary policies throughout the world.

FORESTRY

We urge continued recognition of the position of forest products as basic exportable commodities, and the fostering of world trade in these products as part of the forestry policy of the United States.

EXPORT TRADE ACT (WEBB-POMERENE ACT)

The United States Government should encourage and assist associations of exporters operating under the Export Trade Act. In the face of more effective and widespread foreign buying cartels, the policy expressed in this helpful legislation should be clarified and strengthened. It is recommended that the administration of the act be transferred to the Department of Commerce.

EXPORT-IMPORT BANK

With the understanding that our Government shall not enter into competition with private capital, the convention recommends the removal of the present limitation of $20,000,000 additional accommodation to any country, and favors an increase in the aggregate credit capacity available to the Export-Import Bank by $500,000,000. We further recommend that the functions of the bank be extended to provide to our foreign traders government guaranties of credits and exchange risks on bases equal to those available to foreign competitors.

INTERNATIONAL DOUBLE TAXATION

It is essential that the provisions to insure protection against international double taxation, adopted by the Congress in 1918, be freed from encroachments and indirect limitations. Reciprocal tax treaties and agreements should be concluded with additional countries, particularly in Latin America, along the lines of those already negotiated for the prevention of extraterritorial and discriminatory, as well as double, taxation.

The convention urges the tax committee of the National Foreign Trade Council to continue its effective work in meeting international tax problems.

PROTECTION OF DIRECT FOREIGN INVESTMENTS

There can be no approach to normal world economic order without a revival of confidence based on the integrity of governments.

General agreement on measures which will encourage and protect investments of foreign capital is essential to a healthy resumption of world trade. The United States has always maintained as a principle of equity and international law that property may not be expropriated without adequate concurrent compensation. Recognition and acceptance of such a doctrine is essential as a basic tenet of international cooperation. It is recommended that our Government seek to embody this doctrine, together with other provisions for the encouragement and protection of American foreign investments, in treaties with other nations.

CUSTOMS ADMINISTRATIVE REGULATIONS

The convention urges the need of further legislation in the direction of improved customs administrative laws, in order that these may conform more adequately to the practical requirements of merchants in time of war, as well as in peace. Pending congressional action to this end, the Treasury Department should take steps to assure that the appraisal and classification of imported merchandise may be made with certainty and dispatch. Greater responsibility for the administration of customs laws should be placed upon local customs officials.

CABLES

The State Department, having secured modification of drastic wartime regulations of some countries, to permit of the use of certain widely recognized business codes, is requested to continue these efforts and, further, to seek permission from foreign governments for the wartime use of cable addresses and code signatures, the elimination of unnecessary delays of censorship, the keeping or reopening of circuits to important business centers throughout the world, and protection of the interests of American communications companies and users. It is also recommended that our Government policy provide for continued operations of American private companies in the international communications field.

WAR-RISK INSURANCE

The convention approves the recent enactment by Congress of the law providing governmental underwriting of marine and war-risk insurance in times of emergency, when private facilities prove inadequate and reasonable rates are not available. We urge an amendment providing that Government facilities cover American goods when carried on foreign vessels based upon—

(1) Experience in the World War of 1914–18;

(2) The necessity for preventing discriminatory rates on American cargoes by foreign ships;

(3) The fact that 65 percent of our exports and 69 percent of our imports are carried in foreign-flag vessels; and

(4) The necessity for eliminating causes for possible retaliations by foreign governments against American private insurance underwriters.

We urge that the United States Maritime Commission afford adequate protection of the interests of private underwriters, and that the administration of the law, as in the former World War, be in the hands of practical and experienced men.

DRAWBACKS AND REFUNDS

As experience has shown that, under a fixed appropriation for drawbacks and refunds, delays in payments generally occur at the end of each fiscal year, due to insufficient funds and delay in congressional authorization of deficiency appropriation to meet accumulated claims, the convention recommends that legislation be enacted to restore the practice effective prior to 1933, whereby the Treasury Department was authorized to pay all approved drawback and refund claims out of general funds, thereby insuring prompt payment.

We recommend that the provisions of the Sugar Act, and regulations issued thereunder for refund on account of exportation, be amended to conform more closely with provisions for such similar refunds authorized in the Tariff Act and regulations issued thereunder; that provision also be made for claims in the name of the manufacturer or shipper of the product; that the time limit for filing such claims be extended to 2 years; and that "substitution" be authorized for tax as well as for duty refund purposes.

SHIPPING

We commend the Government for its active interest in behalf of American ships and shippers. Having regard to our trade needs, we urge its continued support of the construction of new vessels for important American trade routes under private ownership and operation, with the view of assuring sufficient bottoms to carry American cargoes and as auxiliaries for naval reserves.

INTERNATIONAL AIR TRANSPORT

The efficient maintenance of scheduled international air-transport services on the part of American companies during this critical period of unsettled world conditions has amply demonstrated the vital importance of these services to the Nation's commerce and industry.

The convention reiterates its recommendation for the Government's full and continued support of this important aid to foreign trade and its further extension, to the end that the utmost possible benefits of these services be made available for the needs of our foreign commerce, our Postal Service, and our national defense.

TRADE TERMS

The convention commends the National Foreign Trade Council for its 20 years' activities toward standardization of trade terms, through its publication and distribution of American Foreign Trade Definitions. It is recognized that an even greater degree of uniformity and understanding is desirable in regard to c. i. f. quotations, in order to eliminate misunderstandings arising. Consular fees, interest, inspection fees, and other charges at port of departure, should be standardized more widely as obligations of the buyer.

FOREIGN TRADE ZONES

The convention notes the progress made in the successful operation of the New York foreign trade zone, and approves the establishment of foreign trade zones at other major ports as soon as practicable. The convention opposes any legislation to amend the law governing foreign trade zones which may have the effect of restricting the operations of such zones.

IMPORT-TRADE OPPORTUNITIES

The convention commends the efforts being made by the Government to develop new sources of supply in foreign countries for products suitable for import into the United States. This is of importance to American importers under present conditions, when increased activity in the practical aid thus given to merchants is desirable.

FOREIGN-TRADE EDUCATION

Wars in Europe and the Orient have disrupted former trade channels and given rise to trade practices, in forms so adverse to American commercial enterprise as to render more necessary than ever the work of the education committee of the National Foreign Trade Council. It is urged, accordingly, that attention be given by educational institutions and civic forums to that phase of the work which aims at informing the public of the fundamentals involved and of their influence on our domestic well-being and security, as distinguished from those of a purely academic nature, as required in our schools and colleges. Foreign trade begins at home. It is essential, therefore, that the average citizen understand all that this implies.

EDITORIAL FROM THE NEW BERLIN (N. Y.) GAZETTE

Mr. EDWIN A. HALL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the New Berlin (N. Y.) Gazette for August 15, 1940.

[From the New Berlin (N. Y.) Gazette of August 15, 1940]

WHO'S GOING TO SACRIFICE WHAT?

The American people, driven by the need for military security, must build a Military Establishment costly beyond all precedents. An incredible proportion of the national income must be taken from the pockets of the people and diverted to government. All of us will have fewer luxuries. All of us must conserve. All of us must sacrifice.

That is clear enough and reasonable enough. But it has become tragically plain that a very substantial portion of the American people have the idea that the other fellow should make most, if not all, of the sacrifices. It's the other fellow's standard of living which should suffer, not their own. It's the other fellow who should pay the bill and do the work, while they go on much as they did before.

Certain influential segments of labor, for instance, demand still higher pay, shorter hours, excessive extra pay for overtime, and other special privileges and prerogatives for the workmen, despite the fact that pay is now the highest and the workweek the shortest in history. Their argument is that industry must sacrifice more of its profits in the interests of labor, while the worker grows fat on the national emergency.

Those who have gone on Government relief as a career favor sacrifice, too—so long as it doesn't touch relief appropriations. The Government, under the guise of "relief," still pays out millions for leaf raking, boondoggling, and other completely nonproductive activities. Powerful influences demand that not one nickel of this waste be eliminated, no matter how much others sacrifice to pay it, or how dire the menace the country faces.

The professional politicians talk of sacrifice, in noble words. But it is a rare politician who is willing to sacrifice one thin dime of patronage that might cost a vote, to support a principle. The self-seeking hand of politics handicaps a real defense program which would get maximum results with a minimum of waste of time and money.

Who is going to sacrifice what? That is the question that America faces today, if national security is to be a reality, not a mirage. The answer is plain. All must sacrifice; all must contribute their full share. The other fellow isn't going to do it for us. Selfish interests now at play in America, whether they be in labor, industry, or government, are the real "fifth columnists" within our gates.

Consolidated Fiscal Returns for Corporations Seen Needed

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

HON. JOHN W. BOEHNE, JR.

ARTICLE BY MERRYLE STANLEY RUKEYSER

Mr. BOEHNE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Merryle Stanley Rukeyser, which was published in the Washington Post of August 16:

[From the Washington Post of August 16, 1940]

CONSOLIDATED FISCAL RETURNS FOR CORPORATIONS SEEN NEEDED

(By Merryle Stanley Rukeyser, economic commentator)

It is extraordinary that Congress should be considering a stiffer excess-profits tax without permitting corporate taxpayers the privilege of making consolidated returns. In the circumstances, it is not surprising that spokesmen for organized business, appearing before the joint congressional committee should have emphasized the desirability of this change.

The answer of Senators HARRISON and KING that if the question of consolidated returns was gone into, too much time would be consumed, with corresponding delay to the tax program recommended by the administration and the Defense Commission, seems inadequate.

As a matter of fact, this country has had long fiscal experience with the consolidated return, and only abandoned it for regular taxation a few years ago during the New Deal.

Under the principle of the consolidated return, the whole corporate family is treated as a unit for tax purposes. Thus intercorporate transactions are thoroughly eliminated.

Moreover, if one organ in the corporate family is highly profitable but another loses an equal amount, one is offset against the other.

The consolidated return enables the corporate taxpayer to apply to the tax payments the same accounting principles which record for business purposes the operation of a group of enterprises.

If the consolidated return is a sound principle for ordinary taxes, it is indispensable for excess-profits taxes.

Because profits are not excessive unless the over-all profit result for the entire corporate group is excessive. This can be measured through a consolidated return.

At present, it is difficult to translate the emotion behind excess profits tax legislation into sound fiscal measures.

This time the sentiment has taken form in the slogan that no millionaires shall result from the American quickened preparedness program.

As a means of accomplishing this objective, the administration proposes through excess-profits legislation to indulge in what is tantamount to price fixing on the profit side.

But it is one-sided price fixing such as was done in the Esch-Cummins Transportation Act of 1920, which limited maximum railroad profits without guaranteeing minimum profits.

What is commonly called profit is more accurately a business cost—growing out of a payment for the use of tools or other corporate assets. The excess-profits formula is designed to limit the rate of payments on tools which can be made during wartime or national emergency.

The intention is noble enough, but practical difficulties are confronted in working it out, if the rate is dependent on results during a previous test period. There always arises the question of whether the test period works out fairly for a particular enterprise. On the other hand, if invested capital is the criterion, this principle works against good management which buys tools wisely and economically, and which makes a good return on them through efficiency of operation.

On the general formula of depreciation and amortization of emergency war plants, there has already been a meeting of the minds between the administration and industrialists, and in the circumstances it is desirable to get congressional action in order to remove the psychological bottleneck on defense plans which comes from lack of clarifying legislation on this vital subject.

America's Economic Front

OF

HON. JAMES E. MURRAY

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 23 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ADDRESS BY JAMES A. FARRELL

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, Mr. James A. Farrell, former president of the United States Steel Corporation, is a distinguished authority on matters pertaining to foreign trade. On the occasion of the annual convention of the National Foreign Trade Council, held at San Francisco, July 29–31, Mr. Farrell delivered a very able address dealing with the present status of our foreign trade, as well as the many complicated problems of international trade relations in a world geared to the demands of military economies.

This address should have the careful study of everyone interested in international affairs. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Today, more than ever in the past, the necessity for clear thinking is impressed upon the minds of American businessmen by a situation confronting them abroad which had no parallel in the previous war and post-war periods. Superimposed on the disrupted world economy that ended so disastrously in 1929, we have had 6 years in which international trade was increasingly geared to the demands of military economies, in nations which we now know were preparing to risk all on a throw of the dice, in a mad attempt to subjugate the world to their ambitious lust for power.

The past decade presents the spectacle of a world torn by economic rivalries, with mounting momentum leading inevitably to the present war, to the preparation for which the totalitarian nations had mobilized their manpower and all their available resources and energies.

When war was declared, following the overthrow of Austria, Czechoslovakia, and Poland, it was apparent to Americans that their front lines in European markets had been broken and that nothing was left but to guard with greater vigilance our lines of communication with other markets.

At the present time, estimated on a basis of the combined 1939 trade with Europe and the British Empire, a total volume of America's normal export and import trade, valued approximately at $2,500,000,000 is subject to the severe restrictions of an economic war, and to those imposed by our neutrality legislation. For all practical purposes much of this trade, other than military necessities, may be written off our national ledger as an assured source of national income, until a military decision is reached and peace terms indicate what prospects remain for resumption of our peacetime trade with these nations.

Whatever the outcome of the military struggle, it is likely that efforts will be made at its close to establish an economic bloc in Europe. With Europe under a dictatorship, we would have to match the power of a European economic union with the combined power of this Western Hemisphere in bargaining our way through to a reciprocal commercial understanding.

The uncertainty of our trade relations with the Orient, due to the Sino-Japanese War and the trade effects of the Philippine Independence Act, if carried through in its present form, calls for serious consideration of the direction in which we should look for a strengthening of our bargaining power with a European economic bloc comprising our former leading markets.

In these circumstances, with Canada remaining in close cooperation with pan-America, the balance of economic power in bargaining with a European bloc would be greatly strengthened by a trade agreement between the United States and all British Empire countries.

Australia, which is represented at this convention by her Minister, the Right Honorable Richard G. Casey, who will address the Pacific trade session, has strongly advocated an agreement of this kind, as a logical approach to satisfactory trade relations between Empire countries themselves. It is no less essential to the economic security of the Western Hemisphere that future trade relations with British Empire countries, which were greatly improved by agreements with Canada and the United Kingdom, should establish an orderly and mutually profitable marketing system which would eliminate injurious competition. Pan-America and the British Empire combined would establish an economic front to the rest of the world, with bargaining power adequate to secure equality of treatment and fair dealing in international commerce.

The situation in the Pacific does not tend to improve our trade relations in that area. It is not in professions of friendship but in deeds that we look for a change in this situation. Much has been said recently of the right of Europe and the Orient to proclaim the Monroe Doctrine for those areas. Our Government has raised no objection to such a plan, but it has challenged, and rightly so, the intention of either a totalitarian Europe or a totalitarian Orient to adopt a Monroe Doctrine similar to that accepted by the 21 American republics. On the contrary, all the evidence points conclusively to the fact that there is no analogy whatever between the Monroe Doctrine of pan-America, and that which totalitarian governments in Europe and the Orient propose to proclaim.

An interpretation of our century-old Monroe Doctrine, of which the Americas approve, was given in unmistakable terms by the Secretary of State, Mr. Cordell Hull, at the Lima Conference. This bears no resemblance whatever to the aims and purposes of governments in Europe and the Orient.

President Monroe was thinking primarily in terms of security for the United States. He was making no claim to a protectorate over the other Americas, no pretensions to hegemony. Recognition of the sovereign independence of the 21 republics, nonintervention in their internal affairs, close cooperation by means of consultation on all questions of general concern to pan-America; these are the basic ties of the democracies on American soil which are united in defense of their economic and political freedom.

The delegates to these annual conventions have a profound respect and admiration for the Secretary of State, who, at Lima, while disclaiming any idea of economic or political advantage for the United States, urged that conference to be on guard against the ominous shadow cast by the totalitarian axis over the whole Western Hemisphere.

The policy of the United States is one of trading with the rest of the world, but on terms of equality. The problem that confronts the commercial world is not one of an impasse between its businessmen in reaching an understanding and agreement on matters of trade. Were world economic affairs directed by its businessmen, there would be little difficulty in establishing a system of international cooperation, based on consultation, by which a new world order in commercial relations would prove of lasting advantage to all countries.

The futility of international economic conferences, dominated by Government representatives who give lip service to resolutions which they have no intention of implementing, focuses attention on the seat of the disorder from which the business world suffers. Whether we look to the Orient or to Europe, we find the paralyzing hand of a totalitarian government in control of all industry and trade. It would be to the advantage of the Orient and Europe to have normal trade relations with the United States. We would welcome trade agreements to this end. The National Foreign Trade Council and the Japan Economic Federation have laid the foundations for such an understanding on trade relations, by an exchange of missions before the outbreak of the Sino-Japanese War. The friendships then established between the respective business communities may yet survive this era of military domination, provided peace in the Orient is founded on the principles of our Monroe Doctrine.

Expansion of trade within the pan-American area has engaged particular attention at the present time. While not encroaching on those who will speak at the session devoted to the Americas, I may repeat here what I said in 1928, that there is a mutuality of benefit in this exchange of commerce between the United States and the sister republics that fulfills the real intentions of businessmen in the United States toward our southern neighbors. The mistaken belief is frequently held that the previous war was the cause of the considerable growth in our trade with Latin America. His Excellency Senor Don Carlos G. Davila, Ambassador at that time from Chile to the United States, pointed out, in a pamphlet published by the National Foreign Trade Council, that the expansion of our trade was a logical advance, not a war growth. While the war gave a tremendous impulse to our trade with Latin America, it will be found that the maximum figures for the war peak, 1918, were $10,000,000 less than the figures for 1927.

American businessmen are keenly interested in the proposals of the Government for more scientific regulation of inter-American trade, but, as this will doubtless be discussed at the Americas session, I only wish here to emphasize the importance of avoidance of expectations of compensatory trade which can only be realized over a period of years of intense development of Latin American resources. In any consideration of future large loans are investments for the purpose of stimulating our trade with Latin America, we should place no reliance on the generally accepted theory that trade increase invariably follows loans. While our loans to 16 principal Latin American countries in the period 1925–29 amounted approximately to $970,000,000, the increase in our exports in that period amounted only to $166,000,000.

It is not my purpose to infringe upon the subjects allotted to other speakers. It has been my privilege since the inception of these annual conventions to be asked to give a keynote to the proceedings by a survey of our overseas trade. The situation today is one in which the outlook is obscured by an impenetrable fog. It is a situation, moreover, in which the past no longer serves as a safe guide to our course in the future. Our policies during the war will be dictated by our necessities; expediency, not fixed rules, will govern our action in meeting every emergency.

We meet in this convention to deal with broad issues that divide the world into separate camps. Of transcendent importance is a united front on the fundamentals of our peacetime relations with the rest of the world. No previous convention has been charged with greater responsibility in examining and deciding upon the course we intend to pursue as a nation, both during and after the war.

Great care has been exercised in the preparation of the convention program and in the selection of speakers, befitting the abnormal situation that confronts us in world affairs. In selecting the theme of the convention, America's Economic Front, which is the subject of my address, it was felt that the attention of the convention could be concentrated on no more important issue than that of seeking to find our legitimate place in a new world order that foreshadows so many difficulties for those upon whom the task falls of building its foundations.

It is evident that the new world order conceived by totalitarian nations, will be one in which their external trade will be under strict government control. Our future trade relations with Europe may be similar to that with Soviet Russia. It is not too soon to give serious study to this totalitarian economic revolution, to its effects upon our future trade, and to the discovery of the ways and means by which American individual enterprise, reinforced by effective organization of the Government's foreign commercial services, may continue to find outlets for the surplus products of the soil and of manufacturing industries.

In these times of doubt and uncertainty as to the kind of world in which coming generations are expected to live, there should be no defeatist attitude to any proposals which aim at the subversion of our democratic institutions, under which are guaranteed the right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. We are too conscious of the greatness of our Nation, of its vast potential resources, to fear what the future may bring or to doubt our own determination and ability as a Nation to preserve the American way of life.

OF

HON. GUY M. GILLETTE

OF IOWA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 23 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ARTICLE BY ERNEST K. LINDLEY

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, if time is of the essence of national defense, personally I see no justification for sit-down strikes in industry.

I, of course, shall not take the time to go into the controversy which has been discussed in the public press relative to Government contracts; but I am much interested in the postponement of contemplated antitrust suits in the oil industry, which have been postponed at the request of the Council of National Defense after the Department of Justice, for a year and a half, has carefully prepared a suit ready to file, on the plea that such action would interfere with the cooperation of the large oil companies in our defense program.

We are considering a bill which does not take into consideration the individual and his contribution to national defense. I see no reason whatever for making the patriotism of any company and its contribution to national defense contingent on a money proposition, and I am sure the oil companies would not want to have that deduction drawn in the public mind.

Mr. Ernest K. Lindley, a columnist, has published a very interesting article pertaining to this matter. I ask unanimous consent to have it inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NECESSARY SACRIFICES—IS BUSINESS TO BE PAMPERED?

(By Ernest K. Lindley)

One reason why conscription for military service is encountering an uphill struggle is the feeling that business is not being called upon for corresponding sacrifices. There are multiplying signs that the national policy with regard to business enterprise in its relation to national defense is to become one of extreme solicitude, bordering on pampering.

On one side it is proposed to compel men to bear arms. At least, they will have to take a year of military training. At most, they will be called upon to sacrifice their lives.

On the other side, it is not proposed to apply in any way the principle of compulsion to the industrial mechanism which must provide the weapons for these men, or to any other sector of the American economic system. Instead, to some who are dubious about the conscription of manpower, the official approach to business enterprise seems to be a compound of cajolery and bounties.

The two chief exhibits of the present approach to business are (1) taxation and (2) the efforts to throttle certain suits under the antitrust laws.

The tax question falls into two parts, depreciation and the taxation of profits. It is generally conceded that if private capital is to be induced to invest in new buildings and new tools for the manufacture of munitions, it must be given reasonable assurance of recovering the investment within the period that the orders for munitions probably will occur. Accordingly, the Defense Commission obtained an agreement among all Government agencies that companies making these special investments useful only for military purposes should be allowed to write them off in 5 years. This means that they can deduct 20 percent for depreciation each year for 5 years as an item of cost in calculating the profit on which they may be taxed. The understanding is that if orders for military defense purposes do not continue over a 5-year period, these companies can come back and obtain a further readjustment of taxes in their favor.

Until this arrangement is set up by law through Congress, the defense program on the manufacturing side is held up.

This liberal allowance for depreciation supposes, however, that the industries receiving it will make very small profits. Since industries, understandably, do not want to shoulder the risk of loss through failure of Government orders to continue long enough to justify the new investment, they are not entitled to a counterbalancing reward for taking the risk.

When it comes to taxing profits, however, the policy seems to be "go easy." In the view of several influential Members of Congress, the Government tax policy with regard to national defense is, for business, a "heads-I-win, tails-you-lose" proposition.

The Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice has pending several suits involving industries of importance to the national defense. But it is feeling the pressure to "lay off," lest it make the industries involved noncooperate with the defense program.

It already has run into difficulty in its suit against a number of the large oil companies. This was to have been filed almost 3 weeks ago. It was not regarded with open hostility by the oil companies, because it was a civil suit. It covered various questions which had been raised already in criminal suits and which would be raised eventually in additional suits, if this over-all civil suit were not carried through.

The filing of the suit, however, was deferred on representations from the Defense Commission that it might impair the psychological attitude of the oil company officials toward the national-defense program. Thurman Arnold, Assistant Attorney General in charge of antitrust work, has taken the reasonable position that he will not prosecute any practice, otherwise in contravention of the antitrust laws, which is essential to the national defense. But he balks at being asked to discontinue a suit, otherwise justified, on the ground that it might instill in the leaders of a particular industry a noncooperative psychology.

When the Defense Commission has completed its study of the specific hearing of the case on national defense, it may agree with Mr. Arnold. It may have to pass similarly on four or five other impending suits.

It seems clear enough that if a specific business practice, otherwise illegal, is valuable for national-defense purposes, it should be openly sanctioned during the period of the emergency.

But the contrast between the wary solicitude for the psychological attitude of business and the approach to the problem of obtaining men to bear arms is griping some of the administration's sturdiest supporters in Congress. It may lead shortly to a real political explosion.

Description of New York State

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. MEAD

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 23 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY EDWIN C. HILL

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a very interesting and illuminating description of the beauties and marvels of the great Empire State, recently broadcast by Edwin C. Hill, renowned radio commentator and world-famed reporter.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Good evening, everyone, only 80 days remain to see the greatest show on earth—one that this generation at least, will never see again—the New York World's Fair, so brilliantly conceived and organized by Grover Whalen, so efficiently and graciously conducted by Harvey Gibson. Of the countless things which appeal to the heart and head over there on Flushing Meadows, there is nothing, it seems to me, more stirring to the spirit than the foreign buildings still proudly flying the flags of their nations, still gallantly carrying on even though their homelands lie crushed under the heavy boots of the invader. And a thrill may flutter your heart as you are reminded that it is under the protection of the Stars and Stripes that this gallant gesture is made possible. Only 80 days remain to enjoy the beauty and fascination of the greatest of all world's fairs, for on October 27 the flags come down and the lights go out. Of the many thousands who will visit the New York World's Fair between now and the 27th of October, very many, one supposes, will want to see more of the State of New York—the Empire State. It ranks first in population, 13,000,000, although only twenty-ninth in area. It lies mainly in the lake region of North America. The eastern part of Lake Ontario and one-half of Lake Champlain are controlled by the State. Of the waterfalls, Niagara, of course, furnishes the most magnificent spectacle, but there are others noted for beauty—the falls of the Genesee, Trenton Falls, the Kaaterskill Falls in the Catskills, and the falls of the Cohoes, of Ticonderoga and of Watkins Glen.

All this, with magnificent woodlands and State parks, makes for scenic beauty that calls insistently to the motorist these summer days, and will continue to call, not only through the gorgeous autumn, when the woods fly their banners of scarlet and gold, but through the winter months when all the northland is mantled in snow and winter sports come merrily into their own. If we were motoring in leisurely fashion through New York State, with ample time to see it all, and see it as we chose, we might start up in the northwest corner at the breath-taking falls of Niagara. And we would remember that this was once the land of the fierce-hearted Senecas of the Six Nations—the great Iroquois Confederacy of the Senecas, the Mohawks, the Oneidas, the Onondagas, the Cayugas, and the Tuscaroras, whose names live still in rivers and lakes and valleys and in towns and cities and counties. And we might roll pleasantly southward along the shore of Lake Erie to Chautauqua, famous, the world over, for its lecture courses. And then to Lake Ontario, gently caressing a favored land, and so through a historic region to the Thousand Islands and the broad St. Lawrence River. We might perhaps find time to enjoy the natural beauties of the great northern counties of Jefferson, St. Lawrence, Franklin, and Clinton along with the lovely and storied Lake Champlain. And so down to the Adirondacks and famous Saratoga with its healing waters and its beautiful race course. Perhaps a vision might come to us of the old days of Saratoga's greatest fame—the days before the War between the States; the days of perfumed curls and hoopskirts.

We might even in imagination see General Washington and General Schuyler pacing their horses through the woods where they beat "Johnny" Burgoyne and his redcoats so soundly, and hear Schuyler say to the great man: "General, there are some wonderful springs off in the woods here. I would be most happy to show you them." And we might even see the gentleman from Virginia descend from his charger and sip the waters. From Saratoga we might motor on to the Finger Lakes, extending southward exactly like the fingers of a human hand. And then to the storied Indian country—to Johnstown and the mansion of the great Sir William Johnson, Johnson Hall—that doughty old Sir William who was His Majesty's superintendent of Indian affairs for North America. We might pause at Johnson Hall to recall how old Sir William, ill in body and troubled in spirit, foresaw the break between the American Colonies and the mother country and how his heart was torn almost in twain between the pull of his loyalty to the King and the tug of love for the new and wonderful land. This was the land of Sir John Johnson, Sir William's cold-hearted son, and of Walter Butler, the infamous renegade. It was the country of the powerful Six Nations. A land of great beauty; a storied land; a land of romance and great achievement and stark tragedy, too. And we come presently to the southern tier—those counties marching in orderly fashion along the Pennsylvania border, and so east again to the Catskills and the most beautiful river in all the world, the Hudson. In these weeks, the sun and the season fill the Hudson River Valley with a soft gold light.

The mist comes up slowly in the morning from the valley floor, drenching the leaves that are yellowing fast this year after a dry summer. Down from the Adirondacks over the Catskills and the Taconics, the brightening band of fall foliage begins to push toward the great city where the river ends. From the harbor of New York the ocean freighters steam up the Hudson toward Albany. Safe in a world at war, they move slowly through a lovely land overhung with the brooding peace. The vintners around Highland are crushing their sweet white grapes. From its source on Mount Marcy to its mouth at Manhattan Island, the Hudson River is 350 miles long. Along its lower half, between Albany and New York, its valley carries more traffic—in boats and barges on the water, in trains, trucks, busses, automobiles alongside it—than any comparable stretch of water in the country, perhaps in the world. But the Hudson has an importance over and above this usefulness. The Hudson is a very beautiful river. Those who know it well and love it think that no river in the world is quite so lovely. It originates in springs of pure water more than 4,000 feet high in the Adirondack Mountains and after a journey of 350 miles, in a valley of matchless scenic beauty, it disappears in New York Bay, but, strangely enough does not end there. For it is a river of such strong and virile nature that it maintains its identity even in the Atlantic Ocean, and remains a river, unseen by man, many miles out to sea. New Yorkers see the last of it from the Statue of Liberty or the tower of the Empire State Building or the delightful and lofty roof of the Petroleum Building over at the world's fair.

One could travel a lifetime and hardly exhaust the wonders of the State. Niagara thunders at the frontier. There is old Ticonderoga—with its memories of Ethan Allan. There is West Point and the United States Military Academy which is the pride of the Nation; West Point where young men, selected in accordance with the truest principles of democracy, are taught the meaning of loyalty and honor and truth. At Rensselaer we see the old fort where Yankee Doodle first was heard. At Cooperstown you may see where the Leatherstocking Tales were spun, and where baseball originated. The first free school in America was established in New York State, and the largest university, Columbia, is there. At Troy is Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute, the oldest engineering school. Where the waters of Lake Erie flow into Niagara stands Buffalo, a gateway to all the West. In Rochester, the marvel of modern photography was developed. From Syracuse a hundred products find their way to the markets of the world. At old Schenectady, once a trading post, wonders are wrought daily with the magic of electricity. From busy Albany, the capital, you look out on the Hudson to the spot where Robert Fulton brought his fussy little Clermont from New York. And throughout the State, with its 90,000 miles of splendid motor roads, you may see hills and valleys and rolling fields, producing every tree and flower and plant that may be found in the Temperate Zone. Truly, New York, you are an empire. And your men and women have been worthy of you. Four of your sons have sat in the White House—Martin Van Buren, Millard Fillmore, Theodore Roosevelt, and Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

From every State and city, eager boys and girls have brought their talents to your door and won rich rewards. "Excelsior" is your motto. Your eyes are toward the future. And you are the eyes of all the world.

I thank you.

Foreign Policy of the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ERNEST LUNDEEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

EDITORIALS FROM WALLACE'S FARMER

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD five short editorials from Wallace's Farmer, a prominent and widely circulated farm journal, on various aspects of the foreign policy of the United States.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Wallace's Farmer, of December 30, 1939]

NO ANGELS FIGHT IN THIS OR ANY WAR

How much more simple the war seemed in 1917. Then most of us were sure that we were fighting to make the world safe for democracy and to end war. We pictured one side as white—all good and pure—and the other as black—all wicked and cruel.

As time went on we learned that Russia shared with Austria the blame for starting the war, that Great Britain had determined to enter the war before poor little Belgium was invaded, that the Allies were much less interested in saving democracy than in grabbing German colonies, that our loans wouldn't be repaid, and that the treaty of Versailles had left Europe not with peace but with a sort of prolonged armistice. And we noted that French harshness to the German Republic was preparing the way for somebody like Hitler.

In a few years after the excitement had worn off and facts could be seen, we learned that the war of 1914–18 was a mixed affair, with good and bad on both sides, with economic interests more important than slogans about "imperialism" or "democracy," and that the interests of world welfare probably would have been served better by a peace without victory, a stalemate instead of a conquest for one side or the other, with its consequent harsh peace terms.

The things we learned about the World War, but learned 10 years too late, are applicable in many ways to the war now going on. Is the present war any more a war against Hitler than the last war was one against the Kaiser? Are the Germans fighting to conquer the world to keep Hitler's gang in power, or to make sure of adequate raw materials from eastern Europe? Are the Allies fighting to save democracy or to preserve the British and French colonies and to prevent the growth of Germany on the Continent?

Here is an extract from a letter to us from Henry C. Taylor, distinguished farm economist and recently American delegate to the International Institute of Agriculture at Rome. He knows the economic background of the war better than any but a few other Americans, and he says:

"It is not worth while to destroy Hitler. The important thing is to destroy the conditions that have made Hitler possible. Otherwise, another Hitler will arise. The conditions causing the war are not differences in political ideologies. The causes are economic. Every effort will be made to draw us into the conflict on the theory that it is a war to save the democracies, but nothing could do more to destroy such democracy as exists."

He adds that "No American, no Britain, should ever expect peace in Europe until each population group has access to the basic economic necessities of national life."

This is no war between devils and angels over the rule of heaven. It is a conflict between great empires, each of which wants to be sure of the economic assets it thinks it must have. If Americans think of the war in terms of coal, wheat, iron, timber, oil, and feed grains, they will come nearer to understanding it than if they think of it in terms of "dictatorship" and "democracy."

[From Wallace's Farmer of May 20, 1939]

NO PROFIT FOR BOYS WHO GO TO WAR

American businessmen are protesting loudly against the proposal to tax away practically all war profits. The only way to get industry to produce the excessive amount of munitions and other goods needed in war-time is with the bait of large profits, they say.

If war comes, the Government will put your boy on the firing line, and neither he nor you will have anything to say about it. He will not be lured into the Army in the hope of making a profit. He will receive as pay less than he could earn in almost any peacetime job.

You have raised and educated him at considerable expense. Your investment in him is large in terms of cash, larger in terms of hope and affection. You have had visions of him carrying on the work that you have begun, and doing it more effectively.

The boy has a large investment in himself. Out of boyish hopes and dreams and trials and errors he has built a personality that makes the years ahead an exciting adventure. He is in love with life, ambitious to make the most of it. He has no desire to shoot or be shot.

On the cover of this issue is the picture of a Cass County, Iowa, farm boy who was killed in France, March 9, 1918. He had landed in France, December 12, 1917, on his twentieth birthday. Fred Turner served with Company M of the One Hundred and Sixty-eighth Infantry. He was one of the first three members of his company to be killed.

That picture shows the kind of price the Turner family, Cass County, Iowa, and the Nation paid for participation in the World War in 1917. Death was the pay Fred Turner got for his services. War paid his farm neighbors at home a heavy purse full of inflation, mortgages, and foreclosures.

There is no profit in war for the boys who do the fighting, nor for the fathers and mothers of those boys. Why should there be for anyone else? Is industry, doing its part in comparative safety far from the battle lines, so lacking in patriotism that it has to be bribed to do its best?

[From Wallace's Farmer of July 1, 1939]

WHY NOT CLEAR OUT OF CHINA?

There is a war going on in China even though, for some reason, the Government of the United States doesn't admit it. American citizens, American soldiers, and American warships are right smack in the middle of that war zone, in a fine position to be shot up by both sides.

We have urged before, and now urge again, that our troops and warships be taken out of China and that our citizens be warned that they stay there at their own risk. If France were fighting Germany, we wouldn't insist on the right of Americans to camp in between the lines and not be hurt. Yet that is exactly what we're doing in China now.

The Japanese are stirring up a row now by trying to run the British out of Tientsin. But the British and every other group holding special privileges in China will be run out either by the Japanese or by the Chinese before this war is over. Special privilege for foreigners in China is ended.

Americans might as well realize that, withdraw now, and stay out of trouble. Let China and Japan do the fighting. It isn't our war.

[From Wallace's Farmer of July 29, 1939]

WE SAVED THE WORLD ONCE—THAT'S PLENTY!

"Experience is a hard school, but fools will learn in no other," said Poor Richard. He was too optimistic. Fools very often won't learn from experience, and too frequently the burned child goes right back to the fire again.

The United States went through the hard school of experience in 1917 and 1918, but it seems sometimes that precious few of us learned anything from it. At least, those people over 40 ought to remember that we were sucked into the last war because—

1. By selling munitions and other goods abroad we created a war boom that made us willing to lend money to the Allies and finally to help in other ways, to avoid an ending of the war boom and a consequent business crash.

2. By permitting American citizens to travel on ships of warring nations, we authorized their death whenever a ship was sunk. Then we were very indignant at the side that fired the shell or launched the torpedo.

3. By letting American ships try to run blockades with shipments to nations at war we risked capture and sinking of these ships—then we got mad whenever a ship was captured or sunk.

4. By believing propaganda about the need to "make the world safe for democracy" by helping one side in the European fight for power and colonies, we were ready to go to war when other errors of policy produced "causes" for fighting.

After we got into the last war, and after we had helped win it for the Allies, the United States discovered that it had not "made the world safe for democracy" at all. It had merely won colonies for Great Britain and France, and had planted the seeds for another war by a ridiculous and cruel peace treaty.

That new war is getting nearer in Europe now. What is the United States doing to stay out of that war when it comes? Are we going to make the same old mistakes again?

It begins to look that way. The present Neutrality Act, coupled with the Johnson Act, blocks loans to nations at war. It puts an embargo on shipments of arms to warring nations, but it does nothing else.

At the present time, if a war broke out, American citizens could risk their necks and our national safety by traveling in dangerous territory.

At the present time, if a war broke out, American exporters could ship goods to warring nations and run crying to the Navy and the State Department for help if these goods were confiscated.

The unhappy fact is that both sides in the battle over neutrality—the "isolationists," led by Senator JOHNSON of California, and the "internationalists," led by Secretary Hull—agree that a cash-and-carry plan is desirable, that title to exports should be transferred at the water's edge, and that the foreign buyer should take the risks of getting the goods through the blockade. Both sides are also agreed that American citizens should be kept out of dangerous territory.

Yet, because of a fight over repealing the arms embargo, these necessary and generally approved steps may not be taken. We hope that both the administration and the opposition will cool off, postpone the arms-embargo fight, and put through promptly the cash-and-carry and combat-zone provisions which both sides want, and which the Nation must have, if we are to stay out of trouble.

[From Wallace's Farmer of September 23, 1939]

LET YOUR BOY STAY ALIVE

Don't say: "I suppose we'll get pulled into the World War ourselves pretty soon."

Don't say it unless you are also willing to say: "Jack and Jim have gone out to cut each other's throats. I suppose I'll have to cut my throat, too, pretty soon."

One statement is just as sensible as the other.

The United States will not get into this war unless somebody talks us into it or unless we talk ourselves into it.

Our national safety is not immediately affected, no matter who wins. If the British and French Navies were sunk tomorrow, if the German, Italian, and Japanese Navies were untouched, and if by some further miracle, the combined navies of these three powers were to attack the United States, our fleet and air forces could meet the invaders off either coast and defeat them.

Europe is going through its perennial struggle to see who is top dog. How many farmers want to see their boys killed to help decide who is to rule Britain's India, or France's Morocco, or Germany's lost colonies?

It will take money to avoid war booms and to pay the expenses of neutrality, but neutrality costs a lot less than war, and it doesn't kill a single man.

TIME TO KEEP OUR SHIRTS ON

If Americans want to stay neutral, the first step is to avoid getting too enthusiastic over one side or the other. Once we begin feeling as partisans, we will be looking for excuses to take sides in earnest.

Here is some very good advice on the subject:

"A passionate attachment of one nation for another produces a variety of evils.

"Europe has a set of primary interests which to us have none or a very remote relation. Hence, she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the cause of which are essentially foreign to our concern. Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalship, interest, humor, or caprice?"

That was George Washington speaking. And he was talking about an earlier European struggle in which Great Britain and her allies were fighting the greatest land power in Europe, which at that time happened to be France.

Another comment, of more recent date, is by Ernest Lindley, in his syndicated column in the Des Moines Register and other papers. Lindley says:

"Twenty-two years ago we saved Great Britain and France at tremendous cost to ourselves. Now they are in trouble again.

"If we are going to assume the heavy costs of rescuing the British Empire every time it gets into serious difficulties we ought to take over the job of running the Empire.

"Taxation without representation was a minor complaint beside that of fighting without control over the policies which lead to war."

The 1914–18 World War was a good war to stay out of. This is an even better one to avoid. As in 1914, Europe is fighting over land and power. Great Britain and France are fighting to maintain their colonies and the system of alliances that upholds them. Germany is fighting to gain control over all eastern Europe.

With these ambitions Americans can have little concern, no matter how much we may sympathize with the millions of innocent victims of the old game of European power politics.

The Hatch Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 23 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

LETTER FROM HENRY P. FLETCHER

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I asked Hon. Henry P. Fletcher, general counsel of the Republican National Committee, for a letter outlining precisely what he and the committee propose to do in conformity with the so-called Hatch Act. I agree to the importance of living strictly within the spirit as well as the letter of the law. Knowing Mr. Fletcher's distinguished record not only as a lawyer but also as a public servant, and having the highest personal regard for his integrity and his patriotic public spirit, I have felt that he shares these attitudes.

Mr. Fletcher has replied to me. I think his answer is significant and stimulating and wholly and scrupulously satisfactory. I ask that it be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REPUBLICAN NATIONAL COMMITTEE,
Washington, D. C., August 21, 1940.

Hon. ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: The general impression seems to be that the Hatch Act of July 19, 1940, allows the Republican National Committee to spend $3,000,000 in this campaign. This is not the case. The act says (sec. 21): "No political committee shall receive contributions aggregating more than $3,000,000 or make expenditures aggregating more than $3,000,000 during any calendar year."

I have held that in strict compliance with this section, the national committee must deduct from its allowable $3,000,000 all expenditures made in this calendar year of 1940, even those made before the act was passed. We shall thus have about a million and a half for our expenditures in this campaign and in the balance of this year.

Heretofore our general plan of political financing was to have one solicitation for funds and the proceeds were divided between the State and national committees on an agreed basis and the national committee financed the Republican senatorial and congressional committees. Obviously this plan had to be abandoned and the fund raising and spending decentralized. Each committee—senatorial, congressional, and the various State committees, and the independent political committees—will be obliged to look after themselves independently of the Republican National Committee.

When one remembers that the Democratic and Republican National Committees each spent well over $6,000,000 in the 1936 campaign it is clear that the Republican National Committee cannot carry all the expenditures of this campaign on its outside figure of a million and a half dollars, nor do I think the act so intended.

I may be wrong in holding that the act allows any national committee (whether it be senatorial, congressional, Willkie clubs or other committee) to collect and expend $3,000,000, but as a practical matter, whether this be so or not, Mr. Willkie has definitely stated that the aggregate expenses of all committees working for his election will be held well under the $3,000,000 limit.

An interpretation of the act is part of my duty as general counsel. There was no question of evasion. I myself made my opinion public and did so before the campaign was actually under way and while the Congress is in session so that if my interpretation of the act is erroneous, it may be corrected by amendment and contributors and the committees working in this campaign might know definitely what Congress intended they could and could not legally do.

Sincerely yours,

HENRY P. FLETCHER.

Ambassador Bullitt

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BENNETT CHAMP CLARK

OF MISSOURI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 23 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial appearing in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of Tuesday, August 20, having to do with the activities of Mr. William C. Bullitt, entitled "1940's Walter Hines Page."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of August 20, 1940]

WALTER HINES PAGE OF 1940

One of the curdling memories of the last war and the events that preceded our participation in it, was the attitude of Walter Hines Page, then Ambassador to Great Britain. Page was more English than American. Instead of representing this country's interests in the British capital, he represented Britain's interests to a scandalous degree. It was necessary for President Wilson to reprimand him for his unceasing efforts at undermining American neutrality at a time when the President himself was doing his best to preserve that policy.

William C. Bullitt is the Walter Hines Page of 1940. The full story of his meddling in affairs which are no concern of an American representative, has yet to be told. We have all read, however, his incendiary and completely unneutral statements made in Europe; we have heard him described as an unofficial member of the French Cabinet; we heard his radio speech of last Sunday urging the United States to commit an act of war by sending destroyers to Britain, and now comes another sidelight on his activities.

It is told by Joseph Alsop and Robert Kintner, who have a pipe line into the White House and who have devoted their syndicated column for a long time to the interventionist point of view. In fact, these two men have found fault with the President from time to time because he has not gone as far in his meddling with Europe as they would like to see him go.

Messrs. Alsop and Kintner now reveal that the reason Mr. Bullitt stayed in Paris after the French Government fled was "to serve as unofficial Governor of the French capital until the German occupation took place." As unofficial Governor, he was in charge of the Paris police and firemen, who were instructed to stay in Paris at his urging, and it was in his assumed power to give them orders as to how to receive the Germans.

Was there no member of the French Government who could perform this function for his own country? By what tradition of our Diplomatic Corps was Mr. Bullitt justified in representing, not his own Government but the government of a country to which he was accredited? Taken alone, this action of our Ambassador might be explained and defended by the tragic conditions surrounding the impending fall of France. Taken in the context of his definite unneutrality, Ambassador Bullitt's behavior seems to us eminently improper, mischievously dangerous.

Peacetime Military Conscription

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BURTON K. WHEELER

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 23 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

BRIEF SUBMITTED BY THE LAWYERS' COMMITTEE TO KEEP THE UNITED STATES OUT OF WAR

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a brief on peacetime military conscription, submitted by the Lawyers' Committee to Keep the United States Out of War. I will say that I have carefully examined it, and other lawyers have examined it, and I feel that it is a real contribution on the subject of the constitutionality of the bill under consideration.

There being no objection, the brief was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BRIEF ON PEACETIME MILITARY CONSCRIPTION (BURKE-WADSWORTH BILL (S. 4164) AND THE MALONEY AMENDMENT)

FOREWORD

The Burke-Wadsworth bill (S. 4164), introduced in the Senate June 20, 1940, now being debated in Congress, confronts the American people for the first time in their history with the immediate prospect of wholesale military conscription of the Nation's manpower in peacetime.

The vigor of the pending debate, the mounting tide of protest to Congress, the conceded closeness of congressional alignment regardless of party—all attest the fast developing popular awareness of what this measure really holds in store for the standards, the ideals, the daily routines which, in turn, constitute our American way of life.

The bill, in its present form, would register for induction into military service for at least 1 year the entire male population, between 21 and 31 years of age, numbering 12,000,000. Deferment of service, whether for dependents, character of employment, or physical reasons, is left entirely to a vast rule-making power conferred upon the War Department, subject only to the direction of the President. This unconditional power in the military to grant, withhold or cancel deferment of service involves the authority to allocate men to particular industries, regardless of their will, and then, to condition their deferment upon such mode of behavior as the War Department may see fit to prescribe.

We address ourselves primarily to the Congressmen of both Houses, whose grave responsibility it becomes to decide whether this proposed invasion upon our civilian life in peacetime is sanctioned by the principles of our Constitution, and is in harmony with the basic philosophy of the American form of government.

SCOPE AND PURPOSE OF THIS BRIEF

In this brief we shall establish that military conscription in peacetime is unconstitutional. In ordaining the Constitution the people vested no such power in the Federal Government. Neither expressly, impliedly, nor inherently can the Congress be said to possess any such power under the Constitution.

The Constitution was itself enacted to destroy for all times the very system and conception of government which this bill would now resurrect. The vehement opposition to such a power in government, we shall show, stems from the struggle of the English people against their own despots, and is expressed in the deep and unmistakable conviction running through the debates and utterances of our own founding fathers during the adoption and ratification of our Constitution.

Moreover, our argument transcends the purely legalistic analysis of the constitutional issues posed by the bill. For we shall show that this proposal is utterly incompatible with the fundamental principles of our American form of government. Thus, in the profoundest sense of the term, the bill is unconstitutional.

Finally we shall show that apart from the manifest unconstitutionality of the bill its enactment will militarize and regiment our Nation, suppress civil liberties, dislocate industry and agriculture and destroy that free government which our Constitution was ordained and established to secure for all time.

PEACETIME CONSCRIPTION IS UNCONSTITUTIONAL

With respect to the power of the Federal Government to compel military service in peacetime, we will show that it possesses—

A. No inherent power.

B. No express power.

C. No implied power.

D. That such power is incompatible with the general nature and object of the Constitution.

A. There is no inherent power

The Constitution and the Bill of Rights were established by the people, and it is the Constitution which furnishes the final rule of decision and action for all departments of the Government—the legislative, the executive, and the judicial. It is the Constitution which must control until it shall be changed by the people who established it. Acts which are passed in opposition to the fundamental law are void. The Senators and Representatives are bound under article VI by oath or affirmation to support the Constitution. The Constitution is the supreme law of the land.

The Constitution itself so provides. Under the tenth amendment all powers not delegated to the United States are expressly reserved to the people of all the States. And this amendment, the Supreme Court has held, must be liberally construed to effectuate its intent and purpose (Kansas v. Colorado, 206 U. S. 46 (1907)). "* * * no power, therefore, not enumerated could be inferred from the general nature of government," said one of the founders of the Constitution, James Madison (Annals of Cong., 1st Cong., vol. 2 (1789–91), p. 1950).

Thus, there is no inherent power in the Federal Government to pass laws upon the plea that good, perchance, may follow (Jones v. Sec. & Ex. Comm., 298 U. S. 1, 27 (1936)). Even the treaty-making power, that foremost of sovereign powers, Madison tells us, is conferred by the Constitution and by it alone: "Had the power of making treaties, for example, been omitted, however necessary it might have been, the defect could only have been lamented, or supplied by an amendment of the Constitution" (Annals of Cong., 1st Cong (supra), p. 1950).

Congress may not exceed its constitutional power by enacting this bill on the plea of inherent sovereign power to serve the national welfare.

The Supreme Court of the United States has decisively rejected the theory of "inherent powers" and condemned the unlawful assumption of arbitrary power rendered possible thereby:

"The proposition, often advanced and as often discredited, that the power of the Federal Government inherently extends to purposes affecting the Nation as a whole with which the States severally cannot deal or cannot adequately deal, and the related notion that Congress, entirely apart from those powers delegated by the Constitution, may enact laws to promote the general welfare, have never been accepted but always definitely rejected by this Court. Mr. Justice Story, as early as 1816, laid down the cardinal rule, which has ever since been followed—that the general government 'can claim no powers which are not granted to it by the Constitution, and the powers actually granted, must be such as are expressly given, or given by necessary implication.'" (Carter v. Carter Coal Co., 298 U. S. 238, 291 (1936).)

The Supreme Court has stated with respect to constitutional grants of power: "Those who act under these grants are not at liberty to transcend the imposed limits because they believe that more or different power is necessary." Hughes, C. J., in Schechter Poultry Corporation v. United States (295 U. S. 495, 528 (1934)).

Clearly there is no inherent power in the Federal Government to enact the Burke-Wadsworth military conscription bill.

B. No express power to enact peacetime conscription

There is no express provision in the Constitution concerning compulsory military service. There is, in fact, not a single word in the Constitution which grants to Congress power to enact peacetime conscription.

C. No implied power to enact peacetime conscription

The only references in the Constitution to the military powers of the Federal Government are to be found in article I, section 8. There, the Federal Government is empowered to "provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States;" "to declare war * * *," "to raise and support armies, * * *;" "to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces;" "to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia * * *."

Is the power to compel peacetime military service to be implied from any of these?

We shall show that—

(1) The founding fathers never intended to grant Congress the power to raise armies by conscription in peacetime, the free government they founded being indeed the culmination of an historic struggle against standing armies and forced military service.

(2) The courts, in all the 164 years of our national life, have never implied any such power from the Constitution, and such expressions as were occasioned on the subject have been unmistakably against implying it.

(I) Historic background of the rejection of peacetime conscription by the framers of the Constitution.

The authors of the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution rejected military conscription in peacetime as abhorrent to the free government they founded. In so doing they carried forward a tradition firmly established by the English people in their struggle against their own military despots. Without an understanding of this English struggle, it is impossible to realize how profound was the hostility of the founders of the American Government to standing armies and forced military service.

The English Background

In England, where military conscription was attempted from time to time in different forms, the long and successful struggle against it firmly established voluntary enlistment as the only principle consonant with the dignity of a free people.

Voluntary enlistment existed in England in early times and its origin is closely linked to her constitutional history. (May, Constitutional History of England (Holland ed., 1912), vol. 3, p. 281.) The right to maintain a standing army under martial law, claimed by the Stuart Kings, was first denied by Parliament and then condemned as illegal by the Bill of Rights itself. (May, ibid., p. 282.) The petition of right to Charles I in 1628 expresses the popular opposition to maintenance of a conscript army in peacetime:

"VII. And whereas * * * it is declared and enacted; that no man shall be forejudged for life or limb against the form of the great charter, and the law of the land; * * * nevertheless * * * certain persons have been assigned and appointed * * * according to the justice of martial law * * * and by such summary course and order as is agreeable to martial law, and as is used in armies in time of war * * * cause to be executed and put to death. * * *

"X. They do therefore humbly pray * * * that none be called to make answer or * * * in any such manner * * * be imprisoned or detained; and that Your Majesty would be pleased to remove the said soldiers and mariners, and that your people may not be so burdened in time to come * * *."

By 1689, the Mutiny Act declaring standing armies and courts martial unknown to the law of England, authorized them for the current year and on a regular yearly footing thereafter under the sanction of Parliament. But the historian says:

"To have proceeded further and to have decreed that every Englishman must serve in that Army would have seemed to our ancestors a surrender of their liberties" (May, ibid., p. 282).

Blackstone's famous Commentaries on the Laws of England, familiar to the framers of our Constitution, likewise inveighed against the practice of raising armies in peacetime:

"In a land of liberty it is extremely dangerous to make a distinct order of the profession of arms * * *" (Blackstone, Commentaries (Ed. 15, 1809), vol. 1, p. 408).

He prescribes "enlistment" as the only alternative in a free government (Blackstone, ibid., p. 413).

"* * * it (the Army) ought only to be enlisted for a short and limited time * * * no separate camp, no barracks, no inland fortresses should be allowed * * *" (Blackstone, ibid., pp. 406, 413).

Space forbids a detailed treatment of this historic struggle, but careful study will show that the military despotism of Cromwell left an idelible impression on the English people; that the maintenance of a standing army of 30,000 by King James, without consent of Parliament, was a major cause of his unpopularity; that while the Stuart Kings sought to maintain, in peacetime, a considerable military force altogether subject to their control, the Parliament, on the other hand, developed a militia which they believed could never become inimical to the principles of free England, and insisted upon disbanding in time of peace, the whole army of the king, except perhaps a bodyguard and garrisons for the forts. See Lecky, History of England in the Eighteenth Century (London, 5th ed., 1891), volume 1, page 508.

Throughout the Eighteenth Century, this struggle against a standing army in peacetime continued unabated. Most significant it is too, that never, during this entire period, was it contended by King, Parliament, or people, that Englishmen could be forced into the army against their will. Even in time of war, when press-gangs drafted suspected criminals or notorious characters for army service, the Act of Anne expressly restricted the practice only to such able-bodied men as had no lawful calling or employment or visible means for their maintenance or livelihood. Lecky, ibid, page 510.

Thus, the draft, even when invoked in wartime, was a mark of disgrace upon the man conscripted—a method applied only against those who had no lawful or respected place in the society of their day. This, then, is the background of the English struggle, in the light of which the American struggle must be understood.

The American Background

Our own Declaration of Independence categorically declared the causes which impelled the Colonies to separate from England. The signers of that memorable document were addressing themselves to all mankind. They were not dwelling upon trivialities when, in submitting their grievances "to a candid world," they said of their royal oppressor:

"He has kept among us, in times of peace, standing armies without the consent of our legislature.

"He has affected to render the military independent of and superior to the civil power."

And in the turbulent period of the Revolutionary War itself, with the life of the new country at stake, Thomas Jefferson, himself a signer of the Declaration, wrote John Adams on May 16, 1777:

"* * * Our battalions for the continental service were sometime ago so far filled as rendered the recommendation of a draft from the militia hardly requisite, and the more so as in this country it ever was the most unpopular and impracticable thing that could be attempted. Our people, even under the monarchial government, had learnt to consider it as the last of all oppressions." * * * Adams, C. F., The Life and Works of John Adams (Boston, 1854), volume IX, page 465.

Jefferson's opposition was typical of the prevalent sentiment among the young Nation's leadership. They recognized, though not without misgiving, the conceivable necessity of a standing army even in peacetime, but the record shows that in the spirit of the Declaration they were adamant in their opposition to raising it by conscription.

Thus in 1775 the Continental Congress had resolved "to raise several companies of riflemen by enlistment for 1 year, to serve in the American Continental Army" (Elliot's Debates (Ed. 2, 1854), vol. 1, p. 47), and the commission to George Washington, as Commander in Chief of the American Army subscribed by the President of the Congress on the 19th day of June 1775, declared:

"We, reposing especial trust and confidence in your patriotism, conduct, and fidelity, do, by these presents, constitute and appoint you to be General and Commander in Chief of the Army of the United Colonies, and of all the forces raised or to be raised by them, and of all others who shall voluntarily offer their service, and join the said Army for the defense of the American liberty, and for repelling every hostile invasion thereof * * *" (Elliot, supra, p. 47).

Throughout the conflict which followed the practice of using only enlisted men in the Army never varied. The States, too, in filling their quotas fixed by the Congress, resorted to the method of volunteer service only. True, it was assumed that all able-bodied men were available for war service, but this was deemed a privilege of Americans, not a duty exacted by law (Brandeis, J., in Gilbert v. Minnesota, 254 U. S. 325, 339 (1920)).

The Constitution

After victory and achievement of independence, the unabated aversion to any Federal peacetime army, disclosed in every recorded reference to the subject, implies a clear intent against peacetime conscription.

On August 6, 1787, a committee of five delivered the draft of a constitution to the Constitutional Convention, whose proceedings had been referred to them for that purpose. Article VII, section 1, provided that the Legislature of the United States be empowered "to raise armies" (Elliot, ibid., vol. 1, p. 226); it was later moved and seconded to insert "and support" between "raise" and "armies" (Elliot, ibid., p. 248); but, a further amendment adopted by the Convention added the words "but no appropriation for money for that use shall be for a longer term than 2 years" (Elliot, ibid., p. 285). Such was the final version which was plainly quite different from the one originally submitted.

Yet, even this final version was under constant attack throughout the proceedings of the Convention and every possible effort was made to limit its effect. Farrand, Records of the Federal Convention of 1787 ((1911), vol. 2, pp. 505, 509). Indeed, even as the Convention moved toward final adoption, voices were still heard in protest, and in protest—be it noted—against the maintenance of any standing army at all in peacetime. And, as a study of its proceedings will show, no delegate at that Convention, engaging in the acrimonious debate on this question of any standing army in peacetime, ever conceived, much less asserted, that along with this limited power the far more drastic power of peacetime conscription was to be conferred on the Congress.

But the Constitution had not yet been adopted. The States had still to ratify it. There, too, the popular aversion to standing armies manifested itself. In Massachusetts, General Thompson, at the State Ratifying Convention, declared:

"We are now fixing a national consolidation. This section, I look upon it, is big with mischiefs. Congress will have power to keep standing armies. The great Mr. Pitt says standing armies are dangerous—keep your militia in order—we don't want standing armies." (Elliot, ibid., vol. 2, p. 80.)

And Mr. Nason:

"Suffer me, sir, to say a few words on the fatal effects of standing armies, that bane of republican governments. * * * Britain attempted to enforce her arbitrary measures by a standing army. But, sir, we had patriots then who alarmed us of our dangers; who showed us the serpent, and bade us beware of it. Shall I name them? * * * We had a Hancock, an Adams, and a Warren. Our sister States, too, produced a Randolph, a Washington, a Greene, and a Montgomery who led us in our way * * *." (Elliot, ibid., vol. 2, p. 136.)

In Virginia, Patrick Henry thundered:

"A standing army we shall have, also, to execute the execrable commands of tyranny" (Elliot, ibid., vol. 3, p. 51).

And James Madison replied significantly:

"Let us observe, also, that the powers in the general government are those which will be exercised mostly in time of war * * * (Elliot, ibid., vol. 3, p. 259).

And from George Mason came the prophetic words:

"But when once a standing army is established in any country the people lose their liberty" (Elliot, ibid., vol. 3, p. 380).

And Madison again replied:

"I most cordially agree with the honorable member last up, that a standing army is one of the greatest mischiefs that can possibly happen" (Elliot, ibid., vol. 3, p. 381).

Edmund Randolph, Governor of Virginia, then and there agreed:

"With respect to a standing army, I believe there was not a member in the Federal Convention who did not feel indignation at such an institution" (Elliot, ibid., vol. 3, p. 401).

And Mr. Dawson concluded:

"Governments ought not to depend on an army for their support, but ought to be so formed as to have the confidence, honor, and affection of the citizens" (Elliot, ibid., vol. 3, p. 611).

From such a widespread sentiment came the reservations, provisos, and exceptions that attached to the ratifications of practically all the 13 States filed with the Constitutional Convention. We shall give merely the major ones here. From New Hampshire: "that no standing army shall be kept up in time of peace, unless with the consent of three-fourths of the Members of each branch of Congress; nor shall soldiers in time of peace be quartered upon private houses without the consent of the owners" (Elliot, ibid., vol. 1, p. 326); from New York, the admonition: "that standing armies in time of peace, are dangerous to liberty, and ought not to be kept up, except in cases of necessity; and that at all times the military should be under strict subordination to the civil power" (Elliot, ibid., vol. 1, p. 328); from North Carolina: "that no standing army or regular troops shall be raised or kept up, in time of peace, without the consent of two-thirds of the Senators and Representatives present in each House" (Elliot, ibid., vol. 1, p. 330); and Rhode Island counseled: "that standing armies, in time of peace, are dangerous to liberty, and ought not to be kept up, except in cases of necessity" (Elliot, ibid., vol. 1, p. 335).

This brief historical survey establishes the temper of the people and their representatives on this basic issue when the Constitution itself was being debated. Clearly, a deep-seated fear and aversion to compulsory service in peacetime were the dominant sentiments at the time. They are expressed in the restrictions and qualifications attached to the power in course of debate, in the pronouncements of important leaders of the day, and in the reservations of the ratifying States.

It is manifest from the foregoing that the framers of the Constitution, the States which ratified it, and the people who ordained and established it never intended to empower the Federal Government to compel military service in peacetime.

(2) Judicial Decisions on Implied Power

There has never been a decision by the United States Supreme Court which has upheld expressly or by implication the power of Congress to enact a peacetime conscription law.

The two leading cases in our law on the constitutionality of conscription are Kneedler v. Lane (45 Pa. St. 238 (1863)), and the Selective Draft Law Cases (245 U. S. 366 (1917)). Both decisions were concerned with wartime conscription and were decided in wartime. The decisions of the courts of our Nation will be searched in vain for a single one, dealing with conscription, which was concerned with the power of Congress to enact peacetime conscription.

The Civil War case, Kneedler v. Lane (supra), is extraordinary in that the first decision in that case held even wartime conscription unconstitutional. On motion for temporary injunction, the Court held the Conscription Act unconstitutional by a 3 to 2 vote.

The Chief Judge, Lowrie, speaking of the power to conscript in general, stated:

"If any such mode had been in the intention of the fathers of the Constitution, they would certainly have subjected it to some rule of equality or proportion. * * * The fathers of the Constitution * * * would have regulated the mode if such a mode had been intended * * * they had no experience of forced levies for the Regular Army * * * and it seems to me they did not intend to grant such a power to the Federal Government" (p. 243).

Woodward, J., added:

"To raise armies—these are large words, what do they mean? There could be no limitation upon the number or the size of the armies to be raised, for all possible contingencies could not be foreseen; but our question has no reference to numbers or size, but to the mode of raising armies. * * * Assuredly the framers of our Constitution did not intend to subject the people of the States to a system of conscription which was applied in the mother country only to paupers and vagabonds. On the contrary, I infer that the power conferred on Congress was the power to raise armies by the ordinary English mode of voluntary enlistments" (p. 254).

Thompson, J., felt that the power to raise armies "was an ordinary power, not superinduced by impending war. * * * We cannot suppose that the moment the country had achieved its liberty, at so much cost of blood and treasure, that such a despotism over the lives and liberties of men would be incorporated into the Constitution as would authorize Congress to fill the armies to be raised, by conscription, as if by the agency of the press-gang" (p. 266).

Between the time of the decision on the temporary injunction and the final hearing, the Court was reconstituted and reversed its former decision, again by a 3 to 2 vote.

In the Selective Draft Law Cases, 245 U. S. 366 (1917), the Court was dealing entirely with the war powers of Congress, which we shall presently show are quite different from its peacetime powers. As the Court said:

"The law (the 1917 Conscription Act), as its opening sentence declares, was intended to supply temporarily the increased military force which was required by the existing emergency, the war there and now flagrant" (245 U. S., at p. 375).

And Mr. Justice Cardozo's observation in Hamilton v. Regents (293 U. S. 245 (1934)), leaves no doubt that the selective-draft cases related in no way to the conscription power of Congress in peacetime:

"There is no occasion at this time to mark the limits of governmental power in the exaction of military service when the Nation is at peace" (p. 265).

Thus we see how careful the Court was to point out that it was dealing with a wartime statute enacted pursuant to the war power of Congress. In so doing, the Court was but emphasizing the basic distinction in character and extent between Congress' power in war and in peace. We now consider the relevance and importance of that distinction.

Certain legal principles run deep in the fiber of our law. Emergency does not create power. Extraordinary conditions do not create or enlarge constitutional power. The Constitution established a National Government with powers deemed to be adequate, as they have proved to be both in war and peace, but these powers of the National Government are limited by the constitutional grants Schechter Poultry Corporation v. United States (295 U. S. 495, 528 (1935)).

"Emergency does not create power. Emergency does not increase granted power or remove or diminish the restrictions imposed upon power granted or reserved. The Constitution was adopted in a period of grave emergency. Its grants of power to the Federal Government and its limitations of the power of the States were determined in the light of emergency and they are not altered by emergency. What power was thus granted and what limitations were thus imposed are questions which have always been, and always will be, the subject of close examination under our constitutional system" (Home Bldg. & L. Ass'n v. Blaisdell, 290 U. S. 398, 425 (1934)).

The Laws of War and the Laws of Peace

Any attempt to draw an inference of implied constitutional power to enact conscription in peacetime from decisions upholding such power in wartime overlooks the fundamental distinction between the laws of peace and the laws of war.

The classic case defining the character and extent of that distinction is Ex parte Milligan (4 Wallace 2 (1866)). During the Civil War, Lamdin P. Milligan, a northerner with southern principles, acted in such manner as to cause his loyalty to be questioned. He was arrested by the general commanding the military district of Indiana, and in the fall of 1864 he was tried by a military commission upon the following charges: Conspiracy against the United States Government; affording aid and comfort to rebels, including insurrection and disloyal practices and violation of the laws of war.

Milligan was found guilty upon all these charges and was sentenced to be hanged. He then applied to the circuit court for a writ of habeas corpus. He claimed that a military court had no jurisdiction over him for he had never been in the military service of the United States, nor had he been in any of the States that had rebelled, and that he was simply a citizen of Indiana and was entitled to trial in the civil courts which were then in full operation. Since the judges of the circuit court disagreed as to what should be done, a question was certified to the Supreme Court as permitted by the act of Congress, April 29, 1802.

Counsel for the Government argued before the Supreme Court that the military commission had acted properly. The Government conceded that Milligan had been deprived of his liberties under the Bill of Rights but "these, in truth, are all peace provisions of the Constitution, and like all other conventional and legislative laws and enactments, are silent amidst arms, and when the safety of the people becomes the supreme law" (p. 20). Counsel for the petitioner replied: "A violation of law on the pretense of saving such a Government as ours is not self preservation, but suicide"; and the Government answered again: "We agree to that but we assert that, in peace, when there is no commotion, the constitutional provisions should be most rigidly enforced * * *." (p. 104).

The opinion of the Court was delivered by Mr. Justice Davis (p. 120):

"These securities for personal liberty thus embodied, were such as wisdom and experience had demonstrated to be necessary for the protection of those accused of crime. And so strong was the sense of the country of their importance, and so jealous were the people that these rights, highly prized, might be denied them by implication, that when the original Constitution was proposed for adoption it encountered severe opposition; and, but for the belief that it would be so amended as to embrace them, it would never have been ratified.

"Time has proven the discernment of our ancestors; for even these provisions, expressed in such plain English words, that it would seem the ingenuity of man could not evade them, are now, after a lapse of more than 70 years, sought to be avoided. Those great and good men foresaw that troublous times would arise, when rulers and people would become restive under restraint and seek by sharp and decisive measures to accomplish ends deemed just and proper; and that the principles of constitutional liberty would be in peril, unless established by irrepealable law. The history of the world had taught them that what was done in the past might be attempted in the future. The Constitution of the United States is a law for rulers and people, equally in war and in peace, and covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men, at all times, and under all circumstances" (p. 120).

The majority of the Court decided that Milligan had been improperly subjected to court martial, despite the existence of war, because he was a civilian residing in a State in which no military operations were being conducted and that therefore the laws of peace were applicable.

Four members of the Court concurred in the result reached by the majority but advanced different reasons to sustain the decision. They found that a war situation actually had existed in Indiana justifying the use of martial law, but even they recognized the cardinal difference between the laws of peace and the laws of war. They said:

"We by no means assert that Congress can establish and apply the laws of war where no war has been declared or exists.

"Where peace exists the laws of peace must prevail" (p. 140).

Any effort to imply congressional power to enact conscription in peacetime from the constitutional grants of power in war wholly ignores the distinction between the laws of peace and the laws of war. Our highest Court in the Macintosh case held that drastic powers interfering with civil rights might constitutionally be exercised in wartime, but such powers "were wholly inadmissible in time of peace." * * *

"From its very nature, the war power, when necessity calls for its exercise, tolerates no qualifications or limitations, unless found in the Constitution, or in applicable principles of international law. In the words of John Quincy Adams, 'This power is tremendous; it is strictly constitutional; but it breaks down every barrier so anxiously erected for the protection of liberty, property, and of life.' To the end that war may not result in defeat, freedom of speech may, by Act of Congress, be curtailed or denied * * * and other drastic powers, wholly inadmissible in time of peace, exercised to meet the emergencies of war." United States v. Macintosh, 283 U. S. 605, 622 (1931).

D. Peacetime conscription is utterly incompatible with the fundamental principles of our American form of government

Our argument transcends a purely legalistic analysis of the constitutional issues posed by the bill. For we shall show that this proposal is utterly incompatible with the fundamental principles of our American form of government. Thus in the profoundest sense of the term, the bill is unconstitutional.

Daniel Webster, perhaps the foremost constitutional authority in our history, on the floor of the House more than 125 years ago expounded these same considerations in a powerful analysis of Congress' power under the Constitution to conscript the Nation's manpower. (This analysis is so penetrating and illuminating that the entire address is set forth in the Appendix.) He said:

"Congress having, by the Constitution, a power to raise armies, the Secretary contends that no restraint is to be imposed on the exercise of this power, except such as is expressly stated in the written letter of the instrument. In other words, that Congress may execute its powers by any means it chooses, unless such means are particularly prohibited. But the general nature and object of the Constitution impose as rigid a restriction on the means of exercising power as could be done by the most explicit injunctions.

"It is the first principle applicable to such a case, that no construction shall be admitted which impairs the general nature and character of the instrument. A free constitution of government is to be construed upon free principles, and every branch of its provisions is to receive such an interpretation as is full of its general spirit. No means are to be taken by implication which would strike us absurdly if expressed.

"And what would have been more absurd than for this Constitution to have said that to secure the great blessings of liberty it gave to government an uncontrolled power of military conscription? Yet such is the absurdity which it is made to exhibit under the commentary of the Secretary of War. * * *

"* * * Sir, I almost disdain to go to quotations and references to prove that such an abominable doctrine has no foundation in the Constitution of the country. It is enough to know that that instrument was intended as the basis of a free government, and that the power contended for is incompatible with any notion of personal liberty. An attempt to maintain this doctrine upon the provisions of the Constitution is an exercise of perverse ingenuity to extract slavery from the substance of a free government." * * * Writings and Speeches of Daniel Webster (National ed., 1903, vol. XIV, pp. 55–69).

Mr. Webster showed that the logic which justified conscription as a constitutional power would lead inevitably to dictatorship, tyranny, and the destruction of our democracy.

"If the Secretary of War has proved the right of Congress to enact a law enforcing a draft of men out of the militia into the Regular Army, he will at any time be able to prove, quite as clearly, that Congress has power to create a dictator. The arguments which have helped him in one case will equally aid him in the other, the same reason of a supposed or possibly State necessity, which is urged now, may be repeated then, with equal pertinency and effect. * * *

"Sir, in granting Congress the power to raise armies, the people have granted all the means which are ordinary and usual, and which are consistent with the liberties and security of the people themselves, and they have granted no others. To talk about the unlimited power of the Government over the means to execute its authority, is to hold a language which is true only in regard to despotism.

"The tyranny of arbitrary government consists as much in its means as in its ends; and it would be a ridiculous and absurd constitution which should be less cautious to guard against abuses in the one case than in the other. All the means and instruments which a free government exercises, as well as the ends and objects which it pursues, are to partake of its own essential character, and to be conformed to its genuine spirit.

"A free government with arbitrary means to administer it is a contradiction; a free government without adequate provision for personal security is an absurdity; a free government with an uncontrolled power of military conscription is a solecism, at once the most ridiculous and abominable that ever entered into the head of man.

"The Government was not constituted for such purposes. Framed in the spirit of liberty, and in the love of peace, it has no powers which render it able to enforce such laws. The attempt, if we rashly make it, will fail; and having already thrown away our peace we may thereby throw away our Government." (Op. cit.)

In essence, what is fundamentally here involved is the political philosophy which underlies the American democratic form of government, particularly as that philosophy is diametrically opposed to the totalitarian form of government. Advocates of peacetime conscription, who point to the exercise of this power by other governments, overlook this basic distinction.

The American conception of the state has always been that it is an agency brought into existence by the people for the promotion of their own welfare as individuals. The state exists for the people, not the people for the state. The state has no interests apart from those of its citizens. The promotion of individual welfare, individual liberty, and individual rights constitute the very foundation and justification for the state. To justify any infringement, its necessity must be clearly and overwhelmingly established.—Willoughby, W. F., The Government of Modern States (New York and London, Revised Ed., 1936), page 22.

The totalitarian conception of the state is the complete antithesis of the one which has just been stated. It is looked upon as an entity having interests, ambitions, and a will of its own quite distinct from those of its citizens collectively considered. These interests are superior to those of its citizens. To this entity the citizens are held to owe implicit obedience and whenever the interests of the state and its citizens come into conflict, those of the latter are to give way. Furthermore, the state is assumed to be justified in the use of its utmost powers to advance its particular interests, no matter how much in so doing the interests of its own citizens, or of other states, may suffer. The totalitarian state knows no law of morality and no restraint but that of expediency (Willoughby, ibid., p. 23).

Thus, it is absurd to compare the exercise of the powers of our Government with those exercised by other countries. No one would seriously contend that in order to struggle against alien philosophies we should adopt those philosophies ourselves.

It is tragic mockery that the proponents of conscription who urge this "most abominable of oppressions" upon us because of the suggested necessity of defending our democracy, forget that conscription destroys the very democracy sought to be preserved and saved.

We, as lawyers, cognizant of our sworn duty to defend the Constitution, have endeavored to establish in this brief, that a peacetime conscription law would be destructive of the American form of Government, for it would be violative of the letter of the Constitution, and abhorrent to its spirit.

THE MALONEY AMENDMENT

Clearly, the objections to the Burke-Wadsworth bill apply with equal force to the Maloney amendment. If in August 1940 conscription is a violation of the American democratic philosophy of government, it will be no less so in January 1941.

If in August 1940 conscription be wholly outside the letter and spirit of the Constitution, it will be no less so in January 1941.

If Congress has neither inherent, expressed, or implied power to conscript in peacetime, a conscription bill will be as unconstitutional and illegal in January 1941 as in August 1940.

Nor does making conscription contingent upon the success or failure of voluntary enlistment alter the issue in the slightest degree. Conscription cannot become constitutional and lawful dependent upon the results of voluntary enlistment. The success or failure of voluntary enlistment does not confer power upon Congress which it does not now have. Its power is fixed and defined for all time by the Constitution except as the people by amendment see fit to grant additional power.

The Maloney amendment simply postpones conscription. It does not forbid it. The basic provisions of the Burke-Wadsworth bill remain. The fundamental evil, peacetime conscription in the United States, is not eliminated.

SOCIAL, ECONOMIC, AND POLITICAL IMPLICATIONS OF THE BILL

We have sought to confine this brief to the issue of constitutionality, of the power of the Federal Government to conscript in peacetime, an issue which the lawyers' committee is peculiarly qualified to consider and pass upon. But we are also keenly aware of the numerous other important objections to the bill in its original form and as amended.

For the first time in the 164 years of our experience as a nation, the United States is face to face with the possibility of becoming, in a period of peace, a militarized country with the Army and military bureaucracy gaining an ascending power over the lives and activities of the civil population.

Conscription in peacetime is an unprecedented, violent, irremediable upheaval of our whole social, political, and economic life, transforming a democratic system of society into a totalitarian system, turning a democratic form of government into a dictatorship.

During the World War, conscription became the weapon for the exercise by the military of literally unlimited power over the entire population, civilian as well as military. Under the oppressive "work or fight" order promulgated under the selective-service regulations during the World War, men whose military service had been deferred could be directed by the military authorities to eschew certain lines of employment if they wanted to avoid cancelation of their deferment and immediate induction into military service.

In 1936 the Senate Munitions Committee said of the work-or-fight principle, which the committee recognized as the necessary concomitant of the draft law contained in an M-Day plan then under consideration:

"They cannot, perhaps, order every individual to work at a particular job picked out for him specifically, but they can order him not to work in certain industries in which available men must be employed if they want to stay out of the Army. * * * The committee believes that if the work-or-fight principle is authorized by law, along with a draft such as the War Department contemplates, then the country will have for all practical purposes a draft of labor" (S. Rept. No. 944, pt. 4, pp. 48–49).

In fact, the chairman of the War Industries Board in the last World War, Bernard M. Baruch, declared that the work-or-fight principle is "far more effective than any chain gang or impressment that could be invented" (ibid., pp. 48–49).

The work-or-fight principle was incorporated in 1918 in the regulations relating to deferments from military service on the basis of employment in essential industries adopted during the World War to carry out the terms of the provisions of the Selective Service Act of 1917 (40 Stat. 76, c. 15, sec. 4). The Burke-Wadsworth bill, section 5 (c), contains identical statutory provisions in this respect.

The withdrawal of vast bodies of America's manhood from productive work will necessarily create serious economic dislocations. The conscript will be torn from his job, his home, and his family and the entire social and economic pattern of his life and that of his family jeopardized. Although the bill makes a gesture in the direction of protecting a conscript's job, the provision, as drafted, affords little protection, since employers are relieved of obligations in the event of "changed circumstances" (sec. 8).

The consequences of registration affecting millions of citizens are vast. The raids, detentions, and mass arrests by police and Federal agents during the World War on the street, in theaters, restaurants, and railway stations evidence the dangers of abuse inherent in the enforcement of registration.

So far as the millions who are conscripted are concerned, they cease to be free Americans, subject to civil process in civil courts. Immediately upon conscription, they become subject to the summary procedure of court martial. What freedom of expression is possessed by a conscript? What remains of the Bill of Rights when the military authorities acquire jurisdiction of the conscripted?

Conscription in peacetime is an end to the Bill of Rights; free speech, press, and assembly become forbidden acts; no longer will free citizens be able to disagree with executive and military edicts, to assemble and discuss their grievances, to publish their protests and demands. Such liberties cannot flourish where military law prevails.

Conscription has throughout American history been regarded as the "most abominable of all oppressions." It is a ghastly tragedy that, in this hour, America should be faced with the threat of losing its liberty in the guise of defending it.

CONCLUSION

The Burke-Wadsworth bill and the Maloney amendment should be defeated because they are unconstitutional and repugnant to the fundamental character of our American form of government.

Dated, August 20, 1940.

Respectfully submitted.

LAWYERS COMMITTEE TO KEEP THE UNITED STATES OUT OF WAR,
20 Vesey Street, New York City.
LOUIS F. MCCABE, National Chairman.

APPENDIX

SPEECH ON THE CONSCRIPTION BILL BY DANIEL WEBSTER, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, DECEMBER 9, 1814 [1]

Mr. Chairman, after the best reflection which I have been able to bestow on the subject of the bill before you, I am of opinion that its principles are not warranted by any provision of the Constitution. It appears to me to partake of the nature of those other propositions for military measures which this session, so fertile in inventions, has produced. It is of the same class with the plan of the Secretary of War, with the bill reported to this House by its own committee for filling the ranks of the Regular Army by classifying the free male population of the United States; and with the resolution recently introduced by an honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Ingersoll], and which now lies on your table, carrying the principle of compulsory service in the Regular Army to its utmost extent.

This bill indeed is less undisguised in its object, and less direct in its means, than some of the measures proposed. It is an attempt to exercise the power of forcing the free men of this country into the ranks of an army, for the general purposes of war, under color of a military service. To this end it commences with a classification which is no way connected with the general organization of the militia, nor, to my apprehension, included within any of the powers which Congress possesses over them. All the authority which this Government has over the militia, until actually called into its service, is to enact laws for their organization and discipline. This power it has exercised. It now possesses the further power of calling into its service any portion of the militia of the States, in the particular exigencies for which the Constitution provides, and of governing them during the continuance of such service. Here its authority ceases. The classification of the whole body of the militia, according to the provisions of this bill, is not a measure which respects either their general organization or their discipline. It is a distinct system, introduced for new purposes, and not connected with any power which the Constitution has conferred on Congress.

But, sir, there is another consideration. The services of the men to be raised under this act are not limited to those cases in which alone this Government is entitled to the aid of the militia of the States. These cases are particularly stated in the Constitution, "to repel invasion, suppress insurrection, or execute the laws." But this bill has no limitation in this respect. The usual mode of legislating on the subject is abandoned. The only section which would have confined the service of the militia, proposed to be raised, within the United States has been stricken out; and if the President should not march them into the Provinces of England at the north, or of Spain at the south, it will not be because he is prohibited by any provision in this act.

This, sir, is a bill for calling out the militia, not according to its existing organization, but by draft from new-created classes; not merely for the purpose of "repelling invasion, suppressing insurrection, or executing the laws," but for the general objects of war—for defending ourselves, or invading others, as may be thought expedient; not for a sudden emergency, or for a short time, but for long stated periods; for 2 years, if the proposition of the Senate should finally prevail; for 1 year, if the amendment of the House should be adopted. What is this, sir, but raising a standing army out of the militia by draft, and to be recruited by draft, in like manner, as often as occasion may require?

This bill, then, is not different in principle from the other bills, plans, and resolutions which I have mentioned. The present discussion is properly and necessarily common to them all. It is a discussion, sir, of the last importance. That measures of this nature should be debated at all, in the councils of a free government, is cause of dismay. The question is nothing less than whether the most essential rights of personal liberty shall be surrendered, and despotism embraced in its worst form.

I have risen, on this occasion, with anxious and painful emotions, to add my admonition to what has been said by others. Admonition and remonstrance, I am aware, are not acceptable strains. They are duties of unpleasant performance. But they are, in my judgment, the duties which the condition of a falling state imposes. They are duties which sink deep in his conscience, who believes it probable that they may be the last services which he may be able to render to the Government of his country. On the issue of this discussion, I believe the fate of this Goverment may rest. Its duration is incompatible, in my opinion, with the existence of the measures in contemplation. A crisis has at last arrived, to which the course of things has long tended, and which may be decisive upon the happiness of present and of future generations. If there be anything important in the concerns of men, the considerations which fill the present hour are important. I am anxious, above all things, to stand acquitted before God and my own conscience, and in the public judgment, of all participations in the counsels which have brought us to our present condition and which now threatens the dissolution of the Government. When the present generation of men shall be swept away, and that this Government ever existed shall be matter of history only, I desire that it may be known that you have not proceeded in your course unadmonished and unforewarned. Let it then be known that there were those who would have stopped you, in the career of your measures, and held you back, as by the skirts of your garments, from the precipice over which you are plunging and drawing after you the Goverment of your country.

I had hoped, sir, at an early period of the session, to find gentlemen in another temper. I trusted that the existing state of things would have impressed on the minds of those who decide national measures the necessity of some reform in the administration of affairs. If it was not to have been expected that gentlemen would be convinced by argument, it was still not unreasonable to hope that they would listen to the solemn preaching of events. If no previous reasoning could satisfy them, that the favorite plans of Government would fail, they might yet be expected to regard the fact, when it happened, and to yield to the lesson which it taught. Although they had, last year, given no credit to those who predicted the failure of the campaign against Canada, yet they had seen that failure. Although they then treated as idle all doubts of the success of the loan, they had seen the failure of that loan. Although they then held in derision all fears for the public credit, and the national faith, they had yet seen the public credit destroyed, and the national faith violated and disgraced. They had seen much more than was predicted; for no man had foretold that our means of defense would be so far exhausted in foreign invasion, as to leave the place of our own deliberations insecure, and that we should this day be legislating in view of the crumbling monuments of our national disgrace. No one had anticipated that this city would have fallen before a handful of troops, and that British generals and British admirals would have taken their airings along Pennsylvania Avenue while the Government was in full flight, just awaked perhaps from one of its profound meditations on the plan of a conscription for the conquest of Canada. These events, sir, with the present state of things, and the threatening aspect of what is future, should have brought us to a pause. They might have reasonably been expected to induce Congress to review its own measures, and to exercise its great duty of inquiry relative to the conduct of others. If this was too high a pitch of virtue for the multitude of party men, it was at least to have been expected from gentlemen of influence and character, who ought to be supposed to value something higher than mere party attachment, and to act from motives somewhat nobler than a mere regard to party consistency. All that we have yet suffered will be found light and trifling in comparison with what is before us, if the Government shall learn nothing from experience but to despise it, and shall grow more and more desperate in its measures, as it grows more and more desperate in its affairs.

[1] A bill for a classification of the militia, and for drafting individuals, including minors, had passed the Senate. It was a modification of a measure proposed by Mr. Monroe, for a compulsory draft of the free male population between the ages of 18 and 45. Mr. Webster's speech was on a motion to indefinitely postpone the bill. Public sentiment was opposed to the measure, and it failed. Referring to it in 1831, Mr. Webster said: "I had a hand, with Mr. Eppes and others, in overthrowing Mr. Monroe's conscription in 1814." Mr. George Ticknor Curtis, in the Life of Daniel Webster, said the speech was written out by Mr. Webster afterward but never published and that the manuscript was not to be found. It was, however, preserved, is now in the New Hampshire Historical Society, and is here printed from the manuscript in Mr. Webster's handwriting.

It is time for Congress to examine and decide for itself. It has taken things on trust long enough. It has followed Executive recommendation, till there remains no hope of finding safety in that path. What is there, sir, that makes it the duty of this people now to grant new confidence to the administration, and to surrender their most important rights to its discretion? On what merits its own does it rest this extraordinary claim? When it calls thus loudly for the treasure and the lives of the people, what pledge does it offer that it will not waste all in the same preposterous pursuits which have hitherto engaged it? In the failure of all past promises, do we see any assurance of future performance? Are we to measure out our confidence in proportion to our disgrace and now at last to grant away everything, because all that we have heretofore granted has been wasted or misapplied? What is there in our condition that bespeaks a wise or an able government? What is the evidence that the protection of the country is the object principally regarded? In every quarter that protection has been more or less abandoned to the States. That every town on the coast is not now in possession of the enemy, or in ashes, is owing to the vigilance and exertions of the States themselves, and to no protection granted to them by those on whom the whole duty of their protection rested.

Or shall we look to the acquisition of the professed objects of the war, and there find grounds for approbation and confidence? The professed objects of the war are abandoned in all due form. The contest for sailors' rights is turned into a negotiation about boundaries and military roads, and the highest hope entertained by any man of the issue is that we may be able to get out of the war without a cession of territory.

Look, sir, to the finances of the country. What a picture do they exhibit of the wisdom and prudence and foresight of government. "The revenue of a state," says a profound writer, "is the state." If we are to judge of the condition of the country by the condition of its revenues, what is the result? A wise government sinks deep the fountain of its revenues—not only till it can touch the first springs, and slake the present thirst of the Treasury, but till lasting sources are opened, too abundant to be exhausted by demand, too deep to be affected by heats and droughts. What, sir, is our present supply, and what our provision for the future resource? I forbear to speak of the present condition of the Treasury; and as to public credit, the last reliance of government, I use the language of government itself only, when I say it does not exist. This is a state of things calling for the soberest counsels, and yet it seems to meet only the wildest speculations. Nothing is talked of but banks, and a circulating paper medium, and exchequer notes, and the thousand other contrivances which ingenuity, vexed and goaded by the direst necessity, can devise, with the vain hope of giving value to mere paper. All these things are not revenue, nor do they produce it. They are the effect of a productive commerce, and a well-ordered system of finance, and in their operation may be favorable to both, but are not the cause of either. In other times these facilities existed. Bank paper and Government paper circulated because both rested on substantial capital or solid credit. Without these they will not circulate, nor is there a device more shallow or more mischievous, than to pour forth new floods of paper without credit as a remedy for the evils which paper without credit has already created. As was intimated the other day by my honorable friend from North Carolina, Mr. Gaston, this is an attempt to act over again the farce of the assignats of France. Indeed, sir, our politicians appear to have but one school. They learn everything of modern France; with this variety only, that for examples of revenue they go to the revolution, when her revenue was in the worst state possible, while their model for military force is sought after in her imperial era, when her military was organized on principles the most arbitrary and abominable.

Let us examine the nature and extent of the power which is assumed by the various military measures before us. In the present want of men and money, the Secretary of War has proposed to Congress a military conscription. For the conquest of Canada, the people will not enlist; and if they would, the Treasury is exhausted, and they could not be paid. Conscription is chosen as the most promising instrument, both of overcoming reluctance to the service, and of subduing the difficulties which arise from the deficiencies of the exchequer. The administration asserts the right to fill the ranks of the Regular Army by compulsion. It contends that it may now take one out of every 25 men, and any part, or the whole of the rest, whenever its occasions require. Persons thus taken by force, and put into an army, may be compelled to serve there during the war, or for life. They may be put on any service, at home or abroad, for defence or for invasion, according to the will and pleasure of the Government. This power does not grow out of any invasion of the country, or even out of a state of war. It belongs to Government at all times, in peace as well as in war, and it is to be exercised under all circumstances, according to its mere discretion. This, sir, is the amount of the principle contended for by the Secretary of War.

Is this, sir, consistent with the character of a free government? Is this civil liberty? Is this the real character of our Constitution? No, sir; indeed it is not. The Constitution is libeled, foully libeled. The people of this country have not established for themselves such a fabric of despotism. They have not purchased at a vast expense of their own treasure and their own blood a Magna Charta to be slaves. Where is it written in the Constitution, in what article or section is it contained, that you may take children from their parents, and parents from their children, and compel them to fight the battles of any war in which the folly or the wickedness of government may engage it? Under what concealment has this power lain hidden which now for the first time comes forth, with a tremendous and baleful aspect, to trample down and destroy the dearest rights of personal liberty? Who will show me any constitutional injunction which makes it the duty of the American people to surrender everything valuable in life, and even life itself, not when the safety of their country and its liberties may demand the sacrifice, but whenever the purposes of an ambitious and mischievous government may require it? Sir, I almost disdain to go to quotations and references to prove that such an abominable doctrine has no foundation in the Constitution of the country. It is enough to know that that instrument was intended as the basis of a free government, and that the power contended for is incompatible with any notion of personal liberty. An attempt to maintain this doctrine upon the provisions of the Constitution is an exercise of perverse ingenuity to extract slavery from the substance of a free government. It is an attempt to show, by proof and argument, that we ourselves are subjects of despotism, and that we have a right to chains and bondage, firmly secured to us and our children by the provisions of our Government. It has been the labor of other men, at other times, to mitigate and reform the powers of government by construction; to support the rights of personal security by every species of favorable and benign interpretation, and thus to infuse a free spirit into governments not friendly in their general structure and formation to public liberty.

The supporters of the measures before us act on the opposite principle. It is their task to raise arbitrary powers, by construction, out of a plain written charter of national liberty. It is their pleasing duty to free us of the delusion which we have fondly cherished, that we are the subjects of a mild, free, and limited Government, and to demonstrate, and to demonstrate by a regular chain of premises and conclusions, that government possesses over us a power more tyrannical, more arbitrary, more dangerous, more allied to blood and murder, more full of every form of mischief, more productive of every sort and degree of misery than has been exercised by any civilized government, with a single exception, in modern times.

The Secretary of War has favored us with an argument on the constitutionality of this power. Those who lament that such doctrines should be supported by the opinion of a high officer of Government may a little abate their regret, when they remember that the same officer, in his last letter of instructions to our ministers abroad, maintained the contrary. In that letter he declares that even the impressment of seamen, for which many more plausible reasons may be given than for the impressment of soldiers, is repugnant to our Constitution. It might therefore be a sufficient answer to his argument, in the present case, to quote against it the sentiments of its own author, and to place the two opinions before the House, in a state of irreconcilable conflict. Further comment on either might then be properly forborne, until he should be pleased to inform us which he retracted, and to which he adhered. But the importance of the subject may justify a further consideration of the arguments.

Congress having, by the Constitution, a power to raise armies, the Secretary contends that no restraint is to be imposed on the exercise of this power, except such as is expressly stated in the written letter of the instrument. In other words, that Congress may execute its powers, by any means it chooses, unless such means are particularly prohibited. But the general nature and object of the Constitution impose as rigid a restriction on the means of exercising power as could be done by the most explicit injunctions. It is the first principle applicable to such a case, that no construction shall be admitted which impairs the general nature and character of the instrument. A free constitution of government is to be construed upon free principles, and every branch of its provisions is to receive such an interpretation as is full of its general spirit. No means are to be taken by implication which would strike us absurdly if expressed. And what would have been more absurd than for this Constitution to have said that to secure the great blessings of liberty it gave to government an uncontrolled power of military conscription? Yet such is the absurdity which it is made to exhibit, under the commentary of the Secretary of War.

But it is said that it might happen that an army could not be raised by voluntary enlistment, in which case the power to raise armies would be granted in vain, unless they might be raised by compulsion. If this reasoning could prove anything, it would equally show, that whenever the legitimate power of the Constitution should be so badly administered as to cease to answer the great ends intended by them, such new powers may be assumed or usurped, as any existing administration may deem expedient. This is the result of his own reasoning, to which the Secretary does not profess to go. But it is a true result. For if it is to be assumed that all powers were granted which might by possibility become necessary, and that government itself is the judge of this possible necessity, then the powers of government are precisely what it chooses they should be. Apply the same reasoning to any other power granted to Congress, and test its accuracy by the result. Congress has power to borrow money. How is it to exercise this power? Is it confined to voluntary loans? There is no express limitation to that effect, and, in the language of the Secretary, it might happen, indeed it has happened, that persons could not be found willing to lend. Money might be borrowed then in any other mode. In other words, Congress might resort to a forced loan. It might take the money of any man by force, and give him in exchange exchequer notes or certificates of stock. Would this be quite constitutional, sir? It is entirely within the reasoning of the Secretary, and it is a result of his argument, outraging the rights of individuals in a far less degree than the practical consequences which he himself draws from it. A compulsory loan is not to be compared, in point of enormity, with a compulsory military service.

If the Secretary of War has proved the right of Congress to enact a law enforcing a draft of men out of the militia into the Regular Army, he will at any time be able to prove, quite as clearly, that Congress has power to create a dictator. The arguments which have helped him in one case, will equally aid him in the other, the same reason of a supposed or possible state necessity, which is urged now, may be repeated then, with equal pertinency and effect.

Sir, in granting Congress the power to raise armies, the people have granted all the means which are ordinary and usual, and which are consistent with the liberties and security of the people themselves, and they have granted no others. To talk about the unlimited power of the Government over the means to execute its authority, is to hold a language which is true only in regard to despotism. The tyranny of arbitrary governments consists as much in its means as in its ends; and it would be a ridiculous and absurd constitution which should be less cautious to guard against abuses in the one case than in the other. All the means and instruments which a free government exercises, as well as the ends and objects which it pursues, are to partake of its own essential character, and to be conformed to its genuine spirit. A free government with arbitrary means to administer it is a contradiction; a free government without adequate provision for personal security is an absurdity; a free government, with an uncontrolled power of military conscription, is a solecism, at once the most ridiculous and abominable that ever entered into the head of man.

Sir, I invite the supporters of the measures before you to look to their actual operation. Let the men who have so often pledged their own fortunes and their own lives to the support of this war, look to the wanton sacrifice which they are about to make of their lives and fortunes. They may talk as they will about substitutes, and compensations, and exemptions. It must come to the draft at last. If the Government cannot hire men voluntarily to fight its battles, neither can individuals. If the war should continue, there will be no escape, and every man's fate and every man's life will come to depend on the issue of the military draft. Who shall describe to you the horror which your orders of conscription shall create in the once happy villages of this country? Who shall describe the distress and anguish which they will spread over those hills and valleys, where men have heretofore been accustomed to labor, and to rest in security and happiness? Anticipate the scene, sir, when the class shall assemble to stand its draft, and to throw the dice for blood. What a group of wives and mothers and sisters, of helpless age and helpless infancy, shall gather round the theater of this horrible lottery, as if the stroke of death were to fall from heaven before their eyes on a father, a brother, a son, or a husband. And in a majority of cases, sir, it will be the stroke of death. Under present prospects of the continuance of the war, not one-half of them on whom your conscription shall fall will ever return to tell the tale of their sufferings. They will perish of disease and pestilence, or they will leave their bones to whiten in fields beyond the frontier. Does the lot fall on the father of a family? His children, already orphans, shall see his face no more. When they behold him for the last time, they shall see him lashed and fettered, and dragged away from his own threshold, like a felon and an outlaw. Does it fall on a son, the hope and the staff of aged parents? That hope shall fail them. On that staff they shall lean no longer. They shall not enjoy the happiness of dying before their children. They shall totter to their grave, bereft of their offspring and unwept by any who inherit their blood. Does it fall on a husband? The eyes which watch his parting steps may swim in tears forever. She is a wife no longer. There is no relation so tender or so sacred that by these accursed measures you do not propose to violate it. There is no happiness so perfect that you do not propose to destroy it. Into the paradise of domestic life you enter, not indeed by temptations and sorceries, but by open force and violence.

But this father, or this son, or this husband goes to the camp. With whom do you associate him? With those only who are sober and virtuous and respectable like himself? No, sir. But you propose to find him companions in the worst men of the worst sort. Another bill lies on your table offering a bounty to deserters from your enemy. Whatever is most infamous in his ranks you propose to make your own. You address yourselves to those who will hear you advise them to perjury and treason. All who are ready to set heaven and earth at defiance at the same time, to violate their oaths and run the hazard of capital punishment, and none others, will yield to your solicitations. And these are they whom you are allowing to join your ranks, by holding out to them inducements and bounties with one hand while with the other you are driving thither the honest and worthy members of your own community, under the lash and scourge of conscription. In the line of your army, with the true leveling of despotism, you propose a promiscuous mixture of the worthy and the worthless, the virtuous and the profligate; the husbandman, the merchant, the mechanic of your own country, with the beings whom war selects from the excess of European population, who possess neither interest, feeling, nor character in common with your own people, and who have no other recommendation to your notice than their propensity to crimes.

Nor is it, sir, for the defense of his own house and home that he who is the subject of military draft is to perform the task allotted to him. You will put him upon a service equally foreign to his interests and abhorrent to his feelings. With his aid you are to push your purposes of conquest. The battles which he is to fight are the battles of invasion—battles which he detests, perhaps, and abhors, less from the danger and the death that gather over them, and the blood with which they drench the plain, than from the principles in which they have their origin. Fresh from the peaceful pursuits of life, and yet a soldier but in name, he is to be opposed to veteran troops, hardened under every scene, inured to every privation, and disciplined in every service. If, sir, in this strife he fall—if, while ready to obey every rightful command of government, he is forced from his home against right, not to contend for the defense of his country but to prosecute a miserable and detestable project of invasion, and in that strife he fall, 'tis murder. It may stalk above the cognizance of human law, but in the sight of Heaven it is murder; and though millions of years may roll away, while his ashes and yours lie mingled together in the earth, the day will yet come when his spirit and the spirits of his children must be met at the bar of omnipotent justice. May God, in His compassion, shield me from any participation in the enormity of this guilt.

I would ask, sir, whether the supporters of these measures have well weighed the difficulties of their undertaking. Have they considered whether it will be found easy to execute laws which bear such marks of despotism on their front, and which will be so productive of every sort and degree of misery in their execution? For one, sir, I hesitate not to say that they cannot be executed. No law professedly passed for the purpose of compelling a service in the Regular Army, nor any law which, under color of military draft, shall compel men to serve in the Army, not for the emergencies mentioned in the Constitution, but for long periods, and for the general objects of war, can be carried into effect. In my opinion it ought not to be carried into effect. The operation of measures thus unconstitutional and illegal ought to be prevented by a resort to other measures which are both constitutional and legal. It will be the solemn duty of the State governments to protect their own authority over their own militia, and to interpose between their citizens and arbitrary power. These are among the objects for which the State governments exist; and their highest obligations bind them to the preservation of their own rights and the liberties of their people. I express these sentiments here, sir, because I shall express them to my constituents. Both they and myself live under a Constitution which teaches us that "the doctrine of non-resistance against arbitrary power and oppression is absurd, slavish, and destructive of the good and happiness of mankind" (New Hampshire bill of rights). With the same earnestness with which I now exhort you to forbear from these measures, I shall exhort them to exercise their unquestionable right of providing for the security of their own liberties.

In my opinion, sir, the sentiments of the free population of this country are greatly mistaken here. The Nation is not yet in a temper to submit to conscription. The people have too fresh and strong a feeling of the blessings of civil liberty to be willing thus to surrender it. You may talk to them as much as you please, of the victory and glory to be obtained in the enemy's provinces; they will hold those objects in light estimation if the means be a forced military service. You may sing to them the song of Canada Conquest in all its variety, but they will not be charmed out of the remembrance of their substantial interests and true happiness. Similar pretenses, they know, are the grave in which the liberties of other nations have been buried, and they will take warning.

Laws, sir, of this nature can create nothing but opposition. If you scatter them abroad, like the fabled dragon's teeth, they will spring up into armed men. A military force cannot be raised in this manner, but by the means of a military force. If administration has found that it cannot form an Army without conscription, it will find, if it venture on these experiments, that it cannot enforce conscription without an Army. The Government was not constituted for such purposes. Framed in the spirit of liberty, and in the love of peace, it has no powers which render it able to enforce such laws. The attempt, if we rashly make it, will fail; and having already thrown away our peace, we may thereby throw away our Government.

Allusions have been made, sir, to the state of things in New England, and, as usual, she has been charged with an intention to dissolve the Union. The charge is unfounded. She is much too wise to entertain such purposes. She has had too much experience and has too strong a recollection of the blessings which the Union is capable of producing under a just administration of government. It is her greatest fear that the course at present pursued will destroy it, by destroying every principle, every interest, every sentiment, and every feeling which have hitherto contributed to uphold it. Those who cry out that the Union is in danger are themselves the authors of that danger. They put its existence to hazard by measures of violence, which it is not capable of enduring. They talk of dangerous designs against Government when they are overthrowing the fabric from its foundations. They alone, sir, are friends to the Union of the States who endeavor to maintain the principles of civil liberty in the country and to preserve the spirit in which the Union was framed.

Highways Serve Defense and Peacetime Needs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. COMPTON I. WHITE

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 29, 1940

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, defense preparations should bear the closest possible analogy to peacetime benefits, and defense construction projects should be geared to a program that will provide improvements of necessity in defense and of enduring convenience to the commercial life of our Nation. Improved highways are a crying need for the mobility of a mechanized army and for an expanded transportation system that will accommodate the ever-increasing auto traffic. Huge sums are to be spent for airport bases, for naval construction, for production of the machines of war, but little is heard about the inadequacy of the highway system or the necessity for the improvement thereof.

If we are to learn any lesson from the war plans that were conceived and executed on the European Continent, we should take cognizance of the fact that Germany's first move toward a military program was an enormous superhighway construction program that criss-crossed the nation with roads to provide speedy movement of the mechanized units which were later established.

In our present situation there should be a comprehensive program for construction of highways. Established routes should be brought to a greater degree of adequacy through widening, elimination of sharp curves, grade crossings, and other hazards; dirt roads, of which, unfortunately, such long mileage exists, should be improved, and the bottle necks where no highways at all exist should be relieved.

Since my home State of Idaho furnishes an example of a State that has been handicapped in completing its highway system because so much of its area is owned by the Federal Government, as is the case with many Western States, I beg your indulgence to discuss the problem and to suggest a solution.

There are no east-and-west highways or railroads through Idaho for a distance of 450 miles north and south. Three routes through the State have been designated by the War Department as "military" or "strategic"; that is, of primary importance in a defense plan in the Pacific Northwest. Two of these highways are built and in use but greatly in need of improvement and the third has a distance of 52 miles through the national forest that is not even a passable trail. These roads have long been advocated as of great importance to the expansion of the Northwest. The War Department's recommendation for construction of military routes is made in conjunction with the importance of the route as a commercial highway.

Appropriations by the Congress for the construction of highways through the national forest has been insufficient to permit completion of designated routes. Idaho received approximately $900,000 from the 1941 allocation of forest-highway funds. Two-thirds of the area of the State lies in the forest reserve. The highway mileage through the forest reserve is 1,078, of which 331.17 miles remains to be constructed and much that is constructed is in need of improvement. The estimate of the Public Roads Administration for completing one of the military routes through Idaho, which I have mentioned, exceeds $3,000,000.

NORTH PACIFIC HIGHWAY NO. 10

From Missoula, Mont., where a unit of the Fourth Infantry is stationed, to Spokane, Wash., where another unit of the same outfit is located, there extends through the Fourth of July Canyon in Idaho what is known as North Pacific Highway No. 10, designated on the War Department special map, issued September 15, 1939, as of "first priority." On July 31, 1940, Thomas MacDonald, Commissioner of the Public Roads Administration, reports on the condition of this highway as follows:

> The section of the North Pacific Highway from Bennett Bay to Wolf Lodge Bay, on the north side of Coeur d'Alene Lake (in Idaho), was constructed in 1920. It is narrow and crooked and since the remainder of the route from Coeur d'Alene to the Montana line (through Idaho) has been rebuilt to a much higher standard, it is entirely inadequate to serve the heavy traffic which the route now carries.

Commissioner MacDonald was speaking in peacetime terms about a road that fails to serve the present traffic and which would be a sorry spectacle when jammed with troops and their equipment.

The highway in question extends through the famous Coeur d'Alene mining district that has such heavy production of silver, lead, and zinc. It is a forest highway—that is, it lies within the area owned by the Federal Government, is recognized by a defense branch of the Government as important in the military program, and yet it is impossible to secure funds for its reconstruction or improvement.

LEWIS AND CLARK HIGHWAY

A complete bottle neck exists at Lewiston, in central Idaho, where all highways connecting with Pacific coasts points dead end insofar as traffic to the east is concerned. In February of this year the War Department designated the Lewis and Clark Highway, extending through the national-forest reserve from Lewiston, Idaho, to Missoula, Mont., as a "first priority" military route. There are 52 miles of this route where no construction has been undertaken at all and no appropriation has been made to cover it.

Secretary of War Stimson wrote to me under date of July 23, 1940, as follows:

> Receipt is acknowledged of your letter of June 24, 1940, in which you recommend completion of the Lewis and Clark Highway between Lewiston, Idaho, and Missoula, Mont.
> War Department recommendations, based upon military needs, are of an advisory nature to the Public Roads Administration, which agency is charged, under the Federal Highway Act, with the allotment of Federal-aid funds, to be matched by State funds for specific highway projects. The Department's recommendations are submitted for consideration in conjunction with commercial and other needs as determined by the Public Roads Administration and the State highway departments. As you know, the War Department has designated a route following the general course of the Lewis and Clark Highway as a first-priority route, and has advised the Public Roads Administration accordingly.
> The War Department has no funds for road construction other than on military reservations, and consequently cannot enter further into the matter.

Now, I call your attention to the fact that the War Department is only an advisory body in such an important matter of defense as the construction of highways. I remind you, too, that the appropriations to implement the Public Roads Administration program are inadequate, however much this agency might be influenced by the advisory comment of the War Department.

FOURFOLD PURPOSE

The construction of the highways through Idaho in the national forest would serve a fourfold purpose—add to the protection of the timber belonging to the Federal Government by making quick arrival of men and supplies at fires possible, provide for the development of the natural resources, especially mining, serve the commercial needs for better transportation facilities, and significantly important at this time, provide mobility for troops.

BUILD HIGHWAYS WITH DEFENSE MONEY

Defense appropriations should be released to road-building agencies of the Government and a comprehensive program undertaken to build the projects that have been designated as of military importance as well as of commercial benefit.

Highways, especially through the national forest, are badly needed for peacetime purposes at the present time, and in case of an invasion they would be a necessity.

There is another angle of the situation so far as the Pacific Northwest is concerned, especially the inland States of that area; no defense works of importance are contemplated for construction in this section, so I am told; there is an unemployment problem which would be solved by the construction of the needed highways; it is equitable to spread the defense funds to provide benefits to as many parts of the country as possible and relieve the economic conditions.

Mr. Speaker, I propose enabling legislation for the purpose of constructing highways with defense appropriations.

Cullman (Ala.) National Farm Loan Association

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN H. BANKHEAD, 2D

OF ALABAMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, August 24 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. A. G. BLACK

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, on the 13th day of August last, Hon. A. G. Black, Governor of the Farm Credit Administration, addressed a very large number of members of national farm-loan associations at Cullman, Ala. In view of the importance of the subject of rural credits and of the administrative activities of the Farm Credit Administration, I ask unanimous consent to have Governor Black's able and informative address printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It was with a great deal of pleasure that I accepted your invitation to come to Cullman County and to join our distinguished Senator BANKHEAD in addressing this splendid meeting of your group of national farm loan associations. We in Farm Credit are all very proud of the record of the Trade, Cullman, Falkville, and Hulaco associations and of the splendid work that is being done for this group by its secretary-treasurer, Mr. Jack Moyers. Servicing as it does a total of almost 2,300 units this set-up is the largest in the entire Farm Credit System. It is not the size, however, but the outstanding performance and the energetic cooperation shown by the farmers of Cullman and Morgan Counties of which we are particularly proud.

I do not need to tell you who have made such splendid progress with a group association what the advantages of this set-up are and what it can mean to the membership. You already know that from experience. But I am sure that you would be interested to know that the operations of the associations in the New Orleans district under the grouping system and the allowance plan have been most gratifying to us in Farm Credit. Association members throughout the country generally are finding a full-time office located right in their own community means more efficient and economical operations. The full services of the Farm Credit Administration are being brought to the farmyard and are being administered by your neighbors under this system.

Through your 4 associations there have been granted over 1,700 loans to cooperating farmer members for a total of almost $2,000,000 in mortgages on farms in this area. While this sum is but a small fraction of the hundreds of millions which have been loaned on farm mortgages the country over by the Federal land banks of the Nation, it is on the solid foundation of such a membership as yours that the structure of your Farm Credit System is soundly built. It is quite clear to us in Washington that much of the success of this system depends in a large measure on the prosperity of every one of you as farmers and on the work that you do as members of your associations. In a credit system such as this, the spirit which must animate it is one that looks to the welfare of its members. While the primary function of farm-loan associations and the Farm Credit Administration is that of making mortgage credit available to farmers, their interest and their responsibility to the borrower cannot end there. In fact, the basic law upon which the Federal land banks and the national farm loan associations were founded places upon them the duty to spread information regarding methods and principles of cooperative credit and organization among farmers and the people of the United States in general.

In this system, of which all of us are a part, the relationship is not simply that of a lender who has money he is willing to let you have at a price and of borrower who "hires" it and pays the price. In a system such as this we have all joined together mutually to further the best interests of agriculture and the farmers of the Nation as a whole, and in this instance the agriculture of Cullman and Morgan Counties in particular. Taken from that viewpoint, our program of farm credit takes on a much broader aspect than can be written into the legal jargon of a mortgage contract. What we are seeking to do together is to make the farm mortgage an instrument for building farm homes and prosperous farmers, and not an instrument for mining the soil, as has too often been the case in the past.

In the last few years we feel that we have been making progress in the realization of that aim. Today over 40 percent of the total farm-mortgage debt of the country is financed through the Farm Credit Administration. This means that nearly half of the farm debt is now financed through long-term contracts, with principal payments amortized over a long period of years. Everyone who has borrowed money under the old system where the contract had to be renewed every few years and who is now making use of the long-term farm credit system can readily appreciate the vast difference between these two methods and what the change has meant to him.

But letting a farmer have a little money for a long time is not going to help much if it takes most of the money he makes each year to pay the interest charges on his mortgage. With mortgages, like a lot of other things in this life, it is not the original cost but the upkeep that gets you down. I do not have to remind you that reducing the cost of borrowing money by lowering the interest rate at which you borrow means a saving of vast and permanent importance to you. You who are borrowers know a good deal about that from bitter experience.

Since 1933 we have moved forward more rapidly than ever before in the direction of a lower farm-mortgage interest rate. Prior to that year farmers in many sections of the United States were paying an exorbitant price for the money they borrowed and most farmers were paying more than they could afford from their small incomes to keep up the interest payments on their mortgages. Interest charges of 6, 7, and 8 percent on farm mortgages were common prior to 1933. These debts in thousands of instances have been refinanced through the Federal land banks and the land bank commissioner since 1933 at contract rates of 4 and 5 percent. These rates have been further reduced for a limited period by special act of Congress to 3½ percent, where they are today. But in order to make this reduction Congress appropriated the difference between the contract rate and the lower rate out of Treasury funds.

In the case of Alabama the average interest rate on farm mortgages privately financed prior to 1933 was about 7½ percent. Today you and the members of other associations like yours are able to borrow money at 4 percent less than that. Reduced to dollars and cents, the picture in Alabama looks something like this: If you, as a farmer in Cullman County, had borrowed $1,000 in, let us say, 1931 from a private lender, your annual interest bill would have been $75. Today, through your local loan association and the Farm Credit Administration you can borrow the same amount of money at an annual cost of $35, or a reduction in year-to-year "upkeep" of $40.

As far as it goes, this represents progress toward the goal we are striving to attain. I have always favored a policy of lower interest rates on farm mortgages, but I want to see such a rate permanently insured to farmers through a truly cooperative system of farm credit. I feel sure that you agree with me in this aim. How we can best realize that aim is a subject I would like to discuss with you for a moment. The problems confronting American agriculture and its farm-credit program at the present time raise some questions with regard to those aims which we must all consider carefully.

The first of these questions is, What is the best way for the Farm Credit System to get the money to loan to farmers at the lowest rates economically possible? As I have already pointed out, the Government in the past has taken a hand in helping us to realize this objective. It has done so in several ways. In the first instance it purchased stock in the original Federal land-bank set-up, it granted tax exemption to the banks' bonds, and it authorized the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation to purchase them. It has provided $189,000,000 to the surplus of the banks and another $125,000,000 in stock purchases. By special act of Congress the interest rate on loans from the Federal land banks and the Commissioner has been reduced by appropriating from the Treasury the difference between the contract rate and the temporary legislated rate. This appropriation, in order to make the present lower interest rate possible, has amounted to $165,000,000. This represents a total contribution to the system so far of about $500,000,000.

Obviously this is an expensive means for getting a lower interest rate for the borrower and there is question how long the Congress will keep on voting it. With the expenditures of Government going up and with the need for diverting large amounts to the purposes of national defense for some time to come, we must give thought to the possibility that Congress may not forever continue to appropriate money in order that this lower interest rate on farm mortgages may be maintained.

The question naturally arises, Is there not some other means by which a low interest rate can be maintained and that on a permanent basis? There are at least three ways in which your Farm Credit System can get funds in order to loan you money, and each of them would involve a different interest rate for you. You are all familiar with the old system in which the bonds of the Federal land banks carried nothing but the moral guaranty of the Government. Under this system interest rates were usually about 5 percent. You are also undoubtedly somewhat familiar with the present system under which the interest rate has been reduced to 3½ percent through an annual appropriation from the Federal Treasury, amounting to $28,000,000. At the present time the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation, which has a ready market for its Government guaranteed bonds, has bought the bonds of the land banks whenever market conditions were not satisfactory. Today it holds $761,000,000 land-bank bonds. What this amounts to is an indirect guaranty of the land-bank bonds by the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation. This suggests a second method by which the Farm Credit System can obtain money to lend farmers, that is by an indirect guaranty of Federal land-bank bonds through an agency having the ability to sell Government guaranteed bonds. But this method makes the interest rate paid by the banks higher than if their bonds were directly guaranteed and could be sold direct to investors.

There is a third method, one not now available to the Farm Credit System, that is a direct guaranty of Federal land-bank bonds by the Government. Since both the old method of simply a moral guaranty of the land-bank bonds and the procedure of indirectly guaranteeing the bonds of the banks have proved more costly not only to the banks and the borrowers but to the Government as well, it would appear that the lowest rate of interest to borrowers on a permanent basis and with the least cost to the Government could be had through a Government guaranty of the Federal land-bank bonds. Some people object to a direct guaranty on the grounds that this could cause too much Federal control of the land-bank system, even though it would result in the lowest possible interest rate on farm mortgages, without resorting to a direct Federal subsidy. We believe proper safeguards can be provided whereby the low interest rates can be obtained through a Government guaranty and still preserve and strengthen farmer participation in the system.

It has been estimated that if all the bonds of the land banks which are now outstanding were replaced by 1946 with Government-guaranteed bonds bearing 2 percent interest rate, the interest rate charged on all outstanding loans of the land banks could be rewritten at 3½ percent. This would mean a saving to the Government, over the present method of making this interest rate temporarily available to you, of about $28,000,000 each year. Under such a system the banks would have the ability to sell their bonds at any time at the lowest possible interest rate available in the market and pass these benefits on to member-borrowers.

This brings us to the second important problem, that of making the system function more cooperatively than it has in the past. I yield to no one in my support of true, sound cooperation, and I want to see the present farm-credit system made a far more cooperative enterprise than it has ever been. The question for us to determine is what form of cooperative will do the best job in making mortgage credit available to farmer-borrowers on a cooperative basis. There are stock cooperatives and nonstock cooperatives. At the present time we are a stock cooperative and our experience with that has not been too good. Since we began this system about 6,000 national farm-loan associations have been chartered; today only some 3,600 remain in existence. Many of these are little more than skeletons and many others have been consolidated. About 60 percent of the associations are in such financial condition today that they cannot make loans and stockholders in national farm-loan associations in the majority of instances have lost part or all of their investment. By spreading losses on loans on a district-wide basis instead of charging losses to associations the deadening effect of these losses on associations' operations could be avoided. Besides that the capital stock now held by you could be applied on your debt at the par value of the stock.

About 20 percent of the stock in the national farm-loan associations is now held by farmer borrowers and others who are not present patrons of the system, and in some districts as much as 35 percent of the stock has become separated from the loans. This separation of stock from the loans tends to defeat the very purpose of a cooperative system.

In addition to this record the stock feature has made for increased problems not only in administration but for the borrowing members themselves. The failure to pay dividends on stock has undermined confidence of many farmers in the farm-loan system. The stock purchase requirement has made it more difficult for the associations to obtain new business. Ownership of stock has done little or nothing to build an interest on the part of the member borrowers in their associations.

There is an alternative to all this in the form of a nonstock cooperative which could overcome most of these difficulties that we should be considering in light of present conditiens. Membership in such an association would be on a nominal membership fee basis. Under this system the national-loan associations would be paid for the services they perform in terms of the values of those services. Such payments would include an allowance for ordinary services and a premium for superior service when that was rendered. If a local board and secretary-treasurer so operated the association under this system that a balance was available it could be used to pay dividends. Furthermore, members of the association would participate in net profits of the Federal land bank on the patronage basis. Patronage dividends are far more typical of the true cooperative than are dividends on stock. Removal of the stock feature in our Federal land-bank system and the substitution of membership associations would increase member interest, build a true cooperative, lead to more economical operation, and make possible the guaranty of Federal land-bank bonds by the Government.

With this program we would have a farm-credit system which would be more responsive to changing conditions and one that would make for continuous-borrower participation in the management of the system. It would remove the impairment of many local associations and provide a basis for sustained membership interest in the work of the associations and in the future of the banks that has not been possible under the present system. Instead of centralizing control, this program would make for more active and stronger local participation in management and make possible an actual decentralization of authority and responsibility. But perhaps most important of all, it would tend to insure a continuous and permanent supply of mortgage credit to farmers at the lowest rate of interest economically possible. Nothing less than this should be the goal toward which all of us should be working.

Selective Service Right Now

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES F. BYRNES

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, August 24 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY GEN. HUGH S. JOHNSON

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix a radio address made by Gen. Hugh S. Johnson over the Columbia Broadcasting System August 24, 1940, on the subject Selective Service Right Now.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I want to talk to you about selective service—to raise the hundreds of thousands of men we need to protect our country in this deadly dangerous world. It is being stalled in Congress by small-time politics. Small-time, because both the great leaders, Roosevelt and Willkie, have disdained petty political advantage on national defense. They are for selective service now.

But a few Members of both Houses, overlooking, I think, the sturdy patriotism and common sense of the American people, profess to fear for their own reelections if they vote against what they call the traditional American volunteering and in favor of what they call the dictatorial system of conscription.

These are the issues. I feel competent to discuss them, because under Gen. Enoch H. Crowder I planned the selective-service system of 1917 and was in direct charge of its execution.

The pending Burke-Wadsworth bill should be much improved. But it makes a start. Getting started on defense in this world of swift and deadly surprises is everything. These wasted days may now seem unimportant. They so seemed in early 1917 when, as now, people were bewildered because politicians wrangled. We, in the selective-service system, didn't wait. We set the system up before the law was passed. That saved just 60 days in the process of raising our armies. By revising the system we saved another 60 days in December 1917.

That didn't seem very important in those deliberate days. But in March 1918, when the Germans with a typical Hitleresque blitzkrieg surprise drive broke the Fifth British Army before the Channel ports and smashed through the French toward Paris as far as Chateau-Thierry, the months saved back in drowsy 1917 enabled us to rush a great American Army to France and turn certain defeat to overwhelming Allied victory. No man can foresee the tragic disaster of days lost now as they may appear in 1941—perhaps forever too late.

We will never again be fools enough to send a single American mother's son to double-crossing Europe. It isn't a question of that now. It is a question of double-crossing Europe threatening us. With our strength of men and resources we can take a defensive position which nobody will ever dare threaten—but we can't do that if we delay in utilizing every minute of these precious days of comparative peace and respite. We can't do it, if our experience in the World War and the complete collapse of nation after nation in this war hasn't taught us that, in this terrible new motorized, mechanized, lightning war, time is of the very essence of our safety and that the peoples who sleep on their opportunity are lost.

Even more than in 1917 and 1918, 4 months lost in congressional thumb-twiddling and political jockeying now, or 4 months saved in realistic common-sense American efficiency may be the difference between the safe existence of our Nation and our way of life and its destruction at the hands of the most ruthless conquerors that ever ravaged an innocent and unoffending people.

Just passing an act of Congress will no more get men than it will get tanks and airplanes. While the kind of organization we set up in 1917 can begin to select men in a few weeks, it can't get into its full scientific and equitable efficiency in less than 4 months—not until registration and classification of millions are complete. Add to those 4 months whatever additional time is taken in congressional wrangling now and you can get a fair measure of the danger of political legislative trifling in the face of a world aflame with the greatest menace this country has ever known. It is a deliberate risking of the only kind of defense that can keep us from being drawn into this inhuman war for the destruction of our democracy—the last best hope of earth.

To keep the "traditional American system of volunteering" is the excuse. That system isn't traditional. From our beginning, we have nearly always had to abandon it because it never has worked in any major war in our history. In our Revolution the Colonies that did their part in full had to reject it and take up outright, brutal conscription—which is far from what is now proposed.

We tried "traditional volunteering" in 1812. Washington was burned and Detroit surrendered. We used fixed-term volunteers in the Mexican War and they left General Scott stranded between Vera Cruz and Mexico City. Both sides tried traditional volunterring in our War between the States—and both had to abandon it to avoid disaster.

We gave volunteering full scope in 1917 until December 1st. The flow of men just petered out. No one can argue that if we had not abandoned it then for full and vigorous selective service, the first World War would have been disastrously lost to the Allies and to us before the summer of 1918.

Up to the World War, conscription was a hateful thing. It was enforced by bureaucrats and political soldiers upon citizens whose names were drawn from jury wheels without regard for their responsibilities to dependents and the economic life of the Nation. It was full of favoritism, graft, purchase of exemptions, bounties, and hiring of substitutes. That was military service enslaved by press gangs. It degraded the conscript, abused and affronted his family, and was a reproach to democracy.

Selective service is not conscription in any such sense. Recent political ballyhoo has been that it is a step toward dictatorship. If it were, I wouldn't be urging it. In 1917 there was no power in Washington or anywhere else in America with authority to take or defer the taking of any man—except the local boards of his neighbors on questions of dependency and the district boards on other questions. It was of the very essence of traditional American democracy in decentralized local self-government. I see no disposition in Congress or the Executive to depart from the proved perfection of the 1917 law.

Our need for men now is relatively so much smaller and the number of available men so much larger that if we register all those between 18 and 60 and then classify them according to their relative obligations to families and employment, our selection now can be made with no harsh invasion whatever of domestic, economic, and educational relations. We can get our men for training in the fairest, gentlest, and most humane and sympathetic system ever known on this earth.

I rub my eyes and look back at 1917 like a Rip Van Winkle waking from a 23 years' sleep. Every single one of these objections and all this political fenagling were tried then. Every hearer who is old enough to remember will bear me out that when this most democratic and scientific system of selecting manpower moved into execution before our people's eyes, that clamor died in a month. Selective service proved our most respected, popular, and successful effort of the World War. So great was the country's satisfaction and acclaim that I never expected to live to see the day again when its principles would even be questioned. It is a system not only for the protection of the country but for the protection of families, farms, homes, and factories from impulsive action by immature boys at the emotional pressure of fifes, drums, and eagle-screaming oratory on the one hand and sneers, innuendos, and the near blackmail of high-pressure recruiting drives on the other.

Another unbelievable outcome is that Congress and the country should demand the spending of unlimited billions for the new and horribly scientific weapons of modern mechanized war and then hesitate to man those weapons with the kind of specialists who can be trained and provided in this way and in no other. If we can't train the expert specialists we might as well save our money for the machines and sit here helpless—as Poland sat, or Belgium, and even France—and let Hitler's mechanical monsters roll and fly over us in the same blood bath of destruction. It is incredible folly.

That training is a protection to our country, but it is as vitally necessary for the protection of our soldiers. Sending untrained boys, with or without modern armored, motorized, and mechanized implements of war, against such specialists as Hitler has in such machines, is just like sending naked Indians in canoes, armed with bows and arrows, out against a first-class battleship—mass murder for them, certain disaster for their country.

We must lose no more time in political "monkey business" and legislative piffling. This is no experiment. We have the complete and successful 1917 and 1918 experience. It is only necessary to take up where we left off there.

As Woodrow Wilson said of that effort:
